This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

AMES GOWANS, Appellant (Pursuer).—Pearson, Q.C.—A. Taylor Innes.
BRATHWAITE CHRISTIE, Respondent (Defender).—Sol.-Gen. Jessel—Glasse, Q.C.

Minerals—Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Sterility.—Held (in aff. judgment the Court of Session) that a tenant was not entitled to reduce a lease of nerals on the ground that they could not be worked to profit, even if no rent re to be paid.

Observations on sterility as a ground for reducing agricultural and mineral ses.

(IN the Court of Session 8th February 1871, ante, vol. ix. 485.)

Ld. Chancellor (Selborne).
Lord Chelmsford.
Ld. Colonsay.
Lord Cairns.

In February 1866 James Gowans took a lease from Alexander Christie, :n proprietor of the estate of Baberton, of the whole freestone and other nerals in the estate, with certain small exceptions, for a period of enty-one years from Candlemas 1866, at a fixed yearly rent of £200; being provided that the rent should not be exacted for the first year, :ept in the event of Gowans lifting minerals from the estate during that riod, in which event he was to pay a modified rent of £100. The lease :n declared it to be "in the power of the lessee and his foresaids, on ·ing six months' notice of his intention to do so previous to any term of ndlemas occurring at the end of the third, seventh, or fourteenth years this tack, to remove from the subjects hereby let; and this tack, on the ıant's giving such notice at any of these periods, shall cease and determe, it being hereby declared that in the event of the tenant availing nself of the break at the end of three years he shall be obliged to restore ground broken up in such a manner as that it may be ploughed up count and reckoning in regard to the rents paid by him under the lease to Alexander Christie and Brathwaite Christie.

The pursuer alleged that, on the faith of certain representations, and in reliance on them, and under an essential error as to the subject of the lease which was induced by them, he, on 2d February 1866, signed the lease. He further alleged that the result of his boring operations "has been the discovery that, while there is some freestone on the lands of Baberton, there is no such amount of freestone as was represented to him (on the faith of which representation he entered into the lease); nor is the said freestone, or any other mineral or material or substance, in the lands so let, nor are all of the said substances together, capable of being worked to a profit in a mineral lease [even if no rent were to be paid]; * and still less are said minerals capable of being remunerative at the rent stipulated for in said lease. The pursuer has tried the said lands at all points shewing indications of freestone, but he has in every case been unable to turn out such a quantity as would repay his outlay, even upon the most economical methods which can be used for the efficient working of minerals." The first break in the lease took place at Candlemas 1869. The pursuer averred that at that date he had already so far experimented on the ground as to be led to suspect "that the lease was not workable to profit, and that there was no such freestone or other mineral in the said lands as had been represented to him. He had not, however, been able within that time so exhaustively to experiment on the said grounds as finally to act upon this, and he declined in the meantime to acknowledge the lease as an existing one, by acting on the break provided in it. He accordingly continued his operations for another year. The defender, the present Mr Christie of Baberton (who had now succeeded his brother as heir in possession of the said entailed estate), was quite aware, as were also his agents, of the experimental and doubtful way in which the pursuer was carrying on the operations both before and after the said break. The pursuer having continued his investigation for another year, finally ascertained the unworkableness to profit of the lands and minerals let to him."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The mineral lease entered into between the deceased Alexander Christie and his successors on the one hand, and the pursuer, on the other, being unworkable to profit [that is, incapable of reimbursing a tenant for the outlay necessarily expended by him in working the same, and still more of yielding him any return over and above his rent], and having been so from the beginning of the said lease, the same ought to be reduced, and the pursuer found to be free from the same, in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons. (2) The said lease having been entered into under essential error on the part of the pursuer as to the subject of the same, which error was induced by the representations of the said Alexander Christie and those for whom he was responsible, the said lease ought to be reduced, in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (3) The rents and other prestations exigible under the said lease having been exacted from the pursuer and paid by him while the lease was really unworkable to profit [as aforesaid], but before he had finally ascertained this, the pursuer is entitled to repetition of the same, or at least to count and reckoning in respect of the same, both against the executors of the late Alexander Christie and against the present possessor of the entailed estate. (4) In the event of the defenders denying the fact of the unworkableness to a profit of the said lease they are bound to refer the question to arbitration, or to consent to the ascertainment thereof in such form as may be agreed to by the parties, or as the Court in its discretion may see fit.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are not relevant or sufficient in law to support any of the conclusions of the summons, or at least the same are not relevant or sufficient to support the said conclusions in so far as the same are directed against the present defenders. (3) The action cannot be maintained, in respect that the pursuer did not avail himself of the break at Candlemas 1869, but continued to work the freestone after as well as before the said break.

The Lord Ordinary, on 2d November 1870, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer's statements are not relevant or sufficient in law to support the conclusion in the summons for reduction of the lease, on the grounds set forth in the pursuer's second plea in law, and therefore repels the said second plea in law for the pursuer: Quoad ultra, before answer, allows the parties a proof of their respective averments, and to each a conjunct probation."

The defender reclaimed.

The Court allowed the pursuer to amend his record by the additions printed in italics.

The First Division, on 8th February 1871, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor: Find that the pursuer's averments are not relevant nor sufficient in law to support any of the conclusions of the summons for reduction of the lease between the pursuer and the defender's, Braithwaite Christie's brother, or the relief of the pursuer, as tenant, from any of the stipulations of the said lease: Therefore dismiss the action, and decern, and find the pursuer liable in expenses: Remit," &c.

The pursuer appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, this is an action by a tenant of a mineral lease against the present owner of the property and the representative of the deceased owner. The Lord Ordinary thought it right to allow proof before answer in support of certain averments in the condescendence of the appellant, the pursuer, by which he undertook to shew the unprofitableness or incapacity of producing profit to himself of this mineral lease. The parties by their pleas in law have raised the question of the relevancy of those averments, and by allowing proof before answer the Lord Ordinary did not decide one way or the other that question of relevancy. The Inner-House thought, on the case coming before them upon a reclaiming note, that there was no relevancy in the averments, and if that was the correct view I think that they very rightly were of opinion that it was not in any way proper to burden the parties with the expense of what might turn out to be very voluminous and lengthened proofs upon matters ultimately irrelevant. The real question, therefore, before your Lordships is whether the Inner-House were right or wrong in holding these averments to be irrelevant.

The burden of proof undertaken by the appellant in this case is certainly a very heavy one, because he asks for the reduction of this lease as a lease which is vitiated or void between the parties by reason of the failure—as I understood the argument—as to the subject-matter of the lease. Mr Innes did not at all shrink from the principle involved in the form of remedy which is sought. He said that there was no lease at all in the view of the law; that there never had been any lease in the view of the law, and that there was nothing at all to be leased. That was a startling proposition, when we look at the lease and consider the nature of the subject-matter which it comprehends, viz., all the minerals and materials under particular lands, freestone being specially but not exclusively mentioned, and all other minerals, of whatsoever kind they might happen to be, being included in the lease. The principle of the argument was this: that by the Roman law adopted into the law of Scotland there is a warranty, implied or express (I do not know which it may be, but that there is certainly a warranty in one way or the other), of possession of a subject capable of producing the contemplated fruits or profits.

Feb. 14, 1873. Gowans v. Christie.

Now, in one point of view such a doctrine may be, and I venture to say is, perfectly intelligible and perfectly reasonable. When there is that which in the language of the law of this country would be called a total failure of consideration; when the landlord has not the thing to let which he purports to let, and which is the consideration for the rents, it is perfectly reasonable that the whole lease should fail ab initio, and be capable of reduction. Nor is it a very wide extension of that same principle to say that if a landlord warrants a continuation of the subject-matter for a certain number of years, a failure of the subject-matter before that number of years has elapsed shall involve a reduction or termination of the contract at the time of that failure and thenceforward. Those views are at all events perfectly intelligible. But your Lordships will see that they all resolve themselves into either the original non-existence of the subject, the failure of the landlord to put the tenant in possession of the subject-matter of the lease, or the subsequent exhaustion or failure of that subject-matter, so that from a given time it ceases to exist.

And when the authorities which have been referred to are considered they will be found with a few, if any, exceptions, to turn entirely upon that principle so understood. When the authorities on the Roman law referred to in the case as illustrations of the principle, si frui non liceat,[1] come to be looked at, they prove to be all of that kind. They refer to cases where possession is not given, where there is no prestation of the subject-matter, or where some external vis major not inherent in the subject-matter, and not the fault of the tenant, takes the subject-matter away, it may be either temporarily or permanently; but the principle is always the same, resting on the destruction pro tanto, or entirely, of the subject-matter. But Lord Stair,[2] the authority on the law of Scotland chiefly relied upon, goes further, and as it seems to me lays down the true principle in the most unequivocal terms. He says that there is a peril or risk undertaken by the tenant, that he is at the risk of the quantity and the value of the subject-matter, but he is not at the risk of the being or existence of it. Now, just consider how that will apply to the case of a mineral lease. If there had been in this case a lease of some particular description of minerals,—only, for instance, of a bed or seam of coal or of a bed of freestone, and if there had been no such thing in existence, then, according to Lord Stair's principle, the tenant would not have been at the risk of the being of the coal or the freestone. But that of course cannot apply to a case where the lease is of all minerals, for although there is necessarily some uncertainty and speculation in such a lease, because the minerals may turn out to be of greater or less value, yet some minerals there necessarily must be under every parcel of land, and therefore the peril of the being of the minerals is a peril which no tenant of a mineral lease incurs; nor does the landlord incur it either. But with respect to the quantity and value, which is the whole matter in controversy here, as I understand the case, according to Lord Stair's doctrine the whole peril of the quantity and value is upon the tenant; so that authority is directly against the appellant's case. Then we are referred to Lord Bankton,[3] who, in the passages quoted, seems to say that the landlord warrants a capacity to produce fruits. What is the meaning of that? A capacity to produce the kind of fruits which, according to the substance of the contract, the tenant is to receive. What are the fruits within the meaning of that principle? If, for instance, land is let as good arable land, and it turns out to be totally incapable of any agricultural produce, I can understand that in that case the principle might apply, and that there is a failure of the warranty to produce fruits. Again, I can understand that if in the case of a mineral lease the landlord in substance represented that there was a workable coal, and the coal turned out, as in the case of Murdoch v. Fullerton,[4] to be so nearly exhausted that there was no area of the least value for working, in other words, nothing which could be worked, a thin seam, for example, of a finger's length,—something which was not practically useful for the purpose of working at all,—it may be said that in such a case there was a failure of the landlord's warranty. But the fruits in this case are minerals to be got by working, and according to Lord Stair the quantity and the value of them, if they can be got by working, are at the risk of the tenant; if the minerals can be got, there are the fruits, and there is no failure whatever of fruits in such a case. There is no sterility as long as there are minerals which may be got.

All the cases, as it appears to me, go to the same point. The case of Edmiston v. Preston [1] might very possibly be differently decided at the present day, when we should no longer regard a want of proper ventilation of a mine, or a want of maintenance of proper roofing, as a thing arising from the act of God or from vis major. Such a defect would doubtless be regarded at the present day as a thing for which the tenant was responsible. But the principle upon which that case was decided was evidently the same as if an earthquake or some natural convulsion had made the mine practically unworkable.

The case of Dixon v. Campbell,[2] as far as it is fit to refer at all to an authority turning upon contract, and not upon general law, is strongly against the appellant's argument, because in that case, there being an express contract that if the mine should cease to be capable of being worked to advantage by reason of that class of accidents which all these authorities contemplate, the tenant might throw it up, it was expressly laid down that he could not throw it up for faults which did not occur in the mine, but in the fruit on account of variations in the market price. What has arisen in the present case but a question of market price?

The 3d article of the condescendence tells us that there is freestone under the land of Baberton, that four years were occupied in boring and in other operations to obtain it. I pass over the allegation that the quantity was less than was represented, for nothing now turns upon that. The appellant goes on to say "nor is the said freestone or any other mineral or material or substance in the lands so let, nor are all of the said substances together, capable of being worked to a profit in a mineral lease, even if no rent were to be paid." I will stop reading that sentence there, because I agree with Mr Innes that he does not take issue merely upon the point which follows, that the minerals are incapable of being remunerative at the rent stipulated for in the lease. He also says that even if no rents were to be paid they are not capable of being worked to a profit. He goes on: "The pursuer has tried the said lands at all points shewing indication of freestone, but he has in every case been unable to turn out such a quantity as would repay his outlay even upon the most economical methods which can be used for the efficient working of minerals." That allegation is consistent with the existence of an unlimited quantity of minerals, capable of being worked, and having a market, but what he says is that they are not capable of being worked to a profit, that so far as he has worked he has been unable to turn out such a quantity as would repay the outlay. Therefore the proposition really is this, that according to the principles laid down in the law of Scotland the landlord guarantees the tenant against loss by reason of any of these elements extrinsic to the mine, and independent of the nature of the subject-matter within the mine which go to the determination of the question of profit and loss. What are these elements?—the quantity, the quality, the cost of labour, the cost of materials, the demand and supply varying in the markets themselves, and the means of conveyance, all of which are things entirely extrinsic to the mine, and certainly not within the view of the principles laid down by any of the authorities to which a reference has been made. On the contrary, they are exactly those things as to which Lord Stair has said that the tenant runs the risk of quantity and value.

In that state of things it appears to me that even the authorities relied on by the appellant are against him, and independently of the special stipulation in this particular lease the reason of the case wholly repels in my mind the view of the law which the appellant suggests. When we come to look at the stipulation in the particular lease we find that conclusion fortified by those stipulations. It is admitted that it is a very common thing with parties entering into mining leases to contract expressly that the tenant shall not be obliged to go on with the lease when he cannot work the mine at a profit, and the parties very wisely, because that question is a very difficult one in its nature, frequently add a clause providing for an arbitration. There is nothing of that sort in the lease before us, but there is a provision that at the end of three years, or at the end of seven, or at the end of fourteen years, the tenant may break, as it is called, or throw up the lease. The object of the provision obviously is, that if he finds it cannot be worked with profit he may relieve himself from it in that way by throwing up the lease.

Now, it appears to me that such stipulations are absolutely irreconcileable with the whole principle of the argument of the appellant, because if the lease was vitiated from the beginning, which the argument assumes, and which the doctrine of reduction assumes, it must have been upon grounds which are wholly independent of the exercise of an option at certain periods to retain or throw up the lease. Suppose that at the end of three years the tenant had chosen to throw it up;—I had really great difficulty in understanding whether it was seriously meant to be contended that because he had made no profit in that time, and then concluded from the experience he had had that he would make no profit if he went on working till the end of the lease, he would not only have a right to throw it up, but he would also have a right to repetition of the rent he had paid. That seemed to me to be almost a necessary consequence of the argument for the appellant; but that is entirely inconsistent with the whole intent and purpose of the express contract between the parties, which clearly shews that the landlord is to receive a stipulated rent, that during the first year that rent is to be reduced in amount on account of the outlay of the tenant, and the risk incurred by him in the whole of the earlier years (it being probably in the contemplation of all parties entering into such leases that during the earlier years while an outlay is going on the undertaking is not likely to be remunerative), and that it is agreed that the tenant shall be allowed to say at the end of three years whether he wishes to go on or to be released from his contract. In this case he determined to go on. The third year elapsed, and he did not break the lease, but after the expiration of another year he brings his action and asks for the reduction of the lease. It seems to me that both upon the grounds on which the judgment of the Inner-House expressly rested, and if it were necessary upon broader grounds still, the pursuer is wholly wrong, and therefore the interlocutors appealed from ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lord Chelmsford.—My Lords, I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend that in this case the interlocutors appealed from must be affirmed. The question is, whether the appellant was entitled to be admitted to proof of the averment in his condescendence that the mineral lease was incapable of reimbursing the tenant for the outlay necessarily expended by him in working the same, and still more of yielding him any return over and above his rent; in other words, supposing that averment had been proved, whether it would have furnished a ground for the reduction of the lease—whether it was relevant, in fact, to the conclusion of his summons for the reduction of the lease.

The law of Scotland upon the subject of renunciation of leases, either for the non-existence or the failure of the subject-matter, is very shortly stated in a passage in Mr Bell's Principles of the Law, at section 1208, in these terms:—"The contract of lease implies a subject let, and if it turn out that no such thing exists as the parties intended to be the object of agreement the tenant cannot be bound to pay rent. Where the subject fails (as where a house is burnt, where a farm is by a flood or a hurricane reduced to sterility)," which must mean absolute barrenness, "where a coal-mine is exhausted suddenly and unexpectedly, the tenant's obligation to pay rent will be discharged." It is quite clear, therefore, that where there is a total destruction or exhaustion of the subject-matter of a lease, there, by the law of Scotland, the lessee is entitled to abandon it.

But I am not aware, from any of the cases which have been cited in the course of the argument, that where it is a case of sterility merely, short of exhaustion, the tenant has any such right to renounce or abandon the lease. The old authorities upon the subject rather to my mind indicate directly the contrary. Take, for instance, the passage which has been cited from Lord Bankton. He says:—"The tack-duty is on account of the fruits," and "sterility or vastation liberates in whole or part." Elsewhere he says:—"In other subjects beside rural possessions the tack-duty is remitted or abated, when by accident, without the tacksman's fault, the thing becomes unprofitable, or the use of it is interrupted." Again he says :—" Sterility is not understood where the increase satisfies the expense of the seed and labour."

So that he says, where there is sterility merely, and not absolute vastation, the rent may be suspended or remitted. The question of whether altogether, or for the partieular year, will remain to be considered hereafter. Sir George Mackenzie says,—" If the ground be absolutely barren the hire will not be due. If the land yields some profit, though never so little, the hire will be due, if the profit but exceed the expense of the seed and labouring." And from the passage which has been read by my noble and learned friend it appears that the authority of Lord Stair is applicable exactly to the same extent, namely, that where there is sterility as distinguished from destruction, or exhaustion, it is not a ground for a reduction of the lease, but merely for a suspension or abatement of the rent.

There is very great difficulty in applying this right of suspension of the rent in the case of sterility, and that was observed upon in a case that was cited in the course of the argument, viz., Fleeming v. Baird,[1] in which Lord Neaves said :—" The question of sterility, even in agricultural leases, is not free from difficulty. When a subject becomes flooded or sanded over, and is therefore made quite different from what it was, that is a stronger case ; but I doubt whether in agricultural leases the repeal of the corn laws would have entitled a tenant to abandon his lease on the ground that it was not profitable. I also doubt whether every year is to be taken by itself in a continuing lease. Supposing an Egyptian in the time of Joseph had had a fourteen years' lease of land, and had got his first seven years of plenty with his barns crowded, and the years of scarcity had followed, I think it would be hard on the landlord that the tenant should get his full measure of the harvest during the first seven years, and then pay no rent at all for the next seven." That applies to agricultural leases. There seems to have been a distinction taken between agricultural and mineral leases, upon the ground that a lease of minerals is a hazardous speculation ; and Lord Deas says in this case that he knows no case where a mineral lease has been brought to an end upon the ground of sterility.

With regard to mineral leases it appears that it has been usual in leases of that kind in Scotland to introduce a clause that the lease may be abandoned when it is unworkable at a profit, and in a passage from Mr Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing it is stated :—" The mineral lease being of a subject which may be untried, or the extent or quality of which is not fully known, is a speculation on the tenant's part. Provision is therefore necessary for enabling the tenant to be quit of the obligations, in case the trials shall fail, or the field not prove workable to profit ; in other words, in case, after a fair and full endeavour on the tenant's part to turn the lease to good account, the speculation shall not succeed. With that view the lease generally allows breaks to the tenant at intervals of five years upon previous written notice of six or twelve months, and without any cause assigned."

That is the case in the present instance, and that is the ground upon which the Court of Session came to a determination that in this case the appellant was not to be admitted to proof, because he had, by the contract which he entered into, fenced himself round against the possibility of loss by reason of the sterility of the subject-matter. He stipulates, in the first place, that for the first year no rent whatever shall be payable, that is, the year ending at Candlemas 1857. He then further stipulates that upon giving six months' notice at the termination of the third, the seventh, or the fourteenth year, he may, without any cause assigned, abandon the lease. Now, this is entirely for the benefit of the tenant, because the landlord has no corresponding right of giving notice, and turning the tenant out of possession. Therefore it seems a most reasonable thing to hold that where a special contract of this description is entered into, even supposing the common law would give the right of reducing the lease in a case of this description (to which I am quite certain from the authorities it would not), still, as the tenant has chosen to enter into this particular contract, and to guard himself against the consequences of loss by reason of the lease turning out to be unproductive, that is a ground upon which it is impossible to say that he can fairly and reasonably be entitled to reduce the lease, even supposing circumstances existed, which without a contract would have entitled him to do so.

Under these circumstances I agree with my noble and learned friend that the interlocutors must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD COLONSAY.—My Lords, I do not consider it necessary to say much upon this case after what has been said by my two noble and learned friends who have preceded me. It appears to me that the appellant, the pursuer in the action, has failed in presenting a case which entitles him to proof of what he says he can establish. The parties come before us as parties to a particular contract, which relates to a mineral subject. It is quite correct on the part of the appellant to say that minerals may be the subject of lease, and that the law of lease applies to them. But it does not follow, although the law of lease applies to them, that in all particulars the application is the same in the case of an agricultural lease as in the case of a mineral lease. The nature of the two subjects is so very different, the perils which naturally present themselves to the eyes of parties when they enter into a lease are so very different in the two cases that it does not follow that all these conditions which are imported into an agricultural lease naturally are imported into a lease of minerals.

The question in this case is, whether the pursuer has presented such a statement as entitles him to be relieved from the contract altogether by a reduction of that contract, in respect of that fact, as he himself explains it, that he cannot work these minerals to profit,—in this sense, that the cost of working and raising the minerals leaves nothing for him to pay his rent with, or perhaps leaves him out of pocket. I am not aware of any case in which that has been decided in regard to a mineral lease. All the cases, without exception, which have been put before us, are cases substantially of non-existent subjects, or exhaustion of that which has been the subject of the lease. Even in one of the earlier of those cases, the case of Wilson v. Mader,[1] the Court looked to the fact alleged, that the coal after the second year could not be found—that no coal remained—that it was impossible for the tenant to go on paying his rent according to the condition of the contract which he had entered into, whereby he was limited to the working of a certain number of collieries, and if he worked a larger number he was to pay an increased rent, and looking to all the terms and conditions of the contract, the Court were of opinion that, under the particular circumstances of that contract, it was not the meaning of the parties (that is the expression used in the decision), that the tenant should remain bound. The Court, therefore, in the case treated the nature and condition of the contract, and the inferences to be deduced from it, as an important element in the question. In other cases I think similar grounds seem to have existed. At all events, exhaustion was the ground of the decision in some of them. In the treatise of Mr Hunter,[2] which has been referred to with a commendation which it fully deserves, that writer says :—"The cause of loss must not be such as, although natural, can be deemed to have been in the contemplation of the lessee when he contracted. Increase of depth or accumulation of water in a mine does not give liberation or abatement to the lessee, although the addition to the expense of working should create positive loss."

I think there has been no case referred to at all indicating a release from the payment of rent in a mineral lease, or liberating from a lease, on the ground of an allegation that the tenant could not work the mine to profit. I think the only case that was referred to in which the tenant was released from the payment of the rent was the case in which the judicial factor applied to the Court for authority to reduce the rent of a mineral tenant upon the estate of which he was the judicial factor, because he found that the tenant could not pay the rent, and that he must either render him bankrupt, thereby probably deteriorating the value of the subject in the market, or give him relief. A landlord might in these circumstances have given relief to the tenant, but the judicial factor had not the power of doing so. He was an officer of the Court, and he applied to the Court for the power to give relief to the tenant, and the Court, upon inquiry, gave him that power. But that does not by any means establish that the tenant had at law any right to such relief.

Now, in this case, looking to the condition of the contract between the parties, it appears to me that the tenant has fenced himself round with protection with reference to any kind of occurrence that could take place under the lease. In the first place, he is going to make a trial, and for the first year of the trial he is to pay no rent. Then he has a period of three years, during which he may continue the trial, and if he has no profit in these years he may abandon the lease, and he has a similar power of breaking the lease at other periods. He does not introduce into the lease, and he did not under the circumstances require to introduce into the lease, any clause such as is very common in modern mineral leases, that in the event of the subject being unworkable at a profit he shall be entitled to have relief by means of a reference to an arbitrator. It is said that he relied upon the common law. If so, he was relying upon an undecided and very shadowy thing, and it has turned out that he had very little common law to rely upon. But he fenced himself round, and protected himself, as you might have expected him to do if he had not a basis of common law to rely upon, or if it was a doubtful basis, by a condition which enabled him to break the lease at the end of either three, seven, or fourteen years, as it was said in the case of Wilson v. Mader, that it was not in the contemplation of the parties when they entered into the contract that it should continue after the coal was exhausted. So I think here the Court has taken the right view in looking at what was in the contemplation of the parties, and in holding that the parties have provided themselves with a contract which, looking to the terms of it, is in every respect so favourable to the tenant, leaving it to his own choice whether to relinquish the lease at the end of certain periods or not, that he has shewn no ground for the relief he seeks. Therefore I think the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Cairns.—My Lords, in this case there appears to me to be an attempt to make use of a suit which was instituted upon a different basis, for the purpose, that basis having failed, of obtaining relief upon a ground which was not in contemplation at the time when the suit was instituted. And it is, as it appears to me, an example of an effort to strain a well known and a well founded principle of law to a purpose to which that principle was never intended to apply.

When I say, in the first place, that it is an attempt to use the suit for a purpose for which it was not originally intended, what I mean by that is this: If your Lordships will take the trouble of referring to the condescendence and pleas in law in this case you will find the whole foundation of this suit originally was an allegation that there had been a specific representation made by the lessor of this property—in other words, that there had been an express and specific warranty given by him with regard to the property. For in the first article of the condescendence you will find it is stated that the pursuer was induced by the representation of Mr Christie to enter into the lease now sought to be reduced, and then the pursuer goes on to say that these representations were to the effect that there was a large stratum of freestone in the lands proposed to be let of a superior quality, and capable of being worked at a profit by a tenant, and in particular by a tenant becoming bound for the rent, and under the stipulation in the said lease; and again, there being no statement whatever of any implied warranty in law in the first article, the second article pursues the same subject of the representation, and says that on the faith of these representations and in reliance on them, and under an essential error as to the subject of the lease which was induced by them (that is, by the representations), the pursuer signed the lease in question. Again, in this third article, he states that the result of these exertions has been the discovery that while there is some freestone in the lands of Baberton, there is (as he avers) no such amount of freestone as was represented to him (on the faith of which representation he entered into the lease), nor is the said freestone or any other mineral or material or substance in the land so let, nor are all of the said substances together, capable of being worked to a profit in a mineral lease. Again, in the fourth article he states that at a particular date he had been led to suspect or believe that the lease was not workable to profit, and that there was no such freestone or other mineral in the said lands as had been represented to him.

Feb. 14, 1873. Gowans v. Christie.

Following up that catena of allegation the plea in law states that the mineral lease entered into between Mr Christie and the pursuer being unworkable to a profit, that is, incapable of reimbursing a tenant for the outlay necessarily expended by him in working the same, and still more yielding him any returns over and above his rent, and having been so from the beginning of the said lease, the same ought to be reduced,—I take it that that plea in law was obviously introduced as an offer by the pursuer to prove that one of the representations upon which he relied was a representation which was unfounded. The second plea appears to me to be nothing more than a general plea of general misrepresentation so as to open up the area of proof, and to enable some more proof to be given, for example, as to the other representations with reference to the stratum of freestone. But I believe firmly that both pleas were placed upon the record for the purpose of shewing a readiness on the part of the pursuer to disprove the truth of the representations which he said had been made to him.

In that state of things the case came before the Lord Ordinary. The Lord Ordinary thought that the allegations of representations were not relevant or sufficient, and with that decision, I understand, the pursuer is and was contented, for it was not contested upon the reclaiming note, and therefore the question of representation is now altogether out of the case.

Then these averments to which I have referred being now out of the case, there is an attempt (which is the attempt to which I alluded at the beginning of my observations) to use the suit for a purpose which I say never was contemplated at the outset, namely, for the purpose of making out that although there was no specific and express warranty, there is a law in Scotland which implies a warranty to the same purport, which in the first instance the pursuer had undertaken to shew had been actually made to him.

Before I leave that point I cannot refrain from saying that it appears to me that the observations of the Lord Ordinary, in dealing with the questions of express warranty and representation, are very applicable also to the questions of warranty implied by law, as to which, nevertheless, the Lord Ordinary was disposed to allow some proof. Your Lordships will find that the Lord Ordinary makes these observations :—"Then as regards the representation that the freestone was capable of being worked to a profit by the tenant, such capability depends upon many contingencies, as, for example, the skill and capital of the tenant, the rate of wages, the state of the market, costs of transit, and many other elements of hazard. Such representations are, it is thought, a mere matter of opinion, which, even if erroneous, could not form a good ground for reducing the lease."

It is not stated that the alleged representations were fraudulent. I entirely agree with those observations of the Lord Ordinary, but I own I am at some loss to understand why they are quite as applicable to the idea of a warranty implied by law as they are to the idea of an express warrant averred to have been made by the lessee; and I am at some loss to conceive, when the Lord Ordinary felt that there would be these difficulties in allowing a proof as to express warranty, that it did not occur to his mind that to a much greater degree they were impediments in the way of allowing proof as to what I have termed for shortness an implied warranty of law.

I said that it appeared to me that the case was also an example of an attempt to strain a well known principle of law to a purpose to which that principle was never intended to apply. By that I mean this: Your Lordships will observe that the averments as to the state of the mine now amount to this,—not to any averment that there are no minerals or that there is no freestone, but merely to an averment that the freestone and the minerals which the averment implies to exist there, are not capable of being worked to a profit, an averment which not only is consistent with there being minerals, but implies that there are minerals consistently with that averment. There may be minerals of unbounded quantity.

There may be hundreds of thousands of tons of those minerals, as to which, however, it may not stand true in any commercial sense that you may get a profit out of them. That is the character of the averment in the condescendence.

Now, upon that averment the way in which the case is put is this: There is a common form of covenant in mining leases with which your Lordships are perfectly familiar, a covenant that if the minerals included in the demise cannot be worked to a profit, either generally or in a particular time, there shall be an opportunity to the lessee of giving up the lease upon certain terms stated in that covenant. I think your Lordships will have found, according to your experience, that that covenant is generally, if not always, accompanied with some specification and standard as to profit, and some means for ascertaining by the award of arbitrators, or by the opinion of experts, whether it can be predicated of the mine at a particular time that it can or cannot be worked at a profit. That is an express covenant which is very frequently inserted in mineral leases. I must observe with regard to that express covenant that the word "profit" is there used in a sense altogether different from that in which the pursuer would use it here, because where you have an express covenant of that kind, "profit" does not mean gain after paying for work and labour, but it means gain after paying for work and labour and the rent of the mine—a very different position of things from that which the pursuer contends.

That being a common, or at least a very ordinary form of covenant or provision to be found in a mining lease, there is, on the other hand, a well known principle of the civil law imported into the Scotch law, and into other laws which follow the civil law, that where there is a demise, and where the subject-matter demised either turns out to be non-existent or to be exhausted, or where the working of it turns out to be utterly impracticable, in any of those cases the tenant is released from the obligation of the lease. That being a well known principle, it is attempted in this case, and it has been attempted for the first time in this case, to bring up that principle, and to say that after all it means nothing more or less than this, that it gives to a tenant relief just in the same way that the express provision which I have referred to as being common in mining leases where minerals cannot be worked at a profit would give the tenant relief.

That is a very startling proposition, and one which requires to be examined certainly with some care. I asked the learned counsel for the appellant in the first place, Is there the authority of any decided case in support of that proposition? The learned counsel who argued for the pursuer at your Lordships' bar were unable to produce any. Undoubtedly it is perfectly accurate to say, with regard to all the decided cases, without going through them, that they are cases which range themselves as illustrations of the principle that I have described, namely, cases where the thing demised was either non-existent or exhausted, or the working of it was impracticable. Apart from decided cases, what is the authority? Some institutional writers have been referred to, and I take Sir George Mackenzie as an example of them. Sir George Mackenzie speaks of a tenant not being obliged to pay rent where there is sterility, and he says, describing it negatively, that there is not sterility where the fruit, the crop, the harvest, exceeds the value of the labour, and of the seed.

Even with regard to agricultural subjects I should venture to doubt whether at the present day that dictum of Sir George Mackenzie, and other institutional writers, is to be taken without very considerable qualification. Operations of husbandry are now so extended, and cover so large a space of time in comparison with what was the case at the time when many of these writers wrote, who looked more to the immediate outlay for one harvest than to the consequence of an outlay in succeeding years, that one might doubt very much whether it would be possible to deal with labour and seed in the way in which Sir George Mackenzie evidently was dealing with those in his own mind when he used those expressions which I have referred to. Again, I took the liberty of putting the case to the counsel for the pursuer, that there might be a lease of waste or moor land, which a tenant might well be content to take, intending to reclaim it by degrees, and as to which in any one year, or in any small number of years, it might be utterly impossible to say that there had been any fruit exceeding the seed and the labour; and yet it would be a very strong proposition to hold that the tenant could give up a lease of that kind because the fruit had not exceeded the seed and the labour. Again there might be land which might be allowed to run down into sterility, and become unproductive by the fault of the tenant himself. There also the dictum would not apply.

Feb. 14, 1873. Gowans v. Christie.

But without pursuing the question with respect to agricultural leases further I should doubt extremely whether dicta of this kind apply at all to the leases of mineral subjects. In point of fact, though we speak of a mineral lease, or a lease of mines, the contract is not in reality a lease at all, in the sense in which we speak of an agricultural lease. There is no fruit, that is to say, there is no increase, no sowing or reaping in the ordinary sense of the term, and there are no periodical harvests.

In point of fact, what we call a mineral lease is really, when properly considered, a sale out and out of a portion of land. It is liberty given to a particular individual, for a specific length of time, to go into and under the land, and to get certain things there, if he can find them, and to take them away just as if he had bought so much of the land. It is very difficult to apply to a case of that kind dicta which evidently relate to the ordinary process of agriculture, to reaping and sowing above ground. Further than that, it is obvious that if these dicta were held to apply to mineral leases, the consequence would be that mineral leases, instead of being what they have always been considered, highly speculative and uncertain contracts, would become contracts absolutely safe and free from any risk whatever, because the tenant, if he found his lease profitable, would continue to hold it, and reap the profit from it; but if he found it unprofitable, he would certainly give it up, and the loss would be not his, but the landlord's.

Again, it would be impossible to apply these dicta to mineral leases without some knowledge of the area of time over which you were to spread the account of profit or loss. I asked Mr Pearson, who opened the case with great ability for the appellant at your Lordships' bar, to what time he would refer the question of the profit or loss, and I think he was obliged to admit that he would take the whole period covered by the lease (without counting the breaks), which in the present case would be a period of twenty-one years. Then I asked, how would it be possible at the end of the third or the fourth year of the lease to speculate as to what the profit or loss would be if it were spread over the whole period of the lease. How can you at the end of the third or fourth year of the lease tell what the price of labour may be in future years, or what machinery may be introduced in future, which may dispense to a certain extent with labour, or what the market value of minerals of the same kind will be at a future period, or what the effect upon the market value of those minerals may be of the discovery of other minerals of the same kind in the same neighbourhood? All those things are perfectly uncertain. The moment you admit, as you must admit, that you cannot confine the question of profit and loss to the transactions of one year, but that you must spread it over the whole series of years comprised in the lease, that moment you confess that to take beforehand a speculative contract with reference to the future loss and profit for the whole period of the lease is a thing which it is simply impossible to do.

Then, finding that there is no decided case which is an authority for the contention of the pursuer, and that there are no dicta of institutional writers which can properly be applied to a case of this kind, I have no hesitation in saying that it appears to me that the pursuer has utterly failed to establish that there is in the case of a lease of this kind any implied warranty in law approaching to that express warranty which in the first instance he asserted had been made by his landlord. It is upon this ground that I should wish to rest the decision of the case. And I do so the more readily for this reason that I observe some of the learned Judges in the Court below were rather inclined to rest it to some extent upon another ground, namely, to assume there may be the common law right for which the pursuer contends, but that, on the other hand, that common law right is ousted by the express provisions contained in this lease with regard to breaks. If I found that there was a common law right such as has been alleged I should have great hesitation in saying that anything in the lease did oust that right.

Gowans v. Christie.

If there is such a common law right I do not see that it is in the least degree impossible that it should co-exist with a lease containing a provision for breaks. I do not therefore hold that the common law right is excluded by the provisions of this lease, but I look upon the provisions of this lease as a proof to my mind that it never was imagined by those who entered into it that there was any such common law right. It appears to me that these provisions, to a great extent at all events, would have been unnecessary. But I believe the provisions to have been introduced because there was no such common law right, and because no one ever supposed that there was such a common law right.

I think, under these circumstances, that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

Minerals—Superior and Vassal—Feu-Contract.—A superior bound his vassal to build and maintain on his feu a house of a certain value, and reserved to himself the minerals, with power to work them at pleasure, and to remove as much stone, &c., as might be necessary for the proper working of the minerals, it being expressly agreed that he should not be liable for any damage to the vassal that might happen through the working of the coal, &c., by longwall workings or otherwise. Held (reversing judgment of the Second Division) that the vassal was not entitled to an interdict against the superior working the minerals under his house on the ground that the workings would probably injure or destroy it.

Ld. Chancellor (Selborne). Ld. Chelmsford. Ld. Colonsay.

William Jackson Andrew, solicitor in Coatbridge, acquired from James Porteous a feu on the estate of Colonel Buchanan of Drumpeller, on which a house and offices were built of the value of £900. The feu-contract between Colonel Buchanan and Porteous, dated in 1859, contained the following clause:—"Reserving always to the said first party and his heirs and successors whomsoever the whole coal, fossils, fireclay, ironstone, limestone, freestone, and all other metals and all minerals in the said piece of ground, with full power to work, win, and away carry the same at pleasure, as also to remove as much stone and other matter as may be necessary for the proper working of the said coal, ironstone, and others, and that free of all or any damage which may be thereby occasioned to the said second party and his foresaids; and it is expressly agreed that the said first party and his foresaids shall not be liable for any damage that may happen to the said piece of ground, buildings thereon or existing hereafter thereon, by or through the working of the coal, fireclay, ironstone, freestone, or other metals or minerals in or under the same, or in the neighbourhood thereof, by longwall workings, or otherwise, or which may arise from or through the setting or crushing of any coal waste or other excavation presently existing, or which may exist hereafter within or in the neighbourhood of the ground hereby disponed, through the said first party or his foresaids working or draining the said metals or minerals, or others as aforesaid;" . . . . . "And further the said James Porteous binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to erect, in so far as not already done, a single or double dwelling-house or villa of one storey with attics, or a dwelling-house of one and a half or two storeys in height, which house or villa shall be for the occupancy of one family only, and shall yield a yearly rent equal to triple of the foresaid feu-duty (£5), and to maintain and uphold the foresaid building in a proper and sufficient state of repair, so as always to yield such a yearly rent, and of an equally good style of architecture in all time thereafter; and in building said dwelling-house and offices the said James Porteous and his foresaids will observe, as he hereby binds and obliges himself to observe, the regulations, and fulfil and perform the whole obligations underwritten."

The seam of coal referred to was let in 1847 to Mr Wilson of Dundyvan, and at the date of the feu-contract was wrought by his trustees, who in working it left sufficient pillars of solid coal to support the surface. The subsequent tenants, Henderson and Dimmack, without making any provision for the support of the surface, proceeded to work out the pillars and to work other adjoining seams.

Andrews then presented a petition in the Sheriff-court of Lanarkshire against Colonel Buchanan and Henderson and Dimmack, for interdict to prevent them removing or working out the pillars in the seam of coal underneath and adjacent to his feu.

The petitioner averred that the walls, ceilings, and partitions of his property had been rent and shaken, many of the doors would not shut, and that several of the stones in the front and back walls of the house were rent and damaged.

The respondents declined to do anything to prevent further damage.

The Sheriff-substitute (Logie) ordered proof, and the Sheriff (Glassford Bell) adhered.

The respondents advocated. Henderson and Dimmack pleaded;—(3) The petitioner is barred by the terms of his own feu-contract from insisting either for interdict or damages against Mr Buchanan, the owner of the coal and minerals, or against the present respondents as his tenants. (4) The petitioner, not being the owner of the coal and minerals, is not entitled to object to the owner or his tenants working or carrying away the same.

Colonel Buchanan pleaded;—(1) The respondent's title gives him no right in the lands of which he alleges himself proprietor beyond those conferred by his author by the feu-contract entered into between him and the advocator, Mr Buchanan, and the terms and conditions of that feu-contract are binding in toto upon the respondent. (3) The right to work said minerals by longwall workings or otherwise having been specially agreed to in said feu-contract by the respondent's author, the respondent is not now entitled to interdict against such workings as craved by him.

The petitioner pleaded;—(1) The operations of the first-named respondents being reckless, unfair, and unskilful, and being carried on to the loss, injury, and damage of the petitioner, he has good grounds to insist on the same being discontinued. (3) The petitioner being bound to uphold and maintain the houses erected by him on his feu, it is incompetent and illegal for Colonel Buchanan to grant authority for working or for the respondents to work out the coal under or in the neighbourhood of the petitioner's feu, so far as the same may be necessary to be left for the safety and protection of the petitioner's property, unless other ample means and support are provided and taken.

The Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) renewed the order for proof, and after a proof pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds as matter of fact (1) that the respondent (petitioner in the Sheriff-court), Mr Andrew, is the proprietor of a piece of ground situated at Merriston of Coatbridge, extending to one rood two poles and eighteen yards or thereby, which he holds in feu from the advocator (respondent in the Sheriff-court), Mr Buchanan, the annual feu-duty payable for which is £5; that on this piece of ground there is a dwelling-house, with washing-house and other out-houses attached thereto, which were erected within the last few years, and prior to Whitsunday 1866, at a cost of several hundred pounds; and that it is a condition of the feu-contract under which the respondent holds his property from Mr Buchanan, as superior, that on the one hand the superior should be entitled to work the minerals under the ground feued, without being liable in any damage thereby caused to the feuar, and that on the other hand the feuar should be bound and obliged to erect on the said piece of ground a dwelling-house or houses and pertinents which should yield a yearly rent equal to triple the amount of the annual feu-duty payable by the feuar, and to uphold and maintain the same in a proper and sufficient state of repair, so as always to yield such yearly rent in all time coming: Finds also as matter of fact (2) that the advocators (respondents in the Sheriff-court), Robert Henderson and Richard Dimmack, carrying on business under the firm of the Drumpeller Coal Company, are at present, and have been since the term of Whitsunday 1866, the lessees of the coal in certain parts of the lands and estate of Drumpeller, belonging to the other advocator, Mr Buchanan, comprehending the coal in the respondent's foresaid piece of ground, and lands adjacent thereto; that they were, at the date when the respondent applied in the Sheriff-court for interdict against them and Mr Buchanan, working out one of the seams of said coal under or in the neighbourhood of the respondent's house and ground; that the seam of coal so being wrought out had been at a former period prior to Whitsunday 1866 let to the trustees of the late John Wilson of Dundyvan; that the trustees of the said John Wilson, in working the said seam of coal under and adjacent to the ground now belonging to the respondent left pillars of solid coal to support the surface of the petitioner's feu, and buildings thereon; and that notwithstanding of this the advocators, Messrs Henderson and Dimmack, carrying on business as aforesaid, proceeded to work out many of the said pillars of solid coal so left by the said trustees under or in the neighbourhood of the property of the respondent, and have not left, and are not leaving, a due and proper support for the surface, and for the buildings belonging to the respondent: Finds also as matter of fact (3) that in consequence of the advocators' Henderson and Dimmack's mode of working as aforesaid, the respondent's dwelling-house on the piece of ground held in feu by him as aforesaid has been seriously injured, and will be entirely destroyed if the advocators work out or impair the foresaid pillars of coal within 100 yards of the property belonging to the respondent, or of the corresponding space subjacent thereto: Finds also as matter of fact (4) that the advocators, Messrs Henderson and Dimmack, have, nevertheless, threatened to work out said pillars of coal, and all the coal under and in the neighbourhood of the said piece of ground belonging to the respondent, and have intimated their determination to do so, and that the workings of the advocators, Messrs Henderson and Dimmack, complained of, as well as their determination to continue these workings to the effect of removing the foresaid pillars and all the coal under and in the neighbourhood of the respondent's property, have been and are approved of, and authorised by the other advocator, Mr Buchanan: Finds, in these circumstances, that, as matter of law, the respondent is entitled to interdict against the advocators to the extent and effect following: Therefore suspends, interdicts prohibits, and discharges the advocators (respondents in the Sheriff-court), each and all of them, from removing or working the seam of coal at present or which was at the time the interdict was applied for in the Sheriff-court being wrought out by the advocators, Henderson and Dim-mack, at any point or points underlying the surface within 100 yards of any part of the respondent's foresaid piece of ground, or of the corresponding space lying under or beneath the same; and reserves to the respondent all claims competent to him against the advocators for the loss and damage already sustained, or that may yet be sustained by him, in consequence of the operations of the advocators, Henderson and Dimmack, and to the advocators their answers thereto as accords, and decerns: Finds the respondent (petitioner in the Sheriff-court) entitled to expenses," &c.

Henderson and Dimmack reclaimed.

The Second Division (the Lord Justice-Cerk Moncreiff dissenting) adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, with this variation,—" (1) that in the third finding thereof the word 'dwelling-house' be substituted for the word 'property' and that in the subsequent part of the said interlocutor the words 'any part of the respondent's foresaid piece of ground' be omitted, and after the words 'within 100 yards' there be inserted the words 'the respondents dwelling-house:'"

Colonel Buchanan and Henderson and Dimmack appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, in this case the petitioner (who is the respondent here), is the feuar of certain land at Coatbridge in Scotland, under one of the defenders (who is the appellant here), who is the superior and the owner of the subjacent minerals. The Second Division of the Court of Session have pronounced an interlocutor, from which Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff dissented, interdicting the appellant and his lessees from removing or working a particular seam of coal, called the Kiltongue seam, under the feued land in question at any point or points underlying the surface within one hundred yards of any part of the respondent's dwelling-house, erected upon that ground. The ground, as I understand it, of the interlocutor thus pronounced, from which, as I have said, the Lord Justice-Clerk dissented, was, that in the judgment of the Court any working within the prohibited distance would be dangerous to, and would probably destroy, a dwelling-house belonging to the pursuer, which under certain covenants in the feu-contract he had erected upon the land in question; and that the mineowner was not at liberty, under the terms of the feu-contract, or having regard to its proper legal effect, to work the mines in any way which would, at least by the operation of causes which could be foreseen and guarded against, be likely to produce the effect of letting down or injuring the buildings upon the surface of the land.

Now, my Lords, with respect to the law, I apprehend that there is no difference between the law of England and law of Scotland in this respect. There is no doubt that, generally speaking, when a man grants the surface of land, retaining the minerals, he is guilty of a tortuous act if he so uses his own right to obtain the minerals as to injure the surface or the things upon it, and he would be answerable in damages for doing so. And as the act would be wrong, and as he would be answerable in damages for it, and as prevention in such a case is a better remedy than any damages, the Court would be justified in granting, and probably would be called upon to grant, an interdict to prevent him from doing so. And if this were an ordinary case of that character, assuming that the evidence justified, as I think probably it might be found to justify, the particular limits of prohibition, the interdict would undoubtedly be right. But, on the other hand, I apprehend it is the clear law of England, and also of Scotland, that when two persons meet and contract together and settle together the terms of a contract for the purchase, or sale, or letting of a property, they are at liberty to enter into such terms as they may think fit, provided always of course that they do not agree to do anything contrary to the public law of the land; and if the owner of surface lands, in buying those surface lands from the person who was previously the owner of the soil, is willing to take the risk of any injury which may be done and any damage which may be sustained by the working of the subjacent minerals, and contracts accordingly, it is perfectly lawful for him to do so. Nor, as I apprehend, can any Court hold such a contract

to be unreasonable, for that would be to make the Court, instead of the parties, the judge of what it is reasonable or not for them to do with their own. It is to be presumed, if such a contract is made, that the risk is taken into account in settling the terms of the entire bargain between the parties. If it is considered to be a serious risk, it is to be presumed that the feuar or the purchaser gives less for the surface than he otherwise might have been willing to give. If it is not a serious risk, it will not have the same influence upon the price and the terms; but still it is a risk which he contracts to undertake—the whole contract being voluntary and for valuable consideration between both the parties, and the person who was previously the owner of the entirety of the land being under no antecedent obligation whatever to part with any portion which was previously his own except upon such terms as are mutually agreed upon.

In such a case, therefore, everything depends upon the construction of the contract, and the whole question between the parties resolves itself into a mere pure and simple question of construction. No doubt upon doubtful words in this or in any other contract there may be grounds for saying, that of two open constructions that which is the more consistent with the general scheme of the whole instrument, or the more apparently reasonable under all the circumstances of the case, is to be preferred. But no views of a conjectural kind as to what is or what is not reasonable can be admitted if the construction of the contract is plain and free from any real ambiguity.

With respect to the state of the property, as I collect from the evidence of both parties to this contract, which we are called upon to construe, all that is material appears to be this—It was in a populous neighbourhood, or, at all events, in a neighbourhood in many parts of which there were inhabited dwellings; and, on the other hand, there were various seams of coal under it, of which the two upper seams had been already worked out upon what was described in the evidence as the old stoop-and-room system of working, which seems to be a system of working which leaves thin and not very permanent walls to support the surface, the entire coal being taken out with the exception only of those thin walls or supports which remain, those supports being under possible circumstances liable to decay and to give way without the use of any means to remove them, and being still more liable, indeed certain, to fall in and break down, thereby letting down the surface, if any seams lying either immediately below or in the neighbourhood of them should be to any material extent worked. That was the condition of the two upper seams, and there was below them a lower seam called the Kiltongue seam, which may or may not have been partially worked before the date of the lease of this particular property, but which appears to have been a seam of considerable value and thickness, and which, if it had been at that time worked at all, had been worked upon what is called the modern or the improved stoop-and-room system. The nature of that system is this—that more important and solid pillars are left as the coal is worked out, but when the coal has been taken out from the excavated spaces called rooms, then the mineowner comes back, and by degrees works out the whole of the pillars which had been left, so that, if no regard is to be paid to the support of the surface above, the effect will ultimately be that the entirety of the coal will be removed.

I may mention that the same effect would be produced if another known system, called the longwall system, were adopted, according to which no supports are left at all in the course of the working, except such as may arise from the accidental accumulation of rubbish in the spaces from which coal has been taken out, and which rubbish, at all events under the circumstances of the mine, if left, would not be sufficient to prevent an extensive subsidence of sufficient importance to cause the injury which the interdict granted in this case would obviate.

Now, that being the state of the mine under the property, the parties meet together, and the owner of the land severs the surface from the mine, and sells it to the pursuer upon the terms which are expressed in the feu-contract before us.

I will first consider what is the effect of the portion of the feu-contract which expressly refers to the particular subject, and then, whether there be any legiti-mate inference, consistent with sound principles of construction, to be drawn from any other portion of the contract, so as to vary the interpretation which we should otherwise have arrived at.

v. Andrew.

After the usual terms of "feu," these words follow—"Reserving always to the said first party, and his heirs and successors whomsoever, the whole coal, fossils, fire-clay, ironstone, limestone, freestone, and all other metals and minerals in the said piece of ground, with full power to work, win, and away carry the same at pleasure, as also to remove as much stone and other matter as may be necessary for the proper working of the said coal, ironstone, and others, and that free of all or any damage which may be thereby occasioned to the said second party and his foresaids."

I pause there, my Lords, for a moment, and will consider, first, what the effect of those words by themselves might be if the last clause which I have read—"and that free of all or any damage which may be thereby occasioned to the said second party and his foresaids"—had not been contained in the instrument. Without those words it would have been a mere reservation of the minerals, with full power to work, win, and away carry the same at pleasure, and also to remove as much stone and other matter as might be necessary for the proper working of the minerals. The effect of such a reservation, standing alone, according to the law of both countries, would have been this—the whole property in the mineral strata would have been reserved to, and would have remained in, the previous owner, and he would have had an unlimited power of dealing with that as his own in the way of working, but he would have been subject to the general restriction which every owner of property is under, expressed in the maxim Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. When one man's property stands in such a position to another man's that by certain modes of using it he might destroy the property of the other, his own rightful use over his own property is limited by the obligation which he is under not to destroy the property of his neighbour. Therefore, although he would have been at liberty to take away, if he could do so without injuring his neighbour, everything reserved to him, yet he was not at liberty in taking it away to injure his neighbour. Consequently, the interdict which has been granted would have been right and proper had the matter rested there.

But then come in the words "and that free of all or any damage which may be thereby occasioned to the said second party and his foresaids." Now, those words, even if they had stood alone, might, perhaps, have made a very important difference in the case, because your Lordships will see that the only thing which had been reserved was the whole minerals—the power to work was the power to work the same, that is, the whole minerals; and when it is superadded that that may be done "free of all or any damage which may be thereby occasioned,"—these words being put in for some purpose,—it is very difficult to understand what they can mean, except this, that to the full extent of that which is reserved the working may take place, though it occasions damage, and that he is not to be responsible for damage.

However, it is not necessary to dwell further upon that clause, standing alone, because the parties appear to have been anxious to make their meaning more clear than it would have been had the contract rested there; and they go on to state their express intention in these words—"It is expressly agreed that the said first party and his foresaids shall not be liable for any damage that may happen to the said piece of ground, buildings thereon, or existing hereafter thereon, by or through the working of the coal, fire-clay, ironstone, freestone, or other metals or minerals in or under the same, or in the neighbourhood thereof, by longwall workings or otherwise, or (another kind of damage) which may arise from or through the setting or crushing of any coal waste, or other excavation presently existing, or which may exist hereafter, within or in the neighbourhood of the ground hereby disponed, through the said first party or his foresaids working or draining the said metals or minerals, or others, as aforesaid." Your Lordships will see that this express agreement to exclude claims for damage is not confined to some particular description of damage, but that it extends to any damage—the words being, "and shall not be liable for any damage."

And, secondly, it particularly takes notice of the buildings, and of the liability of those buildings to damages through the workings; and it says that the superior shall not be liable for any damage which may happen to any buildings then upon the property, or afterwards to be there. The importance of that reference to buildings will be seen presently, when we come to refer to the latter part of the deed, which relates to that particular subject. Thirdly, it takes notice of the modes of working by which such damage may happen, and puts foremost "longwall workings,"—which is a remarkable thing, because that was not the mode of working actually in use, or which ever had been in use there, and it was a mode of working which would extract, if it were followed, the whole of the coal, without leaving any supports whatever, except, as I have said, such limited supports as might arise by rubbish left in the mine, and which, according to the evidence relating to this mine, would have been clearly insufficient to prevent damage by subsidence.

I ought further to remark, that it notices the two kinds of damages,—the one a direct kind of damage, by the working of the seams remaining to be worked; and the other—what I may describe as indirect damage—by the subsiding of the wastes in the two seams already worked, in consequence of those excavations. It deals with the damage arising from the loss of collateral support, occasioned by workings in the neighbourhood, as well as with the damage arising from the loss of support, occasioned by workings immediately under the surface in question. Can anything possibly be more clear than that the intention of the parties on both sides was that the landlord was to have the unrestrained right of taking out the whole and every part of the reserved minerals, the whole risk of any damage being undertaken under the contract by the feuar?

It has been suggested that the exclusion of damage may not exclude the right to an interdict. But, my Lords, I apprehend that a right to an interdict is founded only upon this, that the act is already ascertained to be injurious and wrongful. Every act which is injurious and wrongful is an act for which there must be a liability to damage; and therefore it is only because it is such an act as would carry with it a liability to damage that the better remedy of interdict can be applied. The moment the damage is renounced it becomes a damnum sine injuriâ, and to a damnum sine injuriâ neither interdict nor action for damages applies. Therefore it appears to me to be as clear as possible, upon the application of any ordinary principles of construction to this clause, that the intention of the parties was upon the one side to renounce all claims, and on the other to save themselves from any liability whatever for damage that might occur from getting out the whole of the minerals.

But it is said that this construction may be limited by assuming a proper mode of working, and to that, if the word "proper" is rightly understood, I entirely agree; and I observe that no controversy is raised upon that subject in the appellant's printed papers. The landlord in entering into this contract only contracts for power to work and get the coal, and to be exonerated from any damage which may arise through the working of the coal. The very words, "proper working," occur incidentally in one place, although not in the principal clauses in this part of the contract; but that only means that if he does that which is not needful or proper to the getting of the coal, and if the act so done —not being needful or proper for the getting of the coal—leads to the subsidence of the surface, it is an act not within the scope or intention of this contract, and therefore the landlord is not protected by this clause in such a case. To let down the surface is not the thing which he contracts for—he contracts for power to work his reserved coal, and he is not to be answerable for damage by subsidence arising in that way. Wanton, reckless, or improper working, therefore, is a thing which is not in the view of either of the parties. If this working, which is prohibited by the interlocutor, were wanton, reckless, or improper, doubtless there is nothing here which would prevent its being interdicted. But is it so?

The question is, what is the meaning of "proper working" for the purpose of the application of that principle? I apprehend such working as is right and proper for the purpose of getting out the minerals in the ordinary and proper course of mineral working—such a mode of working as would be proper between a landlord and a mineral tenant if the landlord had let the mine to the mineral tenant with an express declaration that he was not to be answerable for any surface damage in a case in which there were no buildings, and the whole surface was also let to the mineral tenant himself. The word "proper," so used, has reference only to the subterraneous working—the mineral working; it has nothing whatever to do with the maintenance of the surface. The obligation to maintain the surface where it exists is independent of the right of working; and however proper the mode of working might be, if it let the surface down, and if that was a thing which the mineral owner was not at liberty to do, the mineral owner would be answerable in damages for so doing. Of course there is a very intelligible sense of the term "proper working," which refers, where it exists, to the upholding of the surface, but that, I apprehend, is not the sense in which it could be introduced into a contract which expressly stipulates that the mineral owner shall be exonerated from damage arising either to the surface or to the buildings upon it.

Mar. 10, 1873. Buchanan, &c. v. Andrew.

So far, my Lords, I have to observe that the construction which I am advising your Lordships to place upon this contract is exactly the same as that placed by Lord Hatherley, when Vice-Chancellor, upon a contract in this respect precisely similar in its substance in the case of Williams v. Bagnal.[1] His Lordship there had to deal with arguments very similar to those which have been suggested in this case; and when it was said that you could possibly suggest some description of damage which might be provided against, short of subsidence by ordinary workings, he said that that was not consistent with the language of the contract, which said that the party was not to be liable for any damage. He said, also, with regard to the suggestion of working so as to uphold the surface, that to introduce such a limitation would simply be to defeat the whole object of those stipulations. And I cannot but observe that the suggestion which has been made—that this may be limited to such damage as, through causes incapable of being reasonably foreseen or provided against, might happen to the surface or to the buildings thereon, either from the working or from the subsidence of other excavations, whatever care might be taken to keep up the surface and to work the minerals so as to maintain the surface, and notwithstanding that the parties proceeded in view of that obligation to work in that manner—appears most unreasonable, for, in the first place, the parties, if that had been their meaning, might have expressed it, and would have expressed it, in appropriate terms, utterly unlike the terms which we find here. The very suggestion of such a limitation also suggests the manner in which it could have been and ought to have been expressed, if it was intended. But, secondly, the thing is so remote and so improbable—it so reduces the stipulations practically to a mere nullity—as to make it quite unreasonable to suppose that that can be what the parties meant.

Then, I say, if we rest on this portion of the contract, there really is no ambiguity and no uncertainty. The feuar has deliberately taken upon himself this risk, and this interdict imposes upon the landlord an obligation which it was the express object of the contract to relieve him from.

I assume in the respondent's favour that the effect of the interdict is not to take away the whole right of working any part of the reserved minerals. The evidence is a little obscure upon that subject, but still it has been contended, and perhaps rightly, that after the date of this feu-contract some portions of the coal were removed by the old stoop-and-room system, leaving the stoops standing; and the whole question is now as to the right of taking those stoops away. Taking that to be so, of course the argument would reduce the entire reservation of all these powers to an absolute nullity. But in all other respects the view which I have submitted to your Lordships as to the effect of the contract remains the same.

But then it is said that cannot be the meaning of the contract, because we find in the later portions of it what did not exist in the case of Williams

Bagnal, or in any other case, namely, an express stipulation that the feuar is to build a dwelling-house or a building of a certain description and value, to be worth three times the feu-duty, which is £5 a-year, and to maintain and keep that house in repair upon the property, the building being erected according to a plan rather elaborately defined, the whole of that stipulation being an onerous and obligatory stipulation so far as relates to the feuar. It is said, How can it be possible that you can construe this contract so as at once to impose upon the feuar the obligation of putting a building upon this land, and maintaining it there, and at the same time so as to say that he is not to receive compensation, or is not to have a right to any damage if the superior proceeds to do in the course of his mineral working that which will destroy that building, and which may afterwards, on its being reinstated, destroy it more than once? To those who have not before them the materials upon which these parties determined for themselves what it was for their mutual interests to agree to, it may seem that this was perhaps an improvident contract. But what I am at a loss to understand is, when the feuar does contract to build and repair—whatever may be supposed to be the legal effect of that obligation to repair (that may be a question)—how that fact can alter the construction of the previous words, which expressly relate to the right of the mineral owner to work the minerals, and contain an express stipulation that he shall be exonerated from all liability for damage arising from subsidence to any buildings that may hereafter be erected upon the property in consequence of such working. One thing is quite plain, that although the feuar agreed with the superior to erect buildings, both parties did contemplate that the buildings so erected might be damaged or destroyed by the mining operations of the superior, in respect of which he was not to be responsible, and for which he was not to make compensation. Buildings being expressly in contemplation, it seems to me that that is quite enough, whether it be that he contracts to build them himself, or whether it be that he is at liberty to do it by contracting with another party. In Williams v. Bagnal it is clear that the land was sold as building land, and that buildings were in contemplation—they were buildings, I think, of rather a more valuable kind than those which are in view here—namely, ironworks and machinery. But in that case the Vice-Chancellor did not think that that circumstance prevented the parties from being capable of contracting that the whole risk of any damage by subsidence should be with the owner of the buildings, whatever were his obligations in respect of them, and that the mineral owner should have as free and unfettered a right to work out the whole of his minerals, without being liable for any damage whatever, as he would have had if he had not granted the surface to any other person.

This, then, is the agreement which the parties have made, and in the latter portion of it there is not a single word which has a legitimate bearing upon the construction of the words which are to be found in the earlier clause which I have referred to; and therefore the interdict which has been granted is in truth an interdict relieving the feuar from his contract, without any action of reduction, or any cause that I can perceive why he should be so relieved. Therefore, my Lords, the motion that I shall make to the House is, that these interlocutors be reversed, and that the appellant be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

Lord Chelmsford.—My Lords, the question in this appeal turns entirely upon the construction of the feu-contract, by which a piece of ground, of which the respondent is now the proprietor, was feued by Mr Buchanan with a reservation of the minerals within it.

Mr Buchanan is the proprietor of the estate of Drumpeller, and of the coal and minerals therein. In 1847 he let the coal under part of the lands to Mr Wilson of Dundyvan, by whom, and afterwards by his testamentary trustees, it was worked; and at the expiration of this lease the coal remaining unworked was let to the appellants, Henderson and Dimmack.

The lease binds the tenants to work the coal in a regular, systematic, and proper manner. The piece of ground of which the respondent is the owner lies within the coal field in the lands of Drumpeller.

Mar. 10, 1873. Buchanan, &c. v. Andrew.

Before the date of the feu-contract in 1859 a new mode of conducting the mining operations, called stoop-and-room, had been introduced. The former method of stoop-and-room was to leave permanent pillars; but under the modern system the coal is completely excavated and removed; the mode of working being to leave large pillars in the forward working from the place where the operations begin and then to work back and remove all the pillars which had previously been left standing.

The evidence shews that at the time of the feu-contract Wilson's trustees had been working forward on the modern stoop-and-room system, leaving stoops or pillars for back working. They had taken out some of the stoops which they had thus left, and Henderson and Dimmack, when they succeeded, proceeded to remove the remaining stoops, beginning at the place where Wilson's trustees left off. There can be no doubt that, although the workings had not arrived at the piece of ground of the respondent, they had approached sufficiently near to occasion damage to the house which had been built upon it. The respondent thereupon petitioned the Sheriff for an interdict to restrain Mr Buchanan and his tenants, Henderson and Dimmack, from working and removing the coal so far as the same might be necessary to be left unwrought for the safety and support of his ground and buildings. The case was advocated to the Court of Session by the present appellants, and after proceedings before the Lord Ordinary, he by his interlocutor interdicted the advocators from removing or working the coal at any point within 100 yards of any part of the respondent's piece of ground. This judgment was reclaimed to the Court of Session; and the Judges adhered to the interlocutor, subject to the alteration that they limited the interdict to working the coal within 100 yards of the respondent's dwelling-house, instead of to within 100 yards of the piece of ground.

The question turns on the construction of the feu-contract, and more especially upon the clause of reservation of the minerals contained in it. By the feu-contract, which is dated in March 1859, Mr Buchanan sold and disposed to James Porteous and his heirs a piece of ground containing one rood eighteen poles and two yards, and thereby the feuar bound and obliged himself to build a dwelling-house which should yield a rent equal to triple of the feu-duty (being £5), and to maintain and uphold the building in a proper and sufficient state of repair, so as always to yield such yearly rent, and of an equally good style of architecture, in all time thereafter. Very minute provisions are made in the feu-contract as to the character and description of the house to be built, and the feuar is thereby bound to bear one-half of the expense of keeping up and maintaining streets to be formed at the expense of the superior, ten feet of which streets were included in the contents of the ground feued; and the feuar also bound himself to make and keep in repair a footpath, and to contribute to the expense of the main sewers. The reservation of the minerals is in the most general and comprehensive terms. They have been read by my noble and learned friend, and therefore I will not trouble your Lordships by reading them again.

It is admitted that, if the reservation is to be construed according to the ordinary meaning of language, there can be no restraint upon the right of the mineral proprietor to remove every particle of the coal under the piece of ground feued, though the inevitable consequence must be the total destruction of the respondent's dwelling-house. But it is contended by the respondent that the object of the feu-contract being to have a dwelling-house of a particular description built and maintained, the generality of the words of the reservation is to be restrained by reference to this object, and that the only proper working of the coal must be intended to be such as shall consist with an upholding of the surface and building.

This construction is maintained by the Judges who decided the case in the respondent's favour, on the assumption that the feuar would never have entered into a contract obliging him to build and maintain a house which at any time might be destroyed by the exercise of rights belonging to the person who imposed the obligation upon him. Lord Cowan puts this very strongly. He says—"Suppose it had been in express words stated that the superior and his

mineral tenants were to have full power at their pleasure to put the pursuer's property into this certain peril, and it were asked whether the feuar would have entertained such an unreasonable and disastrous proposal. He certainly never would." But, with great submission, this appears to me to be determining what has been done by a conjecture of what was likely to have been done. And, then, in even stronger language, Lord Cowan says—"It appears to me that to enable the advocators to maintain their construction, the clause behoved to have in express terms provided that the feuar was to submit to have his property destroyed without redress, should the superior or his mineral tenants resort to the modern system of stoop-and-room working." It is difficult to see in what more precise language the feuar could have submitted to this contingency than by agreeing to a reservation by which the whole of the coal is reserved to the proprietor, with full power to work, win, and away carry the same (i.e. the whole of the coal) at pleasure, it being expressly agreed that he shall not be liable for any damage that may happen to the piece of ground and buildings thereon by or through such working. Lord Cowan, in the passage which I have read, seems to consider that the destruction of the property will be the necessary consequence of resorting (as he calls it) to the modern system of stoop-and-room working. But this system seems to have superseded the former one (of course in cases only where there was no obligation to uphold the surface) at the time of the feu-contract. Porteous, when he became the owner of the piece of ground, and the respondent at the date of the disposition from him, must be taken to have made themselves acquainted with the nature of the underground operations, and to have entered into their contracts with reference to them, and the modern system of stoop-and-room working was not resorted to after the feu-contract, but was the mode of working in use at the time by Wilson and Wilson's trustees, and was continued by Henderson and Dimmack when they succeeded as the mineral tenants.

It cannot, then, be said that this, which was the ordinary mode, was not a proper mode of working, supposing the proprietor of the minerals had a right to get the whole of the coal, and was not bound to leave a support to the surface. Of course he must be liable for any damage which may happen to the surface from unskilful or negligent working, but I am at a loss to understand how working in the ordinary way upon an established system can be properly characterised (as it is by Lord Benholme) as "a reckless mode of working."

Lord Benholme puts the propriety of the interdict upon a ground which it appears to me, with great respect, cannot be supported. He supposes the mineral proprietor to say, "You must not look for any reparation in the shape of damages. If you were to attempt any such thing, the absolute clause in your feu-contract would put you out of Court, and that is the reason why you shall not be allowed to protect yourself by interdict from the doing of the deed, against the consequences of which you have no redress against me." And then his Lordship goes on—"Prevention is ever preferable to cure. But prevention becomes absolutely indispensable when the threatened injury admits of no redress." What is this but to say to the person asking for the interdict, You have weakly and foolishly entered into an agreement whereby you have given to another person the liberty to do you damage without being answerable for it. We will interpose to protect you from the consequences of your folly by preventing that being done which you have agreed that the other party to the agreement shall have the right to do. This would be, if not to make a new contract, at least to annul the provisions of the existing one.

Lord Neaves, following Lord Benholme's view, held that if it is plain and demonstrable that the consequence of the mode of working would be a destruction of the surface, that would not be proper working. And he adds that he cannot presume such to have been intended without words far more explicit than are contained in the clause of reservation. He even doubts whether a clause of this kind explicitly made could be enforced. No doubt of this nature, however, was expressed in the course of the argument. On the contrary, I put the case to the learned counsel for the respondent, of land feued with an obligation to build a house and keep it in repair, with a reservation to the superior of the power to remove the house at any time if it interfered with the exercise of rights which he possessed. And he admitted that such an agreement would be perfectly valid. Indeed to deny this would be to adopt the dictum of Lord Denman in Hilton v. Lord Granville,[1] which was frequently doubted, and at last has been distinctly overruled.

Mar. 10, 1873. Buchanan, &c. v. Andrew.

Sir Richard Baggaley, in his clear and able argument, did not rely upon the improbability of the respondent having entered into a contract which left his property at the mercy of the mineral proprietor, nor deny that the words of the reservation, taken by themselves, would be sufficient to give the mineral proprietor the right to remove the whole of the coal from under the piece of ground belonging to the respondent, but he contended that the clause must be read in connection with, if not in subordination to, the object of the feu-contract, which was to provide for the building and keeping up a house on the ground feued. And therefore he insisted that the words "the proper working of the coal" contained in the reservation, must be construed with reference to this primary object of the contract. He endeavoured to shew that Wilson's trustees had worked so as to leave pillars as a support to the surface; and he therefore contended that if Henderson and Dimmack were removing these pillars they were not pursuing a proper mode of working.

But the operations of Wilson's trustees were not such as that described. On the contrary, it is proved that they were getting the coal on the modern stoop-and-room system, and accordingly in their forward working they had left large pillars; but they had commenced in working back to remove some of these pillars when their lease came to an end, and Henderson and Dimmack succeeded them. Mention is made of a pillar of coal of larger size than usual left under a house called Dr Wilson's feu—for what reason that particular house was to be saved is not stated, nor whether the support to it was to remain permanently. But there is no evidence of any intentional protection given to any other house. And when a witness said "We leave masses of coal to protect any important building, but if it is a trifling house we let it down," he is speaking of cases in which there is the surface to be attended to as well as the coal.

If the respondent is right in saying that under the reservation the working of the coal must be carried on with reference to the security of the building, then the mineral tenants must not come within one hundred yards of the dwelling-house, which the witnesses say would be a reasonable distance to keep off to ensure absolute safety. So that the mineral tenants would be deprived of a quantity of coal beyond the limits of the rood of ground feued to the respondent. In this view it is not an inaccurate description of the argument of the respondent given by the Lord Advocate that the protection to be afforded to him is to prevent the mineral proprietor working to within such a distance of the respondent's house as a skilled person would say he ought not to come.

The whole argument of the respondent is involved in the asserted restriction of the generality of the words of the reservation in order to render it subservient to the obligation to the feuar to build and maintain the dwelling-house. But this mode of dealing with the reservation seems to be adopted, although not avowedly, on account of the assumed impossibility of any person entering into a contract which it is taken for granted is a highly imprudent one. But this is resorting to conjecture instead of resting upon construction. For how can it properly be assumed that there is imprudence in the contract? It may have suited Porteous' purpose to become the owner of the piece of ground upon the agreed terms; or, assuming that his entering into such a contract was an act of imprudence, is that any reason why full effect should not be given to it? There is no ambiguity in the reservation; it plainly and clearly reserves to the mineral proprietor the whole of the coal within the piece of ground feued, and empowers him to work it without being liable for any damage which may happen to the ground or building thereon through such working. Why should this plain, unambiguous language be construed to mean—You shall not take away the whole of the coal, but only so much of it as you can get without damaging the ground and building?

Buchanan, &c. v. Andrew.

It is the safest and best mode of construction, upon all occasions, to give the words free from ambiguity their plain and ordinary meaning; and, following this course, it appears to me that the reservation gives to the mineral proprietor the power to work the mines in the proper and accustomed mode of working, and to remove the whole of the coal without leaving any support to the surface, and without being answerable for any damage which may be thereby occasioned to the ground and dwelling-house of the respondent, except such as may occur through unskilful or negligent working.

It is unnecessary to advert to the cases of Rowbotham v. Wilson,[1] and Wakefield v. The Duke of Buccleuch,[2] as authorities upon this occasion; because, as the learned counsel for the respondent observed, they are distinguishable from the present case inasmuch as in neither of them was there any burden laid upon the owner of the surface. But the case of Williams v. Bagnal, cited from the "Weekly Reporter"[3] and the "Weekly Notes,"[4] approaches very nearly to this, because, although there was in that case no obligation on the plaintiff, the purchaser, to build, yet it appears from the statement in the "Weekly Notes" that the grant was made to him for building purposes. The reservation of the minerals, with the power of working them without being answerable for any damage, was as large as in the present case. And the lessee of the minerals having by his workings caused a subsidence of the land, the purchaser sought to restrain his further working, on the ground that a grant of the surface included by implication of law everything necessary for its support, and that a man could not derogate from his own grant. But the Vice-Chancellor held that the implication of law was swept away by the express terms of the contract, which were plain, clear, and simple, and dismissed the bill with costs.

I cannot better conclude my opinion of this case than in the words of the Lord Justice-Clerk,—"I look on these obligations to the mineral owner as part of the consideration for the feu, and I can see no reason for permitting the feuar, while he retains the benefit, to repudiate the conditions of his right."

I think the interlocutors appealed from ought to be reversed.

Lord Colonsay.—My Lords, I cannot say that this case is free from difficulty, looking to the difference of opinion which has existed upon it in the Court below. I think there has been in some degree a misapplication of a very well known doctrine, namely, the general obligation upon a mineral owner to leave vertical and lateral support for the surface, even where that is not expressly stipulated for. It is an implied obligation. That point was very fully put, and with very good illustrations, by Lord Cranworth in the case of The Caledonian Railway Company v. Sprot.[5] His Lordship there pointed out that the construction of such a clause might be materially affected, and in many cases would be materially affected, by the nature of the ground, and the particular purpose for which the surface was granted away. In applying the last part of his Lordship's observations to this case I think too much effect has been given to the obligation to erect buildings and to maintain them, because in doing so that observation, and the effect of it, have been applied, not merely to a case in which there was a simple reservation of minerals, and the right to work them, but also to a case in which there were express stipulations providing for events which were expected, or were in the contemplation of the parties as possible, if not probable, at the time when the feu was granted.

Now, my Lords, I think that this reservation clause, or, I should say, the stipulation as to the right of working the minerals, is of a kind that is not common. It is a peculiar stipulation, and one especially applicable to the condition of these mineral fields at the time that the feu-contract was entered into. We know from the evidence in the case that at that time the seams which existed above the one now under consideration had been wrought out for a considerable time. I think there were three—the Pyot Shaw seam, the Main seam, and the Splint seam. Those seams had been worked in the ordinary stoop-and-room manner, that is to say, stoops or pillars had been left in order to support the roofs. But this new seam, which was going to be worked when Mr Wilson took the contract to work it, had not previously been worked, and at the time when Mr Porteous came to take his feu Mr Wilson had been in possession of that seam for a considerable number of years. I think that Wilson's lease was in 1846, and that Porteous' feu was in 1859.

We have it in evidence that the working by Wilson and Wilson's trustees in that seam was a working by the new or modern system of leaving large pillars of coal in going forward, and taking them out in returning. That is evidenced by the fact that the pillars which remained were of that class and size which were adapted for that kind of working, and by the further fact that Wilson's trustees had commenced to remove the pillars on their return. It might not have been well ascertained or known what was to be the consequence to the wastes above of this mode of working below. It was a comparatively new mode, but it was a mode recognised, and it was a mode in use in this particular seam at the time when Porteous took his feu. And, accordingly, we find in the clause of reservation that very matter expressly provided for, namely, the wastes above being affected and brought down by the working by the new mode in the seam. There would be no danger of their coming down except by the ordinary action of crumbling, or by the action of water, if there was any, which there does not seem to have been to any extent—but by the working below it was possible that the wastes might be brought down. Accordingly, in the feu which Mr Porteous took in 1859 there is not merely a reservation of minerals—not simply a right to work without being liable for damage—but an express provision with reference to any evil which might result from the giving way of the pillars above, in consequence of the workings which might take place under Mr Wilson's lease.

My Lords, it appears that the danger which was contemplated as possible has arisen. The fact has occurred that crushings have taken place in consequence of this mode of working below, and it is by reason of that that the damage has occurred of which the respondent complains, and which has extended itself to other houses in the neighbourhood—I think to the houses of persons of the names of Martin and M'Lachlan. It is plain to me that under this clause of reservation the parties protected themselves against that very and precise result which is now the subject of complaint on the part of the pursuers; and although I think that if there had been no such express reservation of the right to work without damage—if it had been merely a right to work the minerals, as occurred in the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Sprot, there would have been a clear ground for requiring this party to leave a proper support; yet where there is a stipulation such as we have here, introduced plainly on purpose to protect the mineral owner or his tenants from any consequences which might result either to buildings erected upon the surface, or to the surface itself, devoted to other purposes, by subsidence, I think it is impossible to deny effect to that clause; and I cannot see how effect can be given to that clause without rejecting the pleas of the respondent.

I see that it is said in the Lord Ordinary's judgment that it would be absurd (I think that is the expression) to suppose that it could have been in the contemplation of the parties that there was to be an obligation to rebuild, and an obligation to maintain houses—the feu being taken for the purpose of building—if it was to be in the power of the mineral owner to do that which would destroy the buildings. He says that there may have been some other injuries ("destroy" is the word used there) for which the mineral owner would not be liable, and against which he has protected himself. But his Lordship does not illustrate this, and I do not think that a greater or smaller amount of injury to the buildings would affect the principle of the case.

The ground upon which the majority of the Court below proceeded was a very broad one, namely, that the workings were not proper workings, and that they could not be proper workings, because they produced the result that is

complained of. I venture to think that that is a mode of reasoning in a circle. If the fact that they produced the injury is enough to determine the character of the workings as to whether they are proper workings or not, there is no effect given to this clause at all, and there is no occasion for going further into any examination of the contract. But I think that those words—"proper working," have reference, in the first place, mainly to the mineral owner. I think they are inserted principally for his sake, as between him and his tenant. But, also, I can conceive that there may be some very irregular proceedings which would be unnecessary for taking out the coal, and which would go further than merely taking out the coal, and cause injury of another kind, for which there would be no excuse under a reservation of the right to get the coal. But I do not see that there is any allegation here that the modern mode of working by stoop-and-room has not been pursued with all propriety by these tenants as far as the mode of working is concerned.

It is said, further, that it is impossible to suppose that the feuar would have taken the feu if the landlord or the mineral owner was to have the power to do what he purposes doing here. Now, we do not know all the circumstances under which the feu was granted. We do not know what was in the contemplation of Mr Porteous. Mr Porteous was probably not a good engineer, and he may have been under the belief that no working at that depth would affect the surface above; or, he may have been of opinion that it would not be carried to an extent which would affect the surface. At all events, he did not protect himself; but, on the contrary, the landlord protected himself against any consequences resulting from the working of the whole of the coal. If Mr Porteous was under any misapprehension of that kind, or, if he thought that the risk was so small that it was worth his while for a feu-duty of £5 a-year to have a house there until some unfortunate result should come at some distant period of time, I can easily comprehend it. He soon got rid of the matter, and then came his successor. Mr Porteous only had it for a short space of time. At all events, we cannot go into this question. We cannot tell the motives which influenced the parties—they had their own views of their interests, and they bargained freely.

I cannot concur in the view of one learned Judge in the Court below, that because the superior has protected himself against the claim for damages for working, therefore it is the more necessary to grant an interdict against his doing so. It does not appear to me that that is the right view of the case. I think the very stipulation of not being liable for damages contemplates the power of working so as to occasion injury, otherwise there was no use in making such a stipulation. Upon the whole, although I see that there is a strong ground for holding, in a case where the stipulation is not so clear as it is here, that the feu being made for the purpose of building, with an obligation to maintain buildings upon the property feued, the working must be consistent with that purpose, I do not see in a case like this, where the stipulation is express, that it is possible to get over it. I may say as to the obligation to rebuild, which seems to have been in the view of both parties, that I am not disposed to express any opinion upon the point. I am not quite prepared to say that the obligation to rebuild in a contract of this kind could be enforceable, That is not a question which it is necessary for us to decide, and I give no opinion upon it.

I therefore concur in the judgment.

IT was ordered and adjudged that the appellants be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action, with expenses in the Court of Session and the Sheriff-court; and that the expenses ordered to be paid by the Court below be repaid to them.

JAMES MACKINTOSH, Appellant.—Lord-Adv. Young—Asher.

day 19, 1873. Mackintosh v. Mackintosh's Trustees.

Heir and Executor—Tract of Future Time—Succession—Testament—Relief.—A person who was possessed of considerable property, both heritable and moveable, executed an entail of certain lands, binding himself, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, to free and relieve these lands of all his debts and obligations. Thereafter, by antenuptial contract of marriage, the entailer settled upon his spouse, in the event of her surviving him, an annuity secured over the entailed lands, but with power to himself, his heirs, executors, and successors, to purchase in lieu thereof an annuity from an insurance company, in which case the widow was bound to discharge the entailed estate. Held, on a construction of the two deeds (rev. judgment of the First Division), that the obligation in the first deed to relieve the entailed estate of the granter's debts and obligations applied to the annuity with which the estate was burdened by the second deed, and that the heir of entail was entitled to be relieved of the annuity out of the entailer's general trust-estate.

(IN the Court of Session March 2, 1870, ante, vol. viii. 628.)

In 1857 Mr James Mackintosh executed a deed of entail of his estate of Lamancha in favour of himself; whom failing, his eldest son James, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, &c. By this deed the heirs of entail were empowered to infeft their wives or husbands, and the wives or husbands of heirs-presumptive, in liferent annuities out of the rents of the lands, not exceeding a third part of the free rental, and to burden the estate with provisions for their younger children. The deed also contained a provision that in case adjudication should pass against the lands before disponed, or any part or portion thereof, for payment of any debt or claim affecting the same, or for payment of any public or other legal burdens, then and in every such case the heirs of entail respectively in possession for the time should be obliged to redeem such adjudication, and to disburden the said lands thereof, and that within three years from the date thereof; and in case of their failing so to redeem, they should respectively, for themselves, forfeit their right to the said lands. Further, the deed of entail contained the following clause, viz.:—"I oblige myself, and my heirs, executors, and representatives whatsoever, to free and relieve my lands before disponed of all my debts and obligations."

In addition to the entailed estate, Mr Mackintosh was possessed of property, both heritable and moveable, to a large amount; and in 1865 he executed a last will and settlement, whereby he conveyed the same to trustees and executors, whom he directed, as soon as convenient after his death, to make payment, without constitution, of the whole debts which might be due by him at the period of his death, and after payment of certain special bequests, to divide the residue of the trust-estate into six equal shares, whereof one-sixth was to be made over to his son James, another sixth to his son George, and the remaining four-sixths to be equally divided between his daughters Sarah and Emily.

By an antenuptial contract of marriage, dated 12th January 1867, between Mr Mackintosh and Miss Mary Ann Burn, he bound and obliged himself, his heirs, executors, and successors, to pay to his said spouse, in the event of her surviving him, inter alia, an annuity of £150, and a further annuity of £70 in the event of the marriage of his daughter Emily; and for further security and more sure payment of these provisions Mr Mackintosh bound and obliged himself, and his foresaids, "to infeft and seize the said Mary Ann Burn in the said free liferent annuity of £150 sterling, and also of the said yearly sum of £70 sterling, both payable, and with interest and penalties, as herein before and after written, to be uplifted and taken furth of All and Whole" the entailed lands of Lamancha: . . . . . "But declaring that it shall be in the option and power of the said James Mackintosh, and his heirs, executors, and successors, to secure the said annuity of £150 and yearly sum of £70 to the said Mary Ann Burn, by purchasing at his and their own expense, from any respectable insurance company to be selected and approved of by her, an annuity payable to her, the said Mary Ann Burn, in the terms before provided, equal in amount to the said annuity of £150, and yearly sum of £70 hereinbefore provided to her; and upon the purchase being effected and completed to her satisfaction, and the writs securing the same being delivered to her, she binds herself and the trustees after named, but at the expense of the said James Mackintosh and his foresaids, to discharge and disburden the several subjects and others before-mentioned and described of the said provisions secured over them as aforesaid." Mr Mackintosh was infeft in January 1867.

Mr Mackintosh died on the 17th February 1869, survived by the four children mentioned in his last will and settlement, who were the issue of his first marriage; and also by the said Mrs Mary Ann Burn or Mackintosh, who was his third wife.

Thereafter James Mackintosh, who succeeded his father as heir of entail in the estate of Lamancha, and the trustees acting under the last will and settlement of the deceased, presented a special case craving the judgment of the Court upon the following questions, viz.:—1st, Whether the heir of entail in possession of the estate of Lamancha was entitled to be relieved of the said annuities by the general trust-estate of the said deceased James Mackintosh, and to obtain repetition therefrom of such sums as he might have advanced in payment of said annuities? 2d, Whether the heir of entail was entitled to be relieved of certain rent-charges for money borrowed from the Enclosure Commissioners for improvements on the estate of Lamancha?

The First Division held that the heir was not entitled to be relieved of either of the annuities or of the rent-charges.

Mr Mackintosh appealed against the judgment upon the first question.

Lord Colonsay.—My Lords, this is an appeal from a part of a judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session, pronounced on a special case stated by the parties. Two questions were submitted to the Court for decision. The first is that to which the present appeal relates. The Court of Session found that the heir of entail was not entitled to the relief he asked.

That judgment was rested mainly on two grounds—1st, That by the law of Scotland, as a rule, a liferent annuity, or a debt secured on heritable estate, is to be borne by the heir succeeding to the heritage in the case of intestate succession; and that the same rule holds in the case of testate succession, unless a contrary intention is made to appear. 2d, That the clause in the entail on which the heir founds cannot in the circumstances be understood as applying to the particular annuities in question. The first of these propositions is admitted, but the appellant contends that a contrary intention is made to appear. The second proposition is disputed.

The late James Mackintosh of Lamancha left three deeds, which are referred to in the special case, viz.:—1st, Deed of entail of the estate of Lamancha, dated in 1857; 2d, Last will and settlement, dated in 1865; 3d, Contract of marriage with his third wife, dated in 1867.

The first of these deeds contains the clause on which the heir of entail mainly founds, and which is thus expressed:—"I oblige myself, my heirs, executors, and representatives whatsoever to free and relieve my lands before disponed of all my debts and obligations." The second of the said deeds conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, other than the estate of Lamancha, to certain trustees, and directed them to pay "the whole debts which may be due by me at the period of my death," and also to pay certain legacies and bequests, and to divide the residue into six shares, to be distributed in certain proportions among his four children, all of whom were by his first wife. It also contained a clause revoking "all wills and settlements executed by me at any time heretofore, excepting a disposition and deed of entail of my lands and estate of Lamancha, which shall stand and subsist in full force and effect."

The third of the said deeds made certain provisions in favour of his third wife, including the two annuities of £150 and £70 now in question, and for "her further security and more sure payment" of the said annuities he bound and obliged himself to infeft her in the estate of Lamancha. This deed also contains the following clause, on which the heir of entail founds:—"But declaring that it shall be in the option and power of the said James Mackintosh, and his heirs, executors, and successors, to secure the said annuity of £150 and yearly sum of £70 to the said Mary Ann Burn by purchasing at his and their own expense, from any respectable insurance company to be selected and approved of by her, an annuity payable to the said Mary Ann Burn in the terms before provided, equal in amount to the said annuity of £150 and yearly sum of £70 hereinbefore provided to her; and upon the purchase being effected and completed to her satisfaction, and the writs securing the same being delivered to her, she binds herself and the trustees after named, but at the expense of the said James Mackintosh and his foresaids, to discharge and disburden the several subjects and others before mentioned and described of the said provision secured over them as aforesaid."

In January 1867 Mrs Mackintosh was infeft in the estate of Lamancha on the contract of marriage. In February 1869 Mr Mackintosh died without having exercised the said option.

It appears from the special case that the rental of the entailed estate was about £700 per annum, and that the public, parochial, and other burdens payable by the proprietor amounted to £100 per annum. It also appears that the general trust-estate comprehended a house in Charlotte Square, Edinburgh, heritable and personal estate in Calcutta of considerable amount, and personal estate in Britain exceeding £27,000; and that the two-sixths of his estate falling to the share of each of his daughters will be "more than £10,000, and less than £20,000."

The heir of entail now claims to be relieved of the annuities by the general trust-estate. I am of opinion that he is entitled to be so relieved.

The clause in the entail was certainly intended to impose an obligation somewhere to free and relieve the estate of Lamancha of all Mr Mackintosh's debts and obligations, and I have no doubt that it was meant to extend to future debts and obligations. The words are quite general, and the Judges in the Court below appear not to have attached importance to the circumstance that the obligation in question was contracted at a date subsequent to the entail. Indeed it does not appear, and is not alleged, that at the date of the entail there existed any debt or obligation, and if there was none the clause must have been intended to apply to future debts and obligations. The purpose of it appears to have been that the estate of Lamancha should be launched under the entail free from debt; and the conception of the clause appears to have been, not with the view of effect being given to the ordinary rule of law as between heir and executor, but with the view of making a special arrangement because of the entail. The ordinary rule of law as between heir and executor in regard to the incidence of debt is founded on the presumption that the heritage is capable of bearing all the burdens incident to it. The heir who succeeds to it, if he is not fettered, can deal with it as he pleases, and turn it to the best account for his own relief. But if he is only to be put into possession under the fetters of an entail his condition will be materially different, and if the entailer intends that the estate he is entailing should be started free from debt it is quite reasonable that he should make provision for doing so out of his other means, and the more so if his other means are ample, as in this case they are said to be.

The obligation to free and relieve Lamancha was imposed by the entailer on himself, his heirs, executors, and representatives whatsoever. That appears to have been with him a primary or leading object. If he had himself redeemed the obligation he must have done so out of his general estate, which would have been to that extent diminished. Not having done so, on what part of his estate did he intend that the obligation to relieve should devolve. It could not be on the estate of Lamancha, because that was the estate to be relieved. His only other estate was the general estate; therefore, if the relief was to be given by him or by his estate it was to be given out of his general estate.

It appears to me that this view is supported by the terms of the trust-settlement. It is true that in the general case a direction to trustees in a mortis causa trust-deed to pay the debts of the deceased does not of itself imply any deviation from the general rule of law as to the incidence of heritable and moveable debts. But an expressed intention to start an incipient entail, or to add other lands to an existing entail, introduces another element, and gives rise to other considerations, leading to the inference that the testator intended the lands so dealt with to be cleared of debt, even if there was no express declaration to that effect, as the continued existence of debt on these lands might result in defeating the object of the entail.

Here there is the declaration, or rather the obligation, of the testator himself in the deed of entail, which is referred to in the trust-deed as forming part of his settlement, and he directs his trustees to pay all his debts, to record the entail, and to put the heir into possession of Lamancha under and in virtue of the deed of entail.

Taking these two deeds together, I do not doubt that Mr Mackintosh's intention was that the estate of Lamancha should be freed and relieved out of his general estate, unless there are special grounds for holding that the particular annuities in question are not within the range of the debts and obligations to which the clause in the entail has reference.

Up to the time when the trust-settlement was executed there did not, so far as we see, exist any debt that would have affected Lamancha according to the ordinary rule of law as between heir and executor. But then came the marriage-contract, by which a security over Lamancha was given to the lady for the annuities in question, and by the same deed Mr Mackintosh reserved to himself, his heirs, executors, and successors, the option and power to purchase for the lady, from any respectable insurance company to be approved of by her, an annuity equal to those in question, and she bound herself thereupon to discharge the security over Lamancha, and disburden that estate thereof.

Upon this deed several observations have been made. First, it has been observed that the burden it imposed was subsequent to the date of the entail. I have already shewn that this circumstance is immaterial, and may be dismissed. Secondly, an observation to which some importance appears to have been attached in the Court below was, that as Mr Mackintosh was wealthy and could have provided for his widow otherwise, it is difficult to understand why he should have imposed the burden on the entailed estate if he intended it to be borne by his general estate. I am not much moved by that observation. It may be that Mr Mackintosh could have provided for his widow by placing funds in the hands of trustees for that purpose, or by coming under obligation to do so, or to provide her with a jointure. But we do not know how his funds were employed at that time. He may not have been disposed to disturb his investments, or to lock up funds in the hands of his trustees. The lady or her advisers may have preferred immediate substantial security over Lamancha to an obligation de futuro to be implemented out of floating capital. Thirdly, it was contended, and that appears to have been the main ground of judgment in the Court below, that the annuities secured over Lamancha are not a debt, or at least are not a debt in the sense of the clause in the entail; that they are not a capital sum due which might be at once paid off, but are a continuous security over the rents for the termly annuities as they fall due, and similar to the right which the present or future heirs of entail would have to make provision for their widows under the Aberdeen Act, or under the powers given by the entail, which are similar to those of the Aberdeen Act. I am not satisfied with that view. The clause of relief in the entail applies to "all my debts and obligations." I am of opinion that these annuities constitute a debt in the ordinary sense of the word. They are a debt in which the widow is the creditor, and the representatives of Mr

May 19, 1873. Mackintosh v. Mackintosh's Trustees.

Mackintosh are the debtors, and for payment of which the estate of Lamancha may be attached unless the relief sought be given. But whatever ingenious criticism may be made on the word "debts," it is impossible to escape the generality of the word "obligations." Neither can the obligation be assimilated to a provision under the Aberdeen Act. It does not profess to be anything of the kind. It has none of the requisite conditions or limitations as to amount or liability or mode of recovery. The only similarity is that it is a provision for a widow. Nor does the circumstance that it is an obligation for an annuity, and not for a capital sum, appear to me to raise any practical difficulty. The clause in the marriage-contract provided for and sufficiently meets any difficulty of that kind that might have been raised. It reserves the power to relieve the lands, and prescribes the mode. The only question is as to the incidence of the obligation, and I would here again observe that at the very moment of imposing the burden on Lamancha Mr Mackintosh had in contemplation the removal of it by himself or his representatives, and must have intended the relief to come, not out of Lamancha, but out of his other means—that is to say, out of the general estate. The respondents say that they cannot purchase an annuity, as no direct power to do so is conferred on them by the trust-deed. But if I am right in holding that the clause of relief in the entail was intended to attach to the general estate, it follows that the power reserved in the marriage-contract may be exercised by the respondents as the trustees of that estate. They also say that they have no interest in purchasing an annuity, which would be an expensive proceeding. The same observation would apply to the appellant. But if the obligation to relieve Lamancha has devolved on the general estate, the respondents must give the relief in the mode provided, unless they can find a less expensive and equally effectual mode of doing so.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Court of Session, of date 2d March 1870, in so far as appealed from, should be reversed, and that judgment should be pronounced in terms of the third of the alternative forms set forth in the joint case, in so far as regards the subject-matter of this appeal. If your Lordships concur in the view that I have expressed it may be a question whether there ought not to be a remit to the Court of Session, because a decerniture may be required upon which proceedings may be taken. Perhaps the parties will consider that.

Lord Chelmsford.—My Lords, I agree in the motion that has been made.

"It is ordered and adjudged . . . that the said interlocutor . . . of the First Division of 2d March 1870, in so far as complained of in the said appeal, be and the same is hereby reversed; and this House doth find and declare that the appellant, James Mackintosh, as heir of entail of the estate of Grange called Romanno Grange or Lamancha, is entitled to repetition of" . . . (sums paid by him to Mrs Mackintosh, widow of the late James Mackintosh, on account of her annuity and additional annuity), "out of the estate falling under the last will and settlement of the said deceased James Mackintosh, . . . and to be relieved out of the last mentioned estate of all payments to accrue due hereafter in respect of said annuities; and further, that the executors and trustees of the said deceased James Mackintosh are bound, at the expense of the said last mentioned estate, to obtain from Mrs Mackintosh, and register in the Register of Sasines, a proper and valid discharge and renunciation of said annuities in favour of Mr James Mackintosh and the heirs of entail, and disburdening the same of the said annuities"—[Here followed corresponding decernitures]—"and cause remitted to the Court of Session to do herein as shall be just, and consistent with these findings and declarations, and this judgment."

General Disposition—Special Destination—Presumption—Entail—Institute.—A lady in possession of an entailed estate, to which she had succeeded as institute, executed a disposition and settlement whereby she specially conveyed to her nephew certain lands of which she was the fee-simple proprietrix, and generally her whole estates, heritable and moveable. After her death it was ascertained that the fettering clauses of the entail were directed merely against "the heirs of entail or substitutes" therein mentioned, and an action was raised by her disponee to have it declared that, as institute, she was not bound by the fetters, but was absolute fiar of the entailed estate, and that the same was carried to him by the general conveyance in her disposition and settlement. Held (aff. judgment of Court of Session) (1) that the fettering clauses of the entail did not include the institute, and that, as fiar, she had power to dispose of the estate; but (2) that the general conveyance in her settlement did not carry the entailed lands.

Opinion (per Lord Chancellor) that general words, purporting to dispose of a man's whole property, in a will or mortis causa deed, are (unless there be something in the instrument itself to control that presumption) to be understood as applicable only to property the succession to which, after the death of the testator, is not already regulated by a special destination to a particular class of heirs in a prior instrument, either made by the settlor himself, or under which he holds.

Observations on the cases of Campbell v. Campbell, H.L., M. 14,855, and 1 Pat. 343; Farquharson v. Farquharson, M. 2290; Thoms v. Thoms, ante, vol. vi. p. 704.

Observations (per Lord Chancellor) on the admissibility of extrinsic evidence by the law of Scotland in the construction of testamentary deeds.

Observed (per Lord Colonsay) that from the cases on the effect of a general disposition in evacuating or superseding prior destinations of heritage the following inferences are deducible:—(1) That in determining what effect should be given to the words of general disposition the question has always been treated as one of presumption or presumed intention; (2) that a general disposition mortis causa does not derogate from a prior special destination, unless it be made clear that it was intended so to do; (3) that in dealing with such cases the Court has taken into consideration circumstances calculated to throw light on the intention or purpose of the testator, whether found within the deed or collected from external sources.

Question (per Lord Colonsay) whether a letter written by a testator after the date of his settlement may be referred to as extrinsic evidence in its construction.

(IN the Court of Session July 20, 1870, ante, vol. viii. 1075.)

Ld. Chancellor (Selborne). Ld. Chelmsford. Ld. Colonsay.

William Glendonwyn, proprietor of the estate of Parton, in Kircudbright, had three daughters, viz., (1) Mary Lucy Elizabeth, married to Sir James Gordon of Letterfourie; (2) Xaveria, who was never married; and (3) Ismene, who was married to Mr William Scott.

In 1809 William Glendonwyn sold his estates to his son-in-law, Mr Scott, but after his death, which happened shortly afterwards, his daughter, Lady Gordon, brought an action to reduce the sale, in which, however, she proved unsuccessful. Mr Scott's affairs subsequently became greatly embarrassed, and the estate of Parton was brought to a judicial sale in three lots viz., (1) the lands of Cowgarth and others; (2) Parton Place; (3) Boreland. The first of these lots was purchased by Mr Frederick Maxwell, who was married to a sister of Mr William Glendonwyn; and the second and third lots were acquired by Miss Xaveria Glendonwyn.

In 1821 Mr Frederick Maxwell executed a deed of entail, recorded in 1824, whereby "for certain good causes and considerations, in the event of my decease without heirs of my own body," he conveyed the lands of Cowgarth and others, which he had acquired at the judicial sale of the Parton estate, and also certain other lands which he had puchased subsequently, "to and in favour of Agnes Glendonwyn or Maxwell, my wife, in liferent, during all the days of her life, and, after her decease, to Xaveria Glendonwyn, second daughter of the deceased William Glendonwyn of Parton, and the heirs whatsoever of her body; whom failing," &c.

The first condition of the entail immediately followed the destination, and was in these terms:—"That the said Xaveria Glendonwyn, and the whole heirs of entail and substitutes above written, shall be bound and obliged to bear and retain the sirname of Glendonwyn, after their obtaining possession of the said lands and estate, in virtue hereof, along with their other sirname, arms, and designation."

This condition was followed by others, and by prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses, all of which were throughout made binding "upon the heirs of entail or substitutes above specified." By the said deed the entailer resigned the lands thereby conveyed into the hands of the superiors, of whom the same were held, for new infeftment to be granted "to the said Agnes Glendonwyn or Maxwell, in liferent as aforesaid, and to the said Xaveria Glendonwyn, and the other heirs and substitutes particularly above mentioned in fee."

By the precept of sasine infeftment was directed to be given to "the said Agnes Glendonwyn or Maxwell in liferent, during all the days of her life, and after her decease to the said Xaveria Glendonwyn, and the other heirs of entail and substitutes above-named in fee."

Mr Maxwell, the entailer, died without issue in 1823. He was survived by his widow, the liferentrix under the entail, who was not infeft, but possessed the entailed lands until 1835, when she died. At her death Miss Xaveria Glendonwyn entered into possession of the estate. She was infeft in 1842, and possessed the estates until her death in 1858.

In 1834 Miss Xaveria executed a disposition and settlement, whereby she conveyd to her nephew, Frederick James Scott (son of her sister Ismene), "all and sundry lands and heritages, debts, heritable and moveable, heirship moveables, and whole goods and gear, sums of money, and effects, and, in general, my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, of whatever nature or denomination, or wherever situated, presently belonging or which shall belong to me at the time of my death, with the whole vouchers, instructions, and conveyances of the said debts, and the writs and evidents of my said heritable estate." Then followed, "without prejudice to the said generality," a conveyance to the said Frederick James Scott of "All and Whole my estate of Parton," setting forth those parts of that estate which Miss Glendonwyn had acquired at the judicial sale above-mentioned, with a declaration that the disponee should, as a condition of the grant, assume and use the sirname, arms, and armorial bearings of Glendonwyn of Parton, and should pay all the granter's debts, &c., and certain special legacies.

In 1859 Sir Robert Glendonwyn Gordon of Letterfourie, Miss Xaveria's nephew (son of her eldest sister), and the person next called to the succession by the deed of entail of 1825, expede a service as heir of tailzie and provision to her in the entailed estates.

In 1860 Mr Frederick James Scott died intestate, leaving an only child William R. D. Scott Glendonwyn, a minor, who, with his curator, raise the present action against Sir Robert Glendonwyn Gordon, and the substitute heirs called to the succession under the foresaid deed of entail 1825, concluding to have it declared (1) that the fettering clauses of t entail of 1823 were not directed against Miss Xaveria Glendonwyn, the institute or conditional institute, but only against the heirs of entail or substitutes; (2) that Miss Glendonwyn was the absolute fiar of the estate conveyed by the entail; (3) that by her disposition and settlement of 1834 she had conveyed the same to the pursuer's father, Frederick James Scott; and (4) that the estate should be decerned to belong to the pursuer, who was duly served nearest and lawful heir of his father. The summons also contained conclusions for reducing the service expede by the defender, Sir Robert Gordon, and for count and reckoning.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) Under the terms of the disposition and deed of entail, dated 5th March 1821, executed by Frederick Maxwell, Esq. of Milnhead, the said Xaveria Glendonwyn was the institute or conditional institute, and the prohibitions, clauses irritant and resolutive, contained in the said entail, were not directed against and did not affect the said Xaveria Glendonwyn. (2) On a sound construction of the said deed of entail the said Xaveria Glendonwyn was not restrained from selling, alienating, or burdening the lands therein contained, or from altering the order of succession thereto, but was entitled to dispose thereof as absolute fiar. (3) By disposition and settlement executed by the said Xaveria Glendonwyn she effectually conveyed the whole of the lands and others contained in the said deed of entail to the said Frederick James Glendonwyn, and he, on surviving the said Xaveria Glendonwyn, became absolute fiar thereof; and the right thereto, and to the whole rents and profits thereof, bygone and future, is now vested in the pursuer in virtue of the writs libelled. (4) The pursuer is entitled to make up titles to the said lands and others in his person, as absolute and unconditional fiar, omni habili modo, and to dispose of the lands at pleasure. (5) The pursuer is entitled to reduce and set aside the decree of special service, and all other titles to the said lands made up by the defender, in respect the defender has no right to the lands, the same having been validly conveyed by the said Xaveria Glendonwyn, and the destination thereto validly evacuated.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer has no title to sue and maintain the present action. (2) The deceased Miss Xaveria Glendonwyn succeeded to and possessed the entailed lands and estate in question under and in virtue of the disposition and deed of entail executed by Mr Frederick Maxwell, and the prohibitions, and clauses irritant and resolutive, contained therein were well and properly directed against her and the other heirs of entail, and prevented her from disponing or conveying the said estate. (3) The said entail being a valid and effectual entail in terms of the Act 1685, the said Miss Xaveria Glendonwyn was not entitled to alter the order of succession of the heirs called to the lands and estate thereby conveyed, or to alienate or convey the said lands and estates. (4) The said deed of entail was at all events a valid and effectual entail to the effect of excluding all gratuitous alienations by the said Xaveria Glendonwyn. (5) The deed of settlement said to have been executed by Miss Xaveria Glendonwyn was not intended to convey, and did not effectually convey, the said entailed lands and estate to the disponee named therein. (6) The said deed was ineffectual to alter the order of succession contained in the deed of entail under which the said entailed lands and estate were held by Miss Glendonwyn. (7) The said Xaveria Glendonwyn having, from the date of the entailer's death down to her own death, as well prior as subsequent to the date of her succession to the said entailed lands and estate, understood and believed that the same were strictly entailed, and that she was entitled to succeed to, and after her succession that she possessed the same as heiress of entail, and that upon her death they descended to the defender as next heir of entail, and having throughout her life dealt with the same, and acted and transacted on that footing, she neither conveyed nor intended to convey the same by the disposition and deed of settlement executed by her and founded on by the pursuer.

A great deal of correspondence and a number of deeds were produced by the defenders, with the object of shewing that Miss Glendonwyn had invariably regarded Sir Robert Gordon as the person who was entitled to succeed her as heir of entail, and that she considered herself as heiress of entail, and as having only a life interest in the entailed estate. In particular, it appeared that in the years 1850, 1851, and 1855, she had entered into transactions for borrowing money on the security of the rents of the entailed lands, and that in the bonds which she granted in security of the loans she expressly guarded herself against incurring an irritancy by contravening the prohibitions of the entail. [The terms of these deeds will be found quoted in the opinion of the Lord President.[1]]

It also appeared that in 1856 Miss Glendonwyn became a party to a deed of translation of a debt due by the entailer, which she recognised as being a heritable burden on the estate.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, 1st, That under a sound construction of the disposition and deed of entail dated 5th March 1821, which was executed by the deceased Frederick Maxwell, and is set forth and referred to in the first four articles of the revised condescendence, the respective prohibitions therein contained against alteration of the order of succession, and against alienation and contraction of debt, are not directed against or applicable to Xaveria Glendonwyn, who is named in the record, and who was the institute in the fee of the lands and estate disponed under the said disposition and deed of entail, and that the said prohibitions are not so framed as, in point of law, to operate as effectual prohibitions against, or as a bar to the exercise by her, of the ordinary powers of alienation and disposition competent to the proprietor of lands, or other the like heritable subjects, held under a fee-simple and unlimited title; 2d, that the defenders have failed to prove facts relevant and sufficient to establish that it was not the intention of the said Xaveria Glendonwyn to convey to and in favour of the now deceased Frederick James Scott, the father of the pursuer, the said lands and estate by and under the disposition and settlement executed by her, which is dated on the 22d February 1834, and of which No. 8 of process is an extract; and 3dly, With reference to the preceding findings, sustains the first five pleas in law set forth on the part of the pursuer, and repels the first seven pleas for the defenders; and appoints the cause to be enrolled that parties may be heard as to the application of the present interlocutor to the conclusions of the summons, and in regard to further procedure in the action, reserving meanwhile the matter of expenses."

The First Division, on 19th July 1870, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor, sustain the 5th plea in law for the defenders, and in respect thereof assoilzie the defenders," &c.

Glendonwyn v. Gordon, &c.

LORD COLONSAY.—My Lords, in the year 1809 William Glendonwyn sold his estate of Parton to William Scott, who was the husband of Mr Glendonwyn's youngest daughter. The affairs of William Scott having become embarrassed, the estate of Parton was in 1819 judicially exposed to sale in three lots. One of these, called the Cowgarth lot, was purchased by Frederick Maxwell, who was married to a sister of William Glendonwyn. Another, called the Parton Place lot, was purchased by Xaveria Glendonwyn, who was the second daughter of William Glendonwyn. She also acquired the third lot called the Boreland lot.

On the 5th of March 1821 Frederick Maxwell executed a deed of entail of the Cowgarth lot and other lands belonging to him, forming together the Cowgarth estate. By that deed he disponed the estate to his wife in liferent, and after her decease to Xaveria Glendonwyn and the heirs whatsoever of her body; whom failing, to the second son of Sir James Gordon of Letterfourie by his then spouse, who was the elder sister of Xaveria, and the heirs whatsoever of his body; whom failing, to the immediate younger sons of the said Sir James Gordon by his said spouse, in their order of seniority, and the respective heirs whatsoever of their bodies; whom failing, to the daughters of Sir James and his said spouse, and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies; whom failing, to Ismene Glendonwyn, spouse of William Scott formerly of Parton, and the heirs whatsoever of her body; whom failing, to certain other substitutes.

In 1823 Frederick Maxwell died, and in February 1824 the entail was recorded in the Register of Tailzies on a petition by his widow, the liferentrix, who possessed the estate till 1835, when she died, and Xaveria, the institute, entered into possession, and in March 1842 completed her feudal title by taking infeftment on the deed of entail. She continued to possess the estate on that title until her death in October 1858.

In May 1859 the respondent, who was the fourth son of the foresaid Sir James Gordon, expede a special service as nearest and lawful heir of tailzie and provision in special to the deceased Xaveria in the said estate of Cowgarth. He entered into possession, and he continues to possess that estate as being heir of entail under the deed of 1821.

Xaveria left a disposition and settlement, of date 22d February 1834, whereby she disponed to and in favour of her nephew, Frederick James Scott, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, all and sundry lands and heritages, debts, goods, gear, sums of money, and effects, and in general her whole means and estate, of whatever nature, then belonging or which should belong to her at the time of her death, "and particularly, without prejudice to the said generality," "all and whole my estate of Parton, described in the title deeds as following, viz:"—Then follows a description of the Parton Place lot, and of the Boreland lot, but no mention is made of the Cowgarth estate. In virtue of that deed Frederick James Scott entered into possession of the lands described in his aunt's settlement and of her moveable estate, and assumed the name of Glendonwyn. He died in January 1860 intestate, leaving an only child, the appellant, who was then in pupillarity.

In December 1860 the estates of the said Frederick James Scott Glendonwyn were sequestrated, and a trustee was appointed. Funds having been realised sufficient to satisfy the creditors, the sequestrated estates, so far as not realised by the trustee for payment of the debts, were in August 1862 restored to the appellant as heir of his father. It does not appear that in these proceedings any mention was made of the estate of Cowgarth, but there can be no doubt that whatever right the appellant's father had to that estate now belongs to the appellant. In May 1865 the appellant, with consent of his curators, raised the present action of declarator and reduction against the respondent and certain other persons, substitutes called to the succession by the entail of 1821. The object of the action is to have it declared that the fetters of the entail of 1821 did not apply to Xaveria, the institute, that she was therefore unlimited owner, having full power to dispose of the estate of Cowgarth, and that she did dispose of it effectually by her disposition and settlement in favour of the appellant's father. Reductive conclusions are added for the purpose of setting aside the title made up by the respondent, if that be necessary. There are also subsidiary conclusions for accounting and payment.

The grounds of defence maintained against the declaratory conclusions are in substance, 1st, That the fetters of the entail were effectually directed against Xaveria, and prevented her from disponing or conveying the estate; 2d, That the deed of settlement executed by her was not intended to convey, and did not effectually convey, the entailed lands and estate to the disponee therein named.

As regards the first of these grounds of defence I am of opinion that it cannot be sustained. Xaveria was the institute or direct disponee as distinguished from the "heirs of entail and substitutes." Ever since the case of Edmonstone v. Edmonstone, decided in the House of Lords, 15th April 1771, it has been held as settled that where the fettering clauses in a strict entail are directed against the heirs of entail merely these terms do not include the institute, as he is a disponee and not an heir of entail, and ought not by implication from other parts of the deed of entail to be construed within the fetters laid only on the heirs of entail. In the present case the fetters, that is to say, the prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses, are in terms laid on the "heirs of entail and substitutes" merely; and consequently the rule established in the case of Edmonstone applies.

It is true that in other parts of the deed, such as the obligation to infeft, and the procuratory of resignation, and the precept of sasine, we find such expressions as "the said Xaveria Glendonwyn and the other heirs of tailzie above named," or, "and the other heirs and substitutes above mentioned," from which it has been argued that, according to a sound construction af the deed, Xaveria was to be regarded as one of the heirs of entail, and consequently not exempt from the fetters which are laid on the whole heirs of entail. But, in the first place, the clauses referred to are not any of the fettering clauses,—they are merely part of the machinery provided for enabling any of the parties favoured by the deed to take infeftment, and, in the second place, to hold that such loose expressions could have the effect of converting the institute, who is a direct disponee, into an heir of entail or substitute, or of extending to her by inference the fetters which, according to the terms of the fettering clauses themselves, apply only to the heirs of entail or substitute, would be to do violence to the principle of the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Edmonstone, and of several cases subsequently decided on the same principle.

The second ground of defence raises a question of a totally different kind, and as to which we have not so much direct guidance from authority. It requires very careful consideration. It assumes that Xaveria was not under the fetters of the entail, and consequently had full power over the estate of Cowgarth, and could give it to whom she pleased. Did she, by the general words in her settlement of 1834, give to Frederick James Scott a right to that estate to the exclusion of the heir of the existing destination in the deed of entail by which she, as institute, got and held the estate? Was that destination thereby evacuated, and the estates of Cowgarth put into a different line of descent? That depends on the effect to be given to a clause of general disposition occurring in such a deed of settlement when brought into competition with an earlier deed containing a special destination of a particular estate, and that again may depend more or less on the circumstances of the case, the rule of the law of Scotland in regard to heritable property being that a destination once made is not easily presumed to be altered or innovated.

There are two classes of cases in which the question may arise. One class of cases is where a person having made a deed containing a special destination of a particular estate, or having chosen to take a conveyance of an estate to himself with a special destination, makes a disposition and settlement in general terms of his whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, with a different destination, but without expressly revoking or altering the first deed, or making mention of it, or of the estate with which it dealt. Of this class there are several cases reported, mostly under the head "Presumption," some of which are referred to in the papers in this case. I think that out of the whole series of cases of this class, reported during the last two centuries or more, the following inferences are deducible:—(1) That in determining what effect should be given to the words of general disposition the question has always been treated as one of presumption or presumed intention; (2) that a general disposition mortis causa does not derogate from a prior special destination, unless it be made clear that it was intended so to do; (3) that in dealing with such cases the Court has taken into consideration circumstances calculated to throw light on the intention or purpose of the testator, whether found within the deed or collected from external sources.

I may notice that in this class of cases there is this element, that the fact of the prior deed having been found in the repositories of the deceased without having been expressly revoked or altered may be regarded as favouring a presumption that, although the general disposition was expressed in terms which, according to their natural and ordinary meaning, would comprehend the particular property which formed the subject of the prior deed, such was not the purpose for which they were used, or the effect the testator intended should be given to them, but, on the contrary, that notwithstanding the unlimited terms of the later general disposition his intention was that the prior deed should nevertheless subsist and be taken as part of his settlement to the effect of regulating the succession to the particular property therein contained. But it does not appear that the attention of the Court was confined to that view as necessarily conclusive, or that external circumstances were excluded from consideration for the purpose of rebutting or supporting the legal presumption that the general disposition was not intended to derogate from the prior destination.

Another class of cases is that to which the present may be said to belong, viz., —where the person who made the general disposition and settlement was not the maker of the prior deed containing the special destination of the particular estate, but had unlimited power to evacuate the destination, and deal with the estate at pleasure. The cases of this class are less numerous than those of the former class, probably because parties intending to evacuate the destination of the deed under which the estate had come to them adopted the more appropriate and unquestionable mode of doing so. But in this class also, the cases that have occurred have been treated as questions of presumption or presumed intention. There has indeed of late been difference of opinion as to whether the mere existence of the previous destination unaltered does, without aid from other circumstances, raise in this class of cases a presumption that the general words were not intended to apply to the particular estate so previously destined. But there does not appear ever to have been any difference of opinion as to the competency of resorting to external circumstances, going to shew that the general disposition, notwithstanding the comprehensiveness of the language, was not meant or intended to displace the prior special destination.

In the case of Campbell v. Campbell, decided in the Court of Session in 1740, and in the House of Lords in 1743 (1 Paton, 343), two questions were raised. Both are reported in the second volume of Lord Kames's remarkable decisions, but under different heads, one under the head "Substitute and Conditional Institute," the other under the head "Presumption." The latter is that which relates to the question raised in the present case, viz., the effect to be given to a general disposition in competition with a special destination by the party from whom the property came to the maker of the general disposition. The Court of Session decided that the general disposition did not destroy the special destination, and that judgment was affirmed by the House of Lords. One ground appears to have been that the general disposition was made before the maker of it had right to the estate in question, and that he died before he could have been aware that such right had devolved upon him. It was not, however, disputed that the words of the general disposition were sufficient to comprehend the estate, and must have carried it if there had not been a special destination of it. The estate there in question consisted of moveable property, and it appears to have been suggested about half a century afterwards that the judgment may have proceeded on the ground that the right to the moveables had not vested in the maker of the general disposition, as he had not expede confirmation. But with all respect for the quarter from whence that suggestion is said to have come I cannot accept it as satisfactory. It is not borne out by the report of the case in the printed papers; on the contrary, it appears from these that the right was assumed to have vested; nor is that wonderful, seeing that the will which contained the destination was itself a general settlement, and at that time, or until 1784, it had not been decided that a right to moveables under a general disposition required confirmation any more than a special legacy. The second reason in the paper for the respondent in the case of Campbell brings out the point that was really in controversy, and was decided against the general disponee on this branch of the case.

The point again came up in the case of Farquharson (6 Paton, 724), and there also the decision was against the party who claimed under the general disposition. The words of the general disposition were, as indeed they always are, sufficiently comprehensive to embrace everything if so intended. But it was maintained that they were not intended to apply to the particular estates in question, and in support of that contention various pregnant external circumstances, including actings of the party himself with reference to the estates in question and other estates, were founded on as sufficient to satisfy the Court that the general words should not be read in the broad sense in which perhaps they might have been read if there had been no such light to guide the Court.

The point is said to have come up again in the case of Leitch (3 Wilson and Shaw, 366). But that it really did so has been questioned by high authority, and upon grounds that have not been met. The circumstances of the case were somewhat involved, and the main controversy was certainly not upon the point now under consideration, but upon the question whether any right in the fee of the estate of Kilinerdinny vested in Andrew Leitch during the incumbency of a liferentrix whom he had predeceased. The estate was held under a trust-deed for behoof of a liferentrix and certain parties successivè, conditional institutes, in whose favour the trustees were to denude in certain events. The trust-deed was so peculiar, and so inartistically framed, that one of the Judges declared he had never seen the like of it. On the part of the general disponees of Andrew Leitch it was contended that Andrew was the institute for whose behoof the trustees held the estate, and in whom the fee had vested, although they could not give him the beneficial enjoyment during the incumbency of the liferentrix. On the other hand it was keenly contended that no right had vested in Andrew, and consequently that his general disposition could not confer any right on his disponees. After much discussion, and much difference of opinion on the bench, it was decided that a right to the fee had vested in Andrew. That point having been settled, judgment was given in favour of his disponees, and apparently without further contention or observation in the Court below. It does, however, appear that in the House of Lords, besides the main subject of controversy already mentioned, a secondary reason of appeal stated was that "Andrew's general conveyance not referring specifically to the lands of Kilinerdinny cannot exclude the subsequent substitution in John's disposition of that estate." It also appears that the point so stated was not in that case thought to be deserving of much attention.

It has, however, been observed by Judges of high authority that the circumstances of that case are not such as would have admitted of the application of the principle on which alone such a plea could have been maintained, inasmuch as the import of the direction in the trust-deed was to create not an entail or substitution of heirs, but merely a series of conditional institutions; that the fee which was held to have vested in Andrew was an unqualified fee with no substitution in favour of any other person, but only a conditional institution; that the succession having come to him, he had a jus crediti which he could assign, or which, if he had died intestate, would have gone to his own heirs-at-law, and not to any conditional institute under the deed. This may well account for the zeal with which the question of vesting was contested, and the subsequent apparent indifference or disregard with which the secondary plea was treated, notwithstanding the previous cases in which it had been successfully maintained.

In other respects that case differed from the present. In the first place, Andrew Leitch had no feudal investiture in the estate; he had a personal right, or jus crediti, entitling him to require the trustees of John to denude in his favour in terms of the trust-deed. The appropriate mode of transmitting that species of right was by assignation or disposition and assignation. He could not have granted warrant for feudal investiture. Secondly, there was no suggestion of any circumstance to indicate that the words of the general disposition were not intended to be read and applied in their most comprehensive sense.

The recent case of Thoms v. Thoms in the Court of Session, referred to by the appellant, is the most favourable to this view, and it comes nearest to the present case, in this respect, that the maker of the general disposition was the institute in a deed of entail the fetters of which did not apply to him. That case was fully considered by the whole Court, and the judgment pronounced in accordance with the views of a large majority gave effect to the general disposition. That judgment appears to have proceeded on the ground that in this class of cases the comprehensive terms of the general disposition were to be held presumably as superseding or displacing the previous destination in the absence of any circumstances leading satisfactorily to the conclusion that they were not so intended. No such circumstances, either within the general disposition, or without it, were substantiated in the case of Thoms. The substitute heir of entail limited his proof to the deeds themselves, and to a letter which he tendered, but which does not appear to have been admitted, or at all conclusive if it had been admissible. But even the Judges composing the majority recognised as a general principle that each case is circumstantial, and "ruled by its own specialties," and one of them illustrated the principle by reference to the case of Farquharson, already noticed. That principle was afterwards acted upon in the present case by three of the Judges who composed the majority in the case of Thoms.

The case of Thoms is, I believe, the first case in which it has been held that a general disposition was to be presumed to be in derogation of a destination by substitution contained in the deed under which the particular estate had been acquired and possessed, unless the case of Leitch was a decision to that effect, which I do not think it was. The judgment in the case of Thoms was not appealed, and is not binding on this House, and I may, without disrespect to the learned Judges who composed the majority in that case, be permitted to doubt the soundness of the proposition that in this class of cases the general disposition is to be held presumably as superseding or displacing the previous destination. Without at present discussing that debateable proposition, it not being in my view of this case necessary that I should do so, but guarding myself against being held as assenting to it, I go on to observe that the judgment of the majority in the case of Thoms was given subject to this necessary qualification, that reference might be made to circumstances outside the deed to rebut the presumption, and that each case is circumstantial, and to be ruled by its own specialties. In the case of Thoms there were no circumstances or specialties, and judgment went in favour of the general disponee. The present case is in that respect different. There are circumstances and specialties which have been held sufficient to rebut the supposed presumption, and judgment has gone against the general disponee. In that view the two decisions are reconcileable, but upon a principle which makes it necessary to consider the circumstances to which effect has been given.

In my opinion the circumstances in this case that may be legitimately referred to are quite sufficient to rebut the supposed presumption, and to shew that the general clause in Xaveria's disposition was not meant to include the estate of Cowgarth, or to disturb the course of succession prescribed by the entail of that estate. I have no doubt that for this purpose her mode of dealing with the estate of Cowgarth may legitimately be referred to; and I think that in that alone, apart from everything else, we have enough to shew clearly that it was not her meaning or intention that the general clause should apply to that estate. In the first place, she not only did not convey it formally as she did the other two lots, but she did not even mention it by name in any mortis causa deed, as she might naturally have been expected to do in reference to an estate of so much importance. That is itself significant. But, secondly, after she had made her general settlement, and down to within a comparatively short period of her death, she, in various matters of importance, in formal deeds, dealt with that estate as one which, in her view, and according to her own understanding of her settlement, was not to go to her general disponee, but was to continue under the existing destination in the line of descent pointed out by the entail. That I hold to be beyond question, and there is no reason to suppose or ground for conjecture that her mind ever underwent any change on that subject. Whether she believed she had no power to take the estate out of the entail, or believed that she had such power but chose rather that it should remain within the entail, and dealt with it on that footing, is, in my opinion, of little moment, for, in either view, it is clear to me that she could not have intended that the general clause of disposition should apply to it, but must have intended the reverse. Therefore, even if it should be thought that in this class of cases the presumption is in favour of the general disponee, I think that the circumstances I have referred to are quite sufficient in this particular case to rebut the presumption.

The respondent has referred to various letters pointing in the same direction, written by Xaveria relative to the management of the estate after the date of her general settlement. I am not prepared to say that in a question of this kind no such letter can be admissible, but I think it unnecessary to go into that matter, or into an examination of the several letters to see whether any of them are admissible, as I am of opinion that the case of the respondent is made out, irrespective of the letters.

The matter of family relations has also been referred to, but I do not attach much importance to it in this case. Its features are not so distinctively marked as to impress me strongly. All that I think can be said of it is, that it harmonises with the rest of the case.

I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, if the rule as to the construction of testamentary deeds is the same in Scotland as in England, viz., that the intention of the testator is to be collected solely from the words which he has used in the instrument itself, extrinsic evidence being inadmissible except for the purpose of ascertaining the subjects of which those words are properly descriptive, or the subjects to which, if the words are ambiguous or inaccurate, they may appear (after proof of the facts shewing their ambiguity or inaccuracy), to be most properly applicable, I must confess that I have very great difficulty in understanding how the operation of general words, purporting to pass everything which the settlor might be entitled to at the time of his death, can be either enlarged or limited by extrinsic evidence, tending merely to shew that the settlor did or did not know or believe that he had a disposing power over some particular property, over which he had such power, or (whether knowing or not, that he had such power), that he did or did not actually intend to pass that property by those general words.

I am bound, however, to acknowledge that evidence of this kind appears to have been received, and to have been more or less relied on, by the Court of Session, in the two cases which came to this House in Lord Hardwicke's time, Campbell v. Campbell, and Farquharson v. Farquharson; and that it was assumed, by most (if not all) of the Judges of that Court who lately decided Thoms' case, that such evidence was admissible, and might (in a case like the present) be decisive. All the authorities cited in the argument of this case are consistent with each other, if this ground of decision be adopted. But, if this be so, the rule of law in Scotland, as to the influence of extrinsic evidence upon the construction of written instruments, differs from that of the law of England. That is a conclusion which, I confess, for my own part, I should accept with very considerable reluctance, because the rule, in this respect, of the law of England, appears to me to be a consequence flowing almost by logical necessity from another rule, common to the laws of both countries—viz., that every testamentary or mortis causa disposition of real estate must be made and authenticated by some instrument in writing; or, in other words, that the intention which is to receive effect must be found expressed in a written instrument. I should have thought it the sounder principle, that, subject to any limitation of their meaning afforded by the context of each particular instrument, or by any rule or presumption of law, general words in a testamentary deed ought to be applied to every subject of which, according to the true meaning of the words themselves, they are properly descriptive.

Holding these views, I should have preferred to rest my concurrence in the judgment proposed to your Lordships upon the doctrine which (if the rules of the law of Scotland for the construction of written instruments are the same as those of England), would, in my judgment, be properly deducible from the decisions of this House in Campbell v. Campbell, and Farquharson v. Farquharson, a doctrine which is not (as my noble and learned friend has shewn) really at variance with the later decision of your Lordships' House in Leitch's case, and which in Thoms' case, although not reconcileable with the opinions delivered by a large majority of the Judges of the Court of Session, was maintained by a very weighty minority. The doctrine that mere general words purporting to dispose of a man's whole property in a will or mortis causa deed shall (unless there be something in the instrument itself to control that presumption) be understood of property, the succession to which, after the death of the testator, is not already regulated by a special destination to a particular class of heirs in a prior instrument, either made by the settlor himself or under which he holds, and that the settlor is not, merely by the use of such general words, presumed to intend to innovate upon any such special course of succession, seems to me to be neither unreasonable nor inconvenient.

The word "revocation" or "evacuation" may not be apt to describe the effect produced by an instrument devising lands held under such a title to other persons, because (as was justly said at the bar) such an instrument would operate upon the absolute fee, legally vested in the person executing it, not by altering the special destination, but by withdrawing from it altogether the subject-matter of the settlement. If, however, substance rather than technicality is to be regarded, the analogy of revocation, properly so called, is not without a legitimate bearing on this class of cases. It is admitted that, if a special destination were contained in a prior deed (even though not strictly a mortis causa disposition), executed by the settlor himself, it would prevail against a subsequent disposition, by general words, of all the settlor's property, in a testamentary instrument; and it further seems to be the law of Scotland (on the ground that an intention to innovate on a special course of succession is not readily presumed), that when a reference to "heirs" is found in the dispositive words of an instrument executed by a settlor holding a particular estate, although without fetters, under a prior deed of entail (whether executed by himself or by any other person) it must, prima facie, be taken that the heirs intended by the later instrument are those to whom the estate would go by virtue of the destination in the earlier deed.

The doctrine mentioned by the minority of the Judges in Thoms' case seems to me to depend on the same principle; and I find it easier to suppose that this doctrine was the real foundation of the decision of your Lordships' House (under the advice of so great a Judge as Lord Hardwicke) in the two cases of Campbell and Farquharson, than to refer these decisions entirely to the weight of the extrinsic evidence which was undoubtedly received in them. But, whatever may be their true ground, I do not think it would be possible to reconcile those decisions of your Lordships' House with a judgment of reversal in the present

No. 4. case; and I concur in the propriety of the motion which has been made to your Lordships by my noble and and learned friend.

June 17, 1873. Forbes v. Trefusis.

HON. C. J. R. TREFUSIS, Respondent (Defender).—Lord-Adv. Young—Sol.-Gen. Jessel—Lee.

Entail—Destination.—A deed of strict entail contained a destination to A, "and the heirs-male procreated of the marriage between A and" the entailer's daughter, "and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively; whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of such heirs-male respectively; whom failing, to the heirs-female procreated of the said marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies respectively," &c. Held (aff. judgment of the Court of Session) that on the succession opening by the death of the eldest son of the said marriage without male issue, his only daughter, as heir whatsoever of his body, was entitled to take in preference to the next heir-male of the said marriage.

Ld. Chancellor (Selborne). Ld. Chelmsford. Ld. Colonsay.

(IN the Court of Session June 6, 1868, ante, vol. vi. 900.)

Sir John Stuart of Fettercairn executed in 1811 a procuratory of resignation and deed of entail whereby he bound and obliged himself, his heirs and successors whatsoever, to make due and lawful resignation of the lands and barony of Fettercairn, and others therein specified, "in favour of and for new heritable infeftment of the same to be given and granted to myself, and failing me, to the heirs-male of my body; whom failing, to Sir William Forbes, Baronet, of Pitsligo, and the heirs-male procreated of the marriage between him and the deceased Dame Williamina Stuart or Forbes, my daughter, his spouse, and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively; whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of such heirs-male respectively; whom failing, to the heirs-female procreated of the said marriage, and the heirs whatsoever of their bodies respectively; whom failing, to John Hepburne Belsches, Esq. of Invermay, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the heirs-male of the body of the said Sir William Forbes, Bart., in any subsequent marriage; whom failing, to Sir George Abercromby, Bart., of Birkenbog, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of the body of the said John Hepburne Belsches; whom all failing, to my own nearest heirs or assignees whatsoever, the eldest heir-female and the descendants of her body always excluding heirs-portioners, and succeeding without division throughout the whole course of succession foresaid as often as the same shall descend to females, and the daughter of the heir who shall happen to be last in possession of the lands and heritages before mentioned (whether such heir was served heir of tailie or not) succeeding always preferably to the daughter of any former heir so often as the succession through the whole course thereof shall devolve upon daughters, and which I hereby declare to be my true meaning, notwithstanding of the aforesaid general destination of heirs whatsoever."

The deed contained the usual prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clause of a strict entail.

Sir John Stuart died in 1821 without male issue. He was survived by his son-in-law, Sir William Forbes, who died in 1828 without having completed a title to the entailed estate, and who left three sons born of the marriage between him and the entailer's daughter—viz. (1) Sir John Hepburn Stuart Forbes; (2) Charles Hay Forbes; (3) James David Forbes.

Forbes v Trefusis.

On the death of Sir William, his son, Sir John H. Stuart Forbes, in accordance with the destination in his grandfather's deed of 1811, succeeded to the entailed estates, and completed a title thereto.

Sir John died 1866, leaving an only child, Lady Clinton, who, as heir of tailzie and provision to her father, completed a title to the estate, which was now challenged in an action of reduction and declarator at the instance of her cousin, the eldest son of Charles Hay Forbes, who was next brother to Lady Clinton's father.

The pursuer pleaded;—(4) By the entail of 1811 heirs-male of the bodies of heirs-male of the marriage of Sir William and Dame Williamina Forbes are entitled to succeed to the lands and estate thereby conveyed in preference to heirs-male or heirs whatsoever either of the said Sir William Forbes or of any subsequent heir of entail.

On 4th June 1867 the Lord Ordinary (Jerviswoode) pronounced an interlocutor by which he sustained, inter alia, the pursuer's fourth plea, and reduced the defender's title.

The defender reclaimed. The case was first heard before the First Division, and afterwards before the First Division with three Judges of the Second Division. The Court unanimously recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defender.

The pursuer appealed.

An objection was taken to the competency of the appeal under 6 Geo. IV. 120, sec. 25, which provides that "the decrees or orders of the Court of Session shall be final, and not subject to be complained of by appeal to the House of Lords, unless the petition of appeal shall be lodged with the Clerk of Parliament or the Clerk-Assistant within two years from the day of signing the last interlocutor appealed from, or before the end of fourteen days, to be accounted from and after the first day of the session or meeting of Parliament for the despatch of public business next ensuing the said two years: Provided always that when the person or persons entitled to appeal shall be out of the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland it shall be competent for him or them to enter an appeal at any time within five years from the date of the last interlocutor, if he or they shall remain abroad so long, or within two years from the time of coming into Great Britain or Ireland, the time allowed to such person or persons for lodging his or her appeal in no case on account of mere absence exceeding the foresaid space of five years, together with the space that may elapse before the end of the fourteenth day from and after the session and meeting of Parliament next after the expiration of the said five years." The petition of appeal was presented on 25th March 1872, and on 23d April the respondent petitioned that it should not be received. This last petition was referred to the appeal committee, which met on the 24th day of April 1872, when the appellant verified the fact of his absence in New Zealand by the affidavits of Mrs Stuart Forbes, his mother, and Mrs Traill, his sister. The fact of the appellant's absence was not disputed by the respondent before the appeal committee, but he contended that his mandatary being sisted as a party became his representative, and that the case was thus brought within the first paragraph of the 25th section of the Act relative to parties in the kingdom, and the other provision relative to appeals by parties abroad was displaced. The appeal committee reported that the petition of appeal ought to be received, but that the respondent should have liberty to raise this question of competency at the hearing. The appeal was accordingly received, and the usual order made on the respondent to answer.

On the question of the competency of the appeal the respondent in his case argued;—The mandatary is a party, and a necessary party, to the suit, and also to this appeal. The parties who answer to the description of the "person or persons entitled to appeal" are Sir William Forbes and his mandatary; and to bring them within the proviso applicable to persons out of the kingdom they must both have been in that situation. Sir William Forbes and his mandatary, although two persons, form but one party to the suit, and represent but one interest. That interest is not only one but indivisible, and was fully represented in this country by the mandatary. And as he who represented that interest before the Court has been present throughout, it seems impossible to hold in this case that the "persons entitled to appeal" can claim the privilege of absence from the kingdom.

Further, even assuming that Sir William Forbes had a separate right of appeal, it seems fatal to his claim for an extended period that, while personally absent, he was constructively present. To entitle a party to the privileges of absence he must have been, not merely personally, but as a party to the cause, "out of the kingdom." This cannot be said of Sir William Forbes. If he founds on his bodily absence, then he is not by himself a person entitled to appeal. He cannot take a step in Court without his mandatary. If, on the other hand, he refers to the spirit and meaning of the Act, and pleads his right as the party substantially interested in the suit, it is fair to inquire whether, in his character of pursuer of the action, he has been absent from the kingdom. So far as the spirit and meaning of the statute are the test he seems to have been throughout present by his mandatary. To allow this would practically enable any party to obtain latitude of five years for appeal to the House of Lords, simply by going out of the country and suing by a mandatary.

The appellant in the appeal case argued;—(1) As to his competency of the appeal—A mandatary is appointed merely to secure the opposite party's costs.[1] (2) As to the merits of the appeal—The clear meaning of the destination is to call next after Sir William Forbes the heirs-male of his body by his marriage with the entailer's daughter; and on their entire failure, but only in that event, the heirs-female or heirs whatsoever of the bodies of these heirs-male. Had the entailer intended that each of the sons of Sir William Forbes should be instituted as the root of an independent stirps, and that the limitation, should have the same effect as if each son had been called by his name with limitation to the heirs-male and female of his body, apt and familiar words might easily, and would undoubtedly, have been used to express it. But, for the sake of argument, let it be assumed that the effect of the clause was as the Court have found. Be it that the introductory limitation was equivalent to a limitation to "the first and other sons," how do their Lordships get rid of the words of inheritance which follow, viz., "the heirs-male of their bodies respectively?" The Court altogether ignore the word "male." They read the substitution as if it were "the first and other sons of the marriage, and the heirs-general of their bodies;" because a limitation to heirs-male and female of the body is precisely the same as a limitation to heirs of the body, or heirs whatsoever of the body. If the first son died, whether in his father's lifetime or not, leaving a daughter, and survived by the other sons, the daughter would, on the reasoning of the Court below, take, to the exclusion of the sons; and so would the heirs, whether male or female, of her body; in other words, instead of the descent to heirs-male of the marriage, so stringently provided for in the entail of 1811, the primary descent on the death of an eldest son leaving only a daughter would be to heirs-female of the body, because there can be no heirs-male if one female intervenes. Is not this plainly repugnant to the destination in the entail of 1811, by which the "heirs-male of the marriage" are called as a class, and "the heirs whatsoever" are likewise called as a class, on the failure or extinction of heirs-male? Much reliance was placed by the respondent on the particle "respectively" with which the limitation ends—"to the heirs-male of their bodies respectively." This particle, however, expressed nothing more than the sentence would without it. It expressed the manner in which the succession is regulated in all cases of class succession. Had the word been absent, the class of heirs-male of the body would not have succeeded jointly, but in the legal order of primogeniture and descent. Had it been the intention of the entailer to institute the sons seriatim as the root of a stirps, embracing heirs-female as well as heirs-male of their bodies, in their order, he would have adopted a well-known form or style familiar to conveyancers,—a style which has frequently been used to carry such intention as this into effect. That style or form will be found in many entail cases. [1]

It is not necessary to refer to the respondent's argument.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, in this case your Lordships have the benefit of a very careful and well-considered judgment, not only of the Judges of the First Division, but also of the consulted Judges who were called in to assist them, and the result of whose united deliberations was to produce unanimity, the Judges in the First Division having been originally divided in their opinions. I need not say, my Lords, that it would be only on very clear and strong grounds that your Lordships would be disposed to decide against that weight of authority, and against so well-considered a judgment of the Court below. Further, I may observe that the learned Lord Ordinary, who came to a different conclusion, founded it, not wholly, but certainly in a considerable degree, on a view of the construction of a part of this deed which is no longer insisted upon at the bar, and therefore it may be doubted whether, if the Lord Ordinary had had the same benefit of further consideration which the Judges of the First Division had, his Lordship might not have concurred in their opinion.

When we come to examine the deed the first thing which I think is clear—in fact it was hardly resisted by the Dean of Faculty in his reply—is this, that although "the heirs-male procreated of the marriage," and in a later place, "the heirs-female procreated of the marriage," between Sir William Forbes, Baronet, and Dame Williamina Stuart, the settlor's daughter, are words which might have extended to all the male line descending from that marriage, and all the female line also descending from that marriage, yet it appears from the context of this particular deed that that is not truly their meaning, because, having spoken of "the heirs-male procreated of the marriage" between Sir William Forbes and the settlor's daughter, the deed goes on with the words "and the heirs-male of their bodies respectively,"—plainly, therefore, speaking of the first heirs-male procreated as the authors of a stirps or line from whom other heirs-male were to descend and to take by inheritance. That by itself, I think, unless there were other difficulties in the context which do not occur here, would be a sufficient reason for taking "heirs-male" to signify sons, and to be a word descriptive of the persons who are to be the heads of several stirpes, and the heirs-female in like manner to be daughters. And I would observe, my Lords, that although the words "procreated of the marriage" between two persons named, are words that would not necessarily exclude the ulterior descent of a remoter issue from them, yet in their strict and accurate signification they are certainly more appropriate to issue of the first generation than to any afterwards who are truly and literally procreated of other persons, though their immediate parents may be traced back to the persons named.

Having arrived at that construction of those words, one material step has been made towards the rest of the construction, because we have thereby ascertained that this testator intended several of the stirpes to take one after another in the order of primogeniture, and not a single stirps to take according to the ordinary rules of simple descent.

I cannot help observing that that construction is further illustrated by a comparison of this portion of the deed with those parts which follow it, because when the testator intended a simple destination to the heirs-male of the body of a particular person he knew how to express it, for he goes on to say, "whom failing, to John Hepburne Belsches, Esquire, of Invermay, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to the heirs-male of the body of the said Sir William Forbes, Baronet, in any subsequent marriage, whom failing, to Sir George Abercromby" "and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of the body of the said John Hepburne Belsches,"—in every case expressing himself in the manner in which, if the argument for the appellant were sound, he might have been expected to express himself in this first part of the deed. For in truth the argument of the appellant is that all this amounts in the result to neither more nor less than what would have been the effect of the deed if the testator had simply said, "failing the heirs-male of his own body, to Sir William Forbes, Baronet, of Pitsligo, and the heirs-male of his body by his marriage with my daughter, whom failing to the heirs-female of the said Sir William Forbes by the same marriage." For that, of course, it would have been quite unnecessary to have used the very special language which this testator has used, dividing the stirpes instead of uniting them in one, using the word "respectively," and contrasting the language of this part of the deed in the manner in which he has contrasted it with the parts which follow.

Now, it is certainly a sound principle that when you find words used you should suppose them to be used for a purpose rather than without a purpose, and I think, therefore, that if we can place a reasonable construction upon the words which occur here, and which are rendered superfluous by the appellant's argument, we ought to do so. The appellant's argument turned very much upon what was said to be the proper or technical force of the words "whom failing," which, it was said, were words intended, after the exhaustion of one limitation or a series of limitations, to introduce another. To that proposition I see no reason whatever for taking the slighest exception, but it is in truth a mistake to suppose that it is a proposition in any way inconsistent with the judgment of the Court below. The same effect, neither more nor less, is given by the argument on both sides to these words "whom failing." Both agree that on the failure of the one line they are meant to be introductory of another. The question is not as to the effect of the word "failing," but as to the effect of the word "whom." What is the antecedent to which the word "whom" is relative? The Largie case has no tendency whatever to throw the least light upon that which is the only question in this case, because it is admitted by the respondent in this case that the destination "to the heirs whatsoever of the bodies of such heirs-male respectively" is not to take effect until the failure of the heirs-male of the bodies previously mentioned. The question is, what is the true antecedent of the relative word "whom." Now, I cannot help thinking, my Lords, that the Court below had sound reason for answering that question as they have answered it, in this way, that the "heirs-male of their bodies respectively" is the antecedent, not "the heirs-male procreated of the marriage between " the settlor's daughter and Sir William Forbes and their descendants, but those persons " respectively."

Having arrived at that, I cannot but think that the effect of the word " respectively," introducing the gift over, which commences with the words " whom failing," and recurring at the end of that gift over to the " heirs whatsoever of the bodies of such heirs-male respectively "—such heirs-male being there clearly such sons—is to import the force of that word " respectively " into the entire sentence, and that it is not really distinguishable in sense from what it would have been if, as it was put to the counsel in the course of the argument, it had been " whom respectively failing " or " whom failing respectively," the effect of it being that the heirs of the bodies of each stirps are to succeed in this manner—the heirs-male of that stirps first, the heirs-female of that stirps afterwards, but both the heirs-male and the heirs-female of that stirps succeeding next, respectively, to the parent towards whom they stand in the relation of heir, and are meant to stand in the relation of successor. My Lords, that word " respectively " is, in its natural and proper sense, and with the force which it constantly has in these legal instruments, a word at once of distribution and connection. It distributes when a series of persons are intended to take, or to take in a certain order or manner. And it is a word of connection because it brings together by a reference the heir to the ancestor, the issue or the child to the parent. So understood here it seems to be only a short term for expressing a series of limitations, in each of which, as I understand it, and as the Court below has understood it, the whole issue of each stirps is to be exhausted before you go into the subsequent limitations in this deed, the male issue, however, being always preferred to the female.

Now, I do not know that we really need more to support this construction than the reasons which I have offered to your Lordships, and which in truth are more fully and more ably expressed in the judgments in the Court below, particularly the judgments of Lord Curriehill and Lord Benholme. But I cannot help saying that although I think it was quite right of the learned counsel for the respondent not to lay their main stress upon subordinate clauses in the deed, which after all assist rather by way of illustration than by direct construction, yet I cannot but think myself that the subsequent clause, as to the rule which is to apply upon the succession of daughters, is very much more consistent with the construction placed upon this instrument by the Court below than with that contended for by the appellant. Your Lordships will observe that the effect of the appellant's construction is to reduce this to the simple elements which I mentioned at the outset, the single stirps of Sir William Forbes, or rather the testator's daughter as the wife of Sir William Forbes, there being a preference of the male issue descending from that stirps over the female, but, subject to that preference, a simple gift first to the male issue of that stirps and then to the female. On the other hand, the construction which the Court below has adopted, and which I think is hardly now contested as far as the division of the stirps is concerned (I mean as far as the construction of the words " heirs-male procreated " and " heirs-female procreated " are concerned), make several stirpes each to take successively, the one after the other.

Now, with which of these two schemes of the will is this declaratory clause more consistent? Your Lordships will see that the declaratory clause contemplates the rule to be followed for female succession, the succession of daughters always, " so often as the succession through the whole course thereof shall devolve upon daughters "—that rule being that the daughters shall take with reference to the latest taker, I mean with reference to the last state of possession by the heir from whom that daughter takes—that, for instance, if there should be a daughter of the last taker in male line, that daughter should succeed before the daughter of any former taker in the male line. I think that that rule, fairly understood, will also give a clue to the mode of succession if that daughter's line were exhausted; or if the last taker in the male line died without any issue at all, then you are still to look to the last previous possessor, and the female taker is to take in order of possession reversed—that is, that the heir representative of the family in the preferred male line transmits to his own daughter as his successor, and if that line fails you then go back to the next preceding male heir in the preferred male line, and his daughter will take in preference to any former ones. That is a mode of succession at least more consistent with the division of the whole into stirpes and the succession of the females of each stirps after the failure of the males of that stirps, than the notion that all the males of a single stirps are to be completely exhausted and then all the females are to come in.

No. 5.

June 17, 1873. Forbes v. Trefusis.

However, my Lords, I agree entirely with what was said, that after all, from these subsidiary clauses illustration rather than proof is to be derived. All that I venture to say is, that taken in the manner in which they have been taken by the Court below, the result is something consistent with the ordinary scheme of a family settlement in strict entail, where you have a division like this into a certain number of stirpes, and being so, I think that the opposite view is very much less consistent with the ordinary scheme of will. Therefore I think the antecedent probability concurs with the conclusion at which I arrived from the words themselves, and particularly from the governing word "respectively" as found in the earlier part of the instrument. On the whole, I advise and move your Lordships to affirm these interlocutors, and to dismiss this appeal, with costs.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, I must confess that I have felt considerable doubt in the course of the argument as to the proper construction of this deed of entail of 1811, nor can I say that that doubt has been entirely removed; but considering that we have here the unanimous judgment of seven learned Judges in the Court of Session, which judgment is concurred in by the opinion of my two noble and learned friends, I feel that my doubt is unfounded, or at all events that it ought to yield to such high authority. I therefore agree that these interlocutors should be affirmed.

LORD COLONSAY.—My Lords, I concur entirely in the opinion which has been expressed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack. The case is a very simple one, and cannot be illustrated by more statement than has been given by him, and by two at least of the learned Judges in the Court below. It appears to me that the clause of the deed of entail makes each of the sons of the marriage a stirps, and that it says, with regard to those sons respectively—that is, as to each stirps—that the descent shall be to the heir-male of his body, whom failing, to the heirs whatsoever of the body of such sons. That seems to me to decide the whole case. I think that is the natural reading of the words. I think it is consistent with the ordinary course of descent in such cases, and, on the whole, reconciles the subsequent clause better than if we took the opposite construction. I have nothing more to add.

The Dean of Faculty, for the appellant, craved the costs occasioned by the objection to the competency of the appeal.[1]

LORD CHELMSFORD.—I think, my Lords, that the appellant ought to have the costs of the opposition to his appeal on the point of competency. Your Lordships may recollect that the Lord Advocate, being pressed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, said that he did not mean to insist upon the objection. This is a stronger case, as it appears to me, than that cited by the Dean of Faculty.

Lord Advocate.—That would be merely the attendance of the agent. The appeal was presented after a lapse of close upon five years, and it was presented by a party who is in precisely the same position now as he was throughout in the Court of Session. A petition against the competency of the appeal was presented, and an agent appeared before the appeal committee, to whom it was remitted, and the appeal committee reserved the question for the consideration of this House.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I think, my Lords, it would be much better to use words which do not anticipate the function of the taxation of costs, but which express the principle upon which the House proceeds; and, with that view, I propose to Ship—Advance against freight—Charter-party—Insurance.—A charter-party ntained this clause—"Sufficient cash for ship's ordinary disbursements to be lvanced to the master against freight, subject to interest, insurance, and 2½ per cent mmission." The charterer made advances to the master, but did not insure the eight, and the vessel was lost on the voyage. In an action raised by the charterer ainst the owners held (affirming judgment of the Court of Session) that the charrer, having stipulated that he should be entitled to insure freight at the owners' exense to an amount corresponding to the amount of his advances, must be held have made such insurance a part of his security, and not having effected any ch insurance must be held to have relinquished, in the event of the ship being st, any claim against the owners for repayment.

Question (per Lord Chancellor) whether in ordinary cases advances against eight are recoverable in the event of a loss of the ship and cargo.

(IN the Court of Session November 27, 1871, ante, vol. x. 142.)

Ld. Chancellor (Selborne). Ld. Chelmsford. Ld. Colonsay. Ld. Cairns.

On 20th August 1863 a charter-party was entered into between James M'Kirdy, master and part owner of the ship "Janet Cowan," and Ralli Brothers of Bombay, where the vessel then was, in terms whereof the ship was to proceed to Calcutta, there to be loaded by the charterers or their agents with a cargo for the United Kingdom, "the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo."

The charter-party contained the following clause :—"Sufficient cash for ship's ordinary disbursements to be advanced the master against freight, subject to interest, insurance, and 2½ per cent commission; and the master to endorse the amount so advanced upon his bills of lading."

On 2d October 1863 Ralli Brothers transferred their rights and interest in this charter-party to Messrs Grant, Smith, and Company, by whom it was endorsed to Messrs Watson and Company on 13th October.

The vessel, in terms of the charter-party, proceeded to Calcutta, where she was loaded with a cargo for the United Kingdom by Watson and Company, who between the 7th November and 17th December 1863, while the ship was preparing for the voyage, made various cash advances to or on the order of the master, for the ship's ordinary disbursements, to account whereof M'Kirdy, the master, granted a bill to Watson and Company for £500, drawn upon Mr Robert Shankland, merchant in Greenock, the managing owner of the vessel. This bill was presented for acceptance on the 17th December 1863, but Mr Shankland refused to accept it, on the ground that the master had no power to grant it, and that, under the charter-party, Watson and Company should have effected an insurance upon the freight for the amount of their advances. No such insurance, however, was made by Watson and Company, although they had time to do so after receiving intimation of Shankland's refusal to accept the bill.

The ship sailed from Calcutta on the 9th of November 1863, and was with her cargo totally lost on the 7th of April 1864.

In these circumstances Watson and Company raised this action in the Sheriff-court of Renfrew against Shankland, M'Kirdy, and the other registered owners of the ship, for recovery of £596, 0s. 3d., the alleged amount of their advances against freight for the ship's disbursements while preparing for the voyage, with interest, and 2½ per cent commission on the total amount of the freight, which they claimed as having acted in the capacity of shipping agents for the vessel.

This action was not founded on the bill for £500 granted by the master, which, not being stamped, was invalid under the Act 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 83, section 5, but the bill was referred to as evidence of the nature of the transaction.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders are liable for the obligations of the defender M'Kirdy incurred in his character of master and part owner of their ship. (2) The defender Robert Shankland, as managing owner or ship's-husband, having authorised the defender M'Kirdy to pass drafts on him for the ship's debts, was bound to accept the bill, and is liable therefor, and for the loss caused by his non-acceptance. (3) The whole defenders are liable for the acts of the master and part owner, and of the managing owner or ship's-husband. (4) The defender M'Kirdy is liable individually for the sum in the bill granted by him, and dishonoured.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The advances by the pursuers for the ship's disbursements at Calcutta being a payment, and not a loan, cannot be recovered back from the defenders. (2) The pursuers, as the charterers of the vessel, or the transferees or indorsees of the charter-party, were not entitled to take, and the master of the vessel was not entitled to grant, a bill of exchange for repayment of a sum of money that the pursuers themselves under the charter-party were at the time indebted to the master and owners of the vessel. (3) The master of a vessel has no power in a foreign port to bind his owners in a bill debt, even for the ordinary disbursements of the vessel; and more especially he has no power to bind his owners in such a debt to the charterers of the vessel, when such parties are themselves bound to provide, by means of a payment on account of freight, the master of the vessel with the funds necessary to pay such disbursements.

The Sheriff-substitute (Tennent) pronounced an interlocutor, which, after various findings in regard to the facts set forth in the foregoing narrative,—"In point of law finds that the money thus paid by the pursuers was not a loan made by them to or for behoof of the defenders, or of the master of the 'Janet Cowan,' but that it is to be held as having been made in terms of the clause of the charter-party in regard to cash for ship's disbursements, to which the pursuers were parties: Finds that by the terms of said clause the pursuers were bound to furnish sufficient cash for ship's ordinary disbursements as an advance against the freight, which it was expected would be earned at the conclusion of the voyage; and that the defenders are not bound to repay to the pursuers the sum thus advanced to them in terms of the charter-party: Finds that the pursuers are entitled to receive interest, the premium of insurance, and a commission of 2½ per centum upon the advances made by them; and of consent of parties decerns for the same, amounting to the sum of : Finds that it has not been proved that the pursuers were agents for the ship at Calcutta, and therefore finds that they are not entitled to the commission charged by them in the account appended to the summons: With the exception of the sum of above mentioned, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.

On appeal against this decision, the Sheriff (Fraser) allowed the pursuers to add the following plea in law to the record:—"(6) The sum sued for having in any view been made as an advance against freight, l no freight having been earned, the defenders are obliged to repay same, and commission thereon, to the pursuers, with interest as illed."

Thereafter the Sheriff, by interlocutor dated 13th February 1871, re- led the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute: "Finds that the money paid the pursuers to the captain was not a loan made by them to or for oof of the defenders, or of the master of the 'Janet Cowan' as repre- ting the defenders, but was an advance as against freight for ship's inary disbursements, subject to interest, insurance, and 2½ per cent mission: Finds in law that the defenders are bound to repay to the suers the sum of £441, 4s. thus advanced to the captain, with interest reon at the rate of 5 per cent from the last date of the advance, to- her with commission of 2½ per cent upon the advances: Finds that as pursuers did not effect insurance upon the advances so made by them y are not entitled to recover from the defenders any sum under this d: Finds that the pursuers were not agents for the ship at Calcutta, that they were not entitled to charge commission as such: Decerns inst the defenders for the said sum of £441, 4s., together with interest reon at the rate of 5 per cent from the 17th day of December 1863 payment; and also for the sum of £11, 0s. 6d. sterling, being com- sion of 2½ per cent upon the said advances, together with interest on l sum of £11, 0s. 6d. at 5 per cent from the said 17th day of Decem- 1863 and till payment: Finds no expenses due to either party, and erna."

The defenders appealed, and, after hearing counsel, the Court, on 14th y 1871, appointed the cause to be re-argued in the presence of three ges of the Second Division.

he Court (by a majority of the seven Judges, diss. Lord Justice-Clerk and d Kinloch) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute, dated respectively the 13th February 71 and 19th December 1870:"—(Then followed a number of findings in nt of fact to the effect contained in the narrative of the case)—"Find t by this action the pursuers, as charterers, claim repayment of their ances to the master at Calcutta, besides interest at 5 per cent thereon payment, and 2½ per cent commission; but find that they do not im the amount of premiums that would have been required to insure much of the freight as corresponds to the amount of their advances: d in law that cash advanced against freight to the master of a ship by charterers for ordinary ship's disbursements at the port of loading is in ordinary circumstances equivalent to a payment of freight, but is e held as an advance in consideration of the subsequent performance the contract by the owners and shipmaster by the right delivery of cargo at the port of discharge; and that if there is a failure of the sideration by the voyage not being accomplished and the cargo rightly ivered at the port of discharge the charterers are entitled, in respect of h failure of consideration, to recover the amount of the said advance n the owners; but find that in the present case the charterers, having ulated that they should be entitled to insure freight at the owners' ense to an amount corresponding to the amount of their advances, st be held to have limited their security for repayment of the advances he right of set-off in settling with the owners if the freight should be ed, and to the amount of the said insurance if ship and cargo should lost, and to have relinquished or discharged the personal obligation of owners for repayment in the latter event: Therefore find that the suers have failed to establish their claim of repetition against the nders; but, in respect of the agreement and consent of parties, decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of £21, 17s. sterling, being the amount of the premium of insurance and commission stipulated by the charter-party to be paid to the charterers in respect of the advance made to the master at Calcutta as aforesaid, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from and after the 7th day of July 1864 till payment: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defenders, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses both in this Court and the inferior Court; allow accounts thereof," &c.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, without saying that the authorities which have been cited at the bar contain nothing useful for the assistance of your Lordships in the determination of this, or any similar case, it does not appear to me that it is a case which is necessarily governed by any of those authorities.

The facts are shortly these:—A bill of exchange was granted by the master of a ship at Calcutta for the purpose of covering certain advances made at that port in respect of the disbursements of the ship by the charterers or their agents. It is clearly admitted with great candour at the bar that the parties did not themselves look upon this transaction as a transaction upon the footing of the charter-party. It may very well be, according to the argument of Mr Butt, that if, when the transaction is examined, it is found in fact to fulfil all the conditions of a transaction according to the charter-party, the appellants would not suffer by reason of their having given to it a different form, in consequence of their having, in the first instance, taken a different view of its nature and effect. At the same time no one can be very much surprised if, they having intended to operate in a particular manner and not under the charter-party, it should turn out that the transaction when compared with the conditions of the charter-party does not accurately fulfil those condition.

The charter is contained in these words—"Sufficient cash for ship's ordinary disbursements to be advanced the master against freight, subject to interest, insurance, and 2½ per cent commission." In my view it is not necessary to decide any of the questions that arise upon the contract made in that form except this, what is the effect of the words "subject to interest, insurance, and 2½ per cent commission" with reference to the fact that no insurance was made? It may very well be, certainly as far as I am concerned I will deal with the case upon the hypothesis that it may be that, according to the true construction of this contract, it was to be a loan upon the security of the freight, and not a prepayment of freight. It is not necessary that your Lordships should decide that question, and I should not advise your Lordships to pass your decision in such a form as to affect the determination of such a question in any future contract upon which it may arise. But, assuming that to be the true construction of the contract, and that this was to be a loan upon the security of the freight, and not a prepayment of the freight, or a part payment of the freight, or a payment on account of the freight within the principle of the authorities which have been referred to, still the question is, whether, according to the true and sound construction of this contract, it was not understood and agreed between the two parties that the insurance which it was for their common interest, for the interest of both of them, to have made in the most proper and convenient manner, should be made by the charterers.

My Lords, I cannot but think that, apart from any evidence as to usage and practice, it is a sound view of this mercantile contract to hold that it provides for insurance, and does not leave the subject of insurance uncertain and indeterminate. Insurance is mentioned, as your Lordships will observe, in direct connection with two other things which were not uncertain, and which were not indeterminate, namely, interest and commission. Interest was to be charged at all events; commission was to be charged at all events. It appears to me that the sound and reasonable view, looking to the nature of the contract, is that there is nothing to lead us to suppose that insurance was not to be as much a fixed term of the contract as interest and commission; and that not the less because all these terms are primarily in favour of and for the protection of the person advancing the money. The owner subjects himself to the burden, but both have an interest in diminishing that burden; at least the man upon whom the burden would fall has an interest in diminishing it as far as it can be diminished for his own security. And therefore, as either one or the other ought for that purpose to make an insurance, it was reasonable that they should make a contract between themselves as to how the insurance was to be made.

[1] Appellants' Authorities.—Saunders v. Drew, 3 B. and A., 445; Arnould's Ins. 50; Wilson v. Martin, 11 H. and G. 684; Parsons' Marine Ins. 190.

Respondents' Authorities.—Thomson v. Gillespie, 5 E. and B. 209; Nicks v. Shield, 7 E. and B. 633; Byrne v. Schiller, L. R. 6 Ex. 319; Jackson v. Isaacsen, 3 H. and N. 405; "The Salacia," 32 L. J. Adm. 43; Droeje v. Simpson, L. R. 2 Privy Council, 505; Trayes v. Worms, 34 L. J. 274 (C. P).

One of your Lordships put to Mr Butt, in the course of his reply, this observation, in which Mr Butt expressed his concurrence:—"These are all things as to which the charterer was to be the creditor of the other party." But if he was to be the creditor of the other party for all these things then that was a part of the contract. He was to advance the money, he was to charge interest, he was to charge commission, and he was to charge insurance, and how could he charge insurance unless insurance was made?

My Lords, it appears to me that the good sense of the matter concurs with that view, because he would not be satisfied unless the insurance was under his own control, he would not have the security for which it was reasonable that he should stipulate, and it would be only by him, when the advances were made, that the precise amount for which the insurance was to be effected would be known. I take it therefore that as between these parties it is a contract in substance to this effect: I, the borrower, give you, the lender, a right to charge me with the premium of insurance; which is very much the same thing in principle as if he had put the money into his hands for the purpose of effecting that insurance. I by no means think it necessary to say what the result might have been if, for any reasonable cause, he had determined not to avail himself of the right to insure and to charge the premiums of insurance, and he had given notice of that to the other party in reasonable time. He did not in fact do so, although according to the evidence there was abundance of time for it to have been done. Still less do I desire to say anything which would affect the question which might have arisen if, having effected an insurance, that insurance had, through some cause not imputable to his fault, become unavailable. I proceed, my Lords, upon the assumption that it may be the construction of this contract that in either of these events he, acting reasonably and according to good faith and right understanding, would be held entitled to recover in the event of the loss of the ship. But in point of fact no insurance was made, and the question is whether, under this contract, the shipowner had not a right to rely upon that insurance being made, in the actual circumstances of the case, by the person who here stipulated for and received the right to charge the premiums of insurance against him, the shipowner. I think, my Lords, that he had. It is manifest that the charterers neglected to do so, and to give notice that it was not done. What must be the consequence of a loss of the ship, the charterers knowing that the insurance was not made? Upon one or the other of these two parties that loss must fall. If the insurance had been made and the money paid by the shipowner, then the benefit of the insurance would have accrued to the shipowner. It is very much like an ordinary case, put in the course of the argument, of the right of a man who gives several securities, when he pays off the mortgage, to have all the securities delivered up into his own hands unless a reason which is a sound and good one, and consistent with the duty of the mortgagee, and which is not imputable to his own fault, can be given for the failure of any one of them. My Lords, this seems to have been really the view which prevailed on the whole in the minds of the learned Judges in the Court below. I think the soundest course for your Lordships to take would be to found your judgment entirely upon that view.

I perceive that in the interlocutor under appeal there are certain findings which your Lordships will probably think go beyond that which, taking the view of the case which I have submitted to your Lordships, if your Lordships should concur in that view, it is necessary to put upon the face of this interlocutor. There is a finding as to the general law upon the subject. Now, it appears to me, my Lords, that it is not expedient that that finding should be made in the interlocutor,—first, because it does not appear to me to be clear that upon this occasion we ought to decide any question of general law; and secondly, because if we did, it would be necessary to consider how far that law ought to be the English or the Scotch law; and finally, if it ought to be the English, whether it would be a safe thing to lay down the rule in the terms which are here stated, which certainly do not appear to agree altogether with the rule lately stated in England in the case of Byrne v. Schiller, reported amongst our cases. I should, therefore, propose to your Lordships to vary the interlocutor by omitting the words beginning "Find in law" and ending with the words "the amount of the said advance from the owners; but".

Then, my Lords, further, the Inner-House proceed to place a construction upon the contract going, I think, beyond the view which I have submitted to your Lordships, and involving this, that by the form and terms of this contract the charterers "must be held to have limited their security for repayment of the advances to the rights of set-off in settling with the owners if the freight should be earned, and to the amount of the said insurance if ship and cargo should be lost, and to have relinquished or discharged the personal obligation of the owners for repayment in the latter event." I cannot think that we are called upon to place upon the face of the interlocutor any such interpretation of the contract. One of your Lordships has suggested words to be substituted for the words which I have read, and which would make the finding run thus, "Find that in the present case the charterers, having stipulated that they should be entitled to insure freight at the owners' expense to an amount corresponding to the amount of their advances, must be held to have made such insurance a part of their security, and, not having effected any such insurance, must be held to have relinquished, in the event of the ship being lost, any claim against the owners for repayment." I would submit to your Lordships that these words should be adopted, and that the interlocutor should be varied in the manner which has been explained.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friend with regard to the short ground upon which he has rested his decision in this case. By the contract between the parties the insurance upon the advances was to be effected by the charterer. There was no obligation upon him to insure except in the sense of its being for his own protection that he should be insured; but as he chose not to insure he took the risk upon himself, and therefore he must bear the loss.

LORD COLONSAY.—My Lords, I concur in the result which has been arrived at, and I think the grounds which have been stated are quite sufficient for the determining of this case.

LORD CAIRNS.—My Lords, I also concur.

"It is ordered and adjudged . . . that the said interlocutor of the Lords of Session in Scotland, of the First Division, of the 2d (signed 5th) of December 1871, complained of in the said appeal, be varied by omitting therefrom the following words, namely, 'Find in law that cash advanced against freight to the master of a ship by the charterers for ordinary ship's disbursements at the port of loading is not in ordinary circumstances equivalent to a payment of freight, but is to be held as an advance in consideration of the subsequent performance of the contract by the owners and shipmaster by the right delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge, and that if there is a failure of the consideration by the voyage not being accomplished, and the cargo rightly delivered at

Private Act—Edinburgh Tramways Act, 1871, 34 and 35 Vict. c. lxxxix.—General Tramways Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. c. 78, sec. 9—Provisional Order.—The Edinburgh Tramways Company were authorised by their special Act and relative plans to lay a double line of tramways in a certain street which at its widest part was not broad enough to afford a clear space of 9 feet 6 inches between the footpath on each side and the nearest rail. By an agreement incorporated with the special Act the whole provisions of the General Tramways Act, 1870, were made to apply as fully as if the special Act had been a provisional order obtained under the general Act. The general Act authorised the Board of Trade to grant provisional orders, which should only become effectual when confirmed by an Act of Parliament, and provided (sec. 9)—"No tramway shall be authorised by any provisional order to be so laid that for a distance of 30 feet or upwards a less space than 9 feet and 6 inches shall intervene between the outside of the footpath on either side of the road and the nearest rail of the tramway, if one-third of the owners, or one-third of the occupiers of the houses, shops, or warehouses abutting upon the part of the road where such less space shall intervene as aforesaid shall, in the prescribed manner, and at the prescribed time, express their dissent from any tramway being so laid."

One-third of the occupiers of houses in the said street having applied for interdict against the formation of any line of tramway within 9 feet 6 inches of the footpath, as specified in sec. 9, held (rev. judgment of the First Division) that the objection was incompetent, on the ground that the special Act was to be regarded as a provisional order confirmed by Parliament, and that sec. 9

The Edinburgh Tramways Company appealed.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, the question in this case is whether the Edinburgh Street Tramways Company can be restrained by interdict from constructing a tramway on the portion of North Bridge Street extending from the south end of the North Bridge to the High Street of Edinburgh, at a distance of less than 9 feet 6 inches from the nearest rail to the outside of the footpath.

The question depends upon the effect of an article in an agreement contained in the schedule to the Edinburgh Street Tramways Act, which, by the 44th section of the Act, is made part of the Act. By the 5th section of the Act the Company are to "make, form, lay down, and maintain the tramways hereinafter described, in the lines and according to the levels shewn on the deposited plans and sections, and in all respects in accordance with those plans and sections."

We had occasion a short time ago to consider the question as to the effect of plans and sections deposited and referred to in this manner, and we found that, in the case of the North British Railway Company v. Tod, which is reported in 12 Clark and Finelly, it was laid down, that where there is such a reference as this to the plans and sections in an Act of Parliament they are incorporated into the Act. The provision here is most express, that the tramways are to be constructed in all respects in accordance with the deposited plans and sections. Now, according to the description of the plans and sections the company are to make a double line of tramway, in which the space between the outer line of rails and the footway on each side of North Bridge Street must be less than 9 feet 6 inches. By the agreement which was entered into, and which is made a part of the Act, the company bind and oblige themselves "to construct and work the tramways described in the said bill and shewn on the Parliamentary plans." Therefore the company, under the Act, and the agreement, which is made a part of it, are bound to make the tramways in accordance with the plans and sections.

But it is said that by the agreement one-third of the owners of houses abutting upon North Bridge Street have a right to object to the tramway being brought within 9 feet 6 inches of the footway. The first clause of the agreement says—"The parties hereto of the first part, as the local authority foresaid, shall have the whole rights, powers, and privileges which the Tramways Act, 1870, or any other general Act relating to tramways now in force, or which may hereafter pass during this or any future session of Parliament, confer, or may hereafter confer, upon the local authority of any district, and the whole provisions of the said Acts shall apply to the Act of Parliament which the said second party is now promoting, or to any Act of Parliament which they or the company may hereafter obtain, as fully in every respect as if the same were a provisional order obtained under the Tramways Act, 1870." The ninth section of the General Tramways Act provides that "every tramway in a town which is hereafter authorised by provisional order shall be constructed and maintained as nearly as may be in the middle of the road, and no tramway shall be authorised by any provisional order to be so laid that for a distance of 30 feet or upwards a less space than 9 feet and 6 inches shall intervene between the outside of the footpath on either side of the road and the nearest rail of the tramway, if one-third of the owners or one-third of the occupiers of the houses, shops, or warehouses abutting upon the part of the road where such less space shall intervene as aforesaid shall, in the prescribed manner and at the prescribed time, express their dissent from any tramway being so laid."

Edinburgh Tramways Co. v. Black, &c.

The first clause of the agreement provides that the General Act shall apply "as fully in every respect as if the same (that is, the private Act) were a provisional order." A great deal of controversy has taken place as to the exact meaning of those words, but I apprehend that the ordinary sense and understanding of the language would be that it must refer to a provisional order obtained—that is, completed and confirmed—by Act of Parliament. Now, supposing, instead of being an Act of Parliament, this had been such a provisional order, it would have been one, of course, as I have already said, confirmed by Act of Parliament. How could there be a veto by the owners under those circumstances? Taking the case of a provisional order, they could only have interposed while it was in progress—that is to say, after notice had been given of the intention to apply for a provisional order. They might then have given notice of their objection. But, under those circumstances, supposing there was no dissent at all, a provisional order, of course, might be made which allowed a tramway to be constructed with an intervening space between the footway and the outer rail of less than 9 feet 6 inches. Such a provisional order, of course, would be utterly incapable of being resisted afterwards; and how, under these words, putting the Act of Parliament upon the same footing as a provisional order, could the owners possibly, when the Act of Parliament was passed, have any veto whatever? And how can it possibly be understood that this reference to the first part of the General Tramways Act with regard to provisional orders can have any application to a case of this description? The local authority having for the protection of the public bound the company to make their tramways according to the plans which the Act of Parliament authorised, can it be believed that, by a general reference to rights, which these persons would have to prove, as well as that the provisional orders were being made to their prejudice, they intended to prevent the Act of Parliament being carried out? The argument upon which the respondents insist is, according to their construction of it, utterly inconsistent. One part compels the company to do the works which are authorised by the Act, the other, according to the argument of the respondents, allows the owners to say that what the Act sanctions and the agreement compels shall not be done. Even putting it upon the lowest possible ground, the part of the Act as to the execution of the works is clear and distinct, and the obligation to execute the tramways as prescribed by the Act is express. The qualification is hard to be understood, and it is capable of a construction which renders it wholly inoperative.

My Lords, I should not have entertained the slightest doubt upon this case if it had not been for the respect which I feel for the judgment of the three learned Judges who have expressed a contrary opinion; but it appears to me that the owners have no right whatever to the interdict which has been granted to them, and therefore I submit to your Lordships that the interlocutor ought to be reversed.

LORD COLONSAY.—My Lords, with every respect for the opinions of the majority of the learned Judges in the Court below I cannot come to any different conclusion from that which has been arrived at by my noble and learned friend. It appears to me that the only contention that could be maintained with plausibility here is that which is founded on the notion that the 9th section of the General Act was somehow imported into this statute, and formed a condition which overrode the other provisions of the Act. But I think that is a strained construction of the agreement, and that it is founded on not only straining the construction of the agreement but also straining the objects and purposes of the 9th section itself. I therefore cannot adopt the conclusion which has been come to in the Court below.

It appears to me that the respondents in this case have been rather negligent of their own interests in this matter with regard to what would be the result of this tramway passing through their street. Either they had not measured the street and ascertained what was to be the effect of the construction of the tramway according to the plans, or they relied upon some protection from the local authority which would supply the want of their being themselves parties to an agreement which would have protected their interests. However, looking to the agreement as it stands, and considering what the purposes of that 9th section of the General Act are, I cannot concur with the views taken in the Court below. I can arrive at no other conclusion than that which has been suggested by my noble and learned friend.

No. 7.

Edinburgh Tramways Co. v. Black, &c.

As to the form of judgment to be pronounced here, in the first place, I apprehend that the interlocutor of the Court below must be reversed. Then, I presume, there will be a remit to the Court to recall the interdict, and repel the reasons of suspension.

Lord Cairns.—My Lords, the learned Judges in the Court below who granted the interdict in this case appear to have been very much influenced in their views by a consideration of the great danger which would arise to the public unless the fullest care was taken as to the mode in which license was granted for making tramways of this description.

In those considerations I entirely concur; but it appears to me that the time has passed in this case for giving weight to them, and that all that the Court below had to do, and all that this House have now to do, is to ascertain what is the extent and limit of the Parliamentary authority which has been granted to the appellants in this case.

Now, if the agreements between the appellants and the different local bodies are put aside for a moment it is perfectly clear that under the Act of Parliament the company were making, when they were interfered with by the interdict, or had made, a tramway along North Bridge Street in exactly the way that was authorised by the Act of Parliament, and that, in point of fact, the Act of Parliament would not have authorised them to make it in any other way than the way in which they had made it. If there were nothing more in this case there would be nothing more for argument.

But the authority given by the Act of Parliament is attempted to be controlled by the 1st section of the agreements which were entered into by the local bodies. Now, I own that it is not very easy to give a clear and distinct interpretation to that first section of those agreements. I doubt very much whether the parties had themselves in their own minds any very clear and intelligent apprehension of what that first section meant; but if it is not possible to give a very clear and distinct meaning to the section, certainly that section cannot be made available for the purpose of curtailing and restraining the clear and distinct power entrusted by the Act of Parliament to the appellants.

As it appears to me, the utmost that the first section of the agreement does is this,—it provides that the provisions of the General Act should apply to the Act of Parliament which was then being solicited by the company, or to any other private Act of Parliament which the appellants might afterwards have obtained, as fully in every respect as if the same, that is, as if the private Act, were a provisional order obtained under the Tramways Act, 1870.

Now, what advantage that would give to the parties, or was supposed to be likely to give to the parties, I am not quite sure. But I see clearly that the words they have used hypothetically are these, "as if the Act of Parliament were a provisional order obtained under the Tramways Act, 1870." But if the provisional order were obtained under the Tramways Act of 1870, the time for objection had passed, the time for exercising a veto was gone, the provisional order was in existence, and whether that were an order which had passed through its stages properly or improperly is quite immaterial.

The Act of Parliament coming over the order and upon the top of the order, did away with all consideration of the foundation of the provisional order, and took the place of the provisional order as an Act of the Legislature. It appears to me that it is only with that Act of the Legislature that we have now to do, and that there is no power in any Court to restrain the appellants so long as they follow the provisions of the Act of the Legislature, which it is not pretended they are not doing. Therefore, my Lords, I agree that in this case the interdict should be recalled.

Edinburgh Tramways Co v. Black, &c.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I also concur in the opinion at which your Lordships have arrived, that the interdict should be recalled, and that relief should be given to the appellants, and I will very shortly state my reasons for coming to that conclusion. If your Lordships look at the General Act of 1870 you find that it is divided into three parts, the first part relating to the mode of proceeding to obtain a provisional order, the second and third parts being of a more permanent character, the one relating to the construction of the tramway, and the other to certain provisions usually introduced into other Acts giving power for making tramways of this description. The second and third parts are introduced into this private Act which we are considering. The first part, being in its nature temporary, is not so introduced, but it happens that in that first part there is the 9th section, upon which so much discussion has arisen, by which section a power is given to one-third of the frontagers, or persons living in front of the line of tramway about to be constructed, to put an absolute veto upon the making of any provisional order empowering the construction of such a tramway unless a certain distance be kept between the extreme edge of the tramway and the kerb at the outside of the footpath.

Now, my Lords, there is no possibility of arguing this case with success as the respondents have argued it, as if that Act had expressly said no provisional order can be made at all which will bring the edge of the tramway within that distance of the footpath, irrespective of there being consent on the part of the frontagers or not, for the introduction of the question of the consent of the frontagers makes it clear that such an order is not in itself an invalid order.

It is an order which has the full force of an Act of Parliament, unless that dissent has been interposed before the order is made. Therefore, it is not upon the face of the order a bad order. The order is perfectly good, although it gives a more limited space,—it may be much more limited space,—between the tramway and the footpath, because when the order is once made and there has been no opposition on the part of the frontagers it will be assumed that it is a proper order. The order is full and complete.

That being so, we come to the second Act and the agreement recited in it. I think it is of considerable importance, for the purpose of coming to a just conclusion as to the intention of that Act of Parliament, to observe that the Act pointedly introduces the second and third parts of the General Act, and does not introduce the first part. The only way in which the first part can be said to be introduced at all is, that the Act confirms by its 44th section an agreement made between the parties, that is to say, between the local authority and the promoters of the tramway, and that agreement inter se provides that as between the parties it shall be as if the first part of the General Act had been introduced also. Still it does not introduce the first part at all, except by saying, as between you, the parties to the agreement, it shall be as if it were expressly enacted. The very fact of the private Act saying that the second and third parts shall be considered to be incorporated in this Act is an exclusion, as it appears to me, of the first part.

Upon the whole, my Lords, the agreement comes to this, as it appears to me, that the local bodies stipulate that as between themselves and the promoters, not only as to this Act, but as to all future Acts as well as to this, whenever you, the promoters of this tramway, are minded to have any tramway whatsoever in Edinburgh, you shall not have any advantage over us by proceeding by special Act instead of proceeding by way of provisional order, but it shall always be dealt with as between you and us as if the powers you obtained were powers obtained by virtue of a provisional order, and therefore they shall be subject to all such rights and advantages as we might claim by virtue of that arrangement. Now, it is said it is very difficult to point out what the particular advantages would be of that arrangement. I quite agree that it is extremely difficult to point out what the particular advantages would be, but I am quite clear of one thing, and that is, that the local authorities had not the slightest idea that they had a right to object only at the proper time, that is to say, before the order was made, in consequence of the proper distance between the tramway and the footpath not being observed. In the present state of things the local authority might say to the company,—"This shall be treated as if a provisional order had been made, and we insist on your carrying out the article in our agreement, that you will execute the tramway in the manner you have undertaken to do, that is to say, according to your plans," which is a matter perfectly inconsistent with the contention of the respondents.

My Lords, I certainly feel that degree of diffidence which we ought always to feel in these cases, considering the great weight of authority in the Court below. I feel the weight of that authority, but I cannot bring my mind to any other conclusion than that which I have stated. It must no doubt be owing to some defect on my own part that I cannot see the force of the reasoning leading to the contrary conclusion.

Teinds—Valuation—Prescription.—Held (aff. judgment of the Teind-Court) that a decree of valuation of teinds was not a title under which a proprietor could by prescriptive possession acquire a right to teinds of lands not originally included in the valuation.

Teinds—Valuation—Presumption.—Circumstances in which held that terms of a report of sub-commissioners of teinds in 1629, decree of approbation thereof in 1785 and 1786, and relative scheme of division, and the proceedings in a process of augmentation in 1800, raised the presumption that the whole lands in a parish had been valued in 1629, but that this presumption had been overcome by proof that certain lands were not included in the valuation.

Ld. Cairns.
Ld. Hatherley.

(IN the Court of Session March 9, 1869, ante, vol. vii. 614.)

This process of augmentation, modification, and locality was raised in 1863 by the Rev. Dr Macleod, minister of the parish of Morvern, against the heritors. The heritors opposed the augmentation, on the ground that the teinds of the parish had been valued, and were exhausted. The heritors founded on two decrees of the Teind-Court,—(1), a decree, dated 26th January 1785, pronounced in a process of approbation and valuation at the instance of the Duke of Argyll, which ratified a valuation made by the sub-commissioners of the presbytery of Argyll in 1629; (2) a decree, dated 12th July 1786, pronounced in a process of approbation and valuation at the instance of Allan Maclean of Drimnin and others, ratifying a decree of the sub-commissioners of the presbytery of Argyll in June 1629.

On 22d November 1865 the Teind-Court pronounced a decree of modification fixing an increased stipend, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to prepare a locality; "but declaring that this modification and the settlement of any locality thereof shall depend upon its being shewn to the Lord Ordinary that there exists a fund for the purpose." The Lord Ordinary appointed the minister to lodge a condescendence of teinds of the parish, and the heritors to lodge answers thereto.

The minister averred that the decrees founded on did not include all the lands in the parish, and specified certain lands in the parish which he said were not included in the valuation. The minister also stated certain objections to the validity of the decree of 1786.

Separate answers were lodged for various heritors.

Mrs Campbell Paterson and others pleaded;—(3) The validity of these decrees is not only fortified by the positive, but every ground on which the valuations could have been objected to, though any such had existed, has been cut off by the negative prescription.

Similar answers were stated by the other heritors.

The Lord Ordinary (Barcaple) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the objections stated by the minister to the decree of approbation and division in 1786 are excluded by the negative prescription: Finds that the teinds of the lands belonging to the several respondents which are condescended upon by the minister as being unvalued must be held to have been included in the valuation by the sub-commissioners in 1629, approved of by the Teind-Court in 1785 and 1786; and appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may be heard upon the effect of this judgment, and on the question of expenses."

The Second Division pronounced this interlocutor:—"Edinburgh, 8th January 1869.—The Lords having considered this case, in respect of its importance, direct that it shall be argued before themselves, with the assistance of three Judges of the First Division, on the question whether the plea of the positive prescription raised by the defenders is applicable to the case, and ought to be sustained or repelled."

On 9th March 1869 the Second Division and consulted Judges, by a majority of six to one (Lord Benholme dissenting), pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel upon the plea of the positive prescription raised by the defenders, in conformity with the opinion of the majority of the seven Judges, repel the said plea." (Ante, vol. vii. p. 614.)

Subsequently, on 19th March 1869, the Second Division recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, "in so far as regards the lands of Knock and Gualochaolis, acquired from Allan Maclean of Knock: Find that the said lands are unvalued."

Mrs Campbell Paterson appealed.

LORD COLONSAY.—My Lords, the question to be decided under this appeal is, whether the teind of certain lands now belonging to the appellant, and described in her titles as "all and whole the sixteen shilling and eightpenny land of old extent of Knock, the sixteen shilling land of old extent of Cullichelish, acquired from Allan Maclean of Knock, are to be held as having been included in the valuation made by the sub-commissioners in 1629, and approbations of their report in 1785 and 1786. That question has arisen in a process of augmentation, modification, and locality raised by the minister of the parish of Morvern against the heritors of that parish, of whom the appellant is one.

It is not disputed that the teinds of all lands comprehended in the report and approbations thereof have been exhausted long ago. But it was maintained by the minister that certain subjects which appear in the titles of the heritors are not mentioned in the report of the sub-commissioners, or comprehended in their valuation. On the other hand, the heritors maintained that the subjects referred to, whatever may be the names by which they have at any time been known, were valued along with the whole lands belonging to their predecessors under the names given in the report of the sub-commissioners.

The subjects condescended on by the minister as being unvalued were twelve in number, and belonged to four heritors. The Lord Ordinary decided that all these subjects must be held to have been included in the valuation of the sub-commissioners in 1629 approved of by the Teind-Court in 1785 and 1786. He also found that certain objections stated by the minister to the decreet of approbation in 1786 were excluded by the negative prescription.

No. 8.

July 10, 1873. Paterson v. Macleod.

Against that judgment the minister presented a reclaiming note to the Second Division of the Court. There the heritors made a stand on a plea of positive prescription, which had been stated by them on the record, but had not been specifically dealt with by the Lord Ordinary. The Second Division directed that the question whether the plea of positive prescription was applicable to the case should be argued before themselves and three of the Judges of the First Division. The question having been argued before seven Judges, the plea was repelled by a majority of six Judges to one.

That point having been disposed of, the Second Division, after some further procedure, recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary as to the lands now in question, but concurred with the Lord Ordinary's finding that all the other lands condescended on by the minister as being unvalued must be held to have been included in the valuation of 1629, and the approbations thereof in 1785 and 1786.

When an heritor pleads that the teinds of his lands are valued it is incumbent on him to shew that they have been valued by competent authority. A valuation by sub-commissioners, when duly approved of by the Court of Teinds, is sufficient. But in many cases it happens that there is difficulty in identifying some of the lands of the heritor with any of those named in the valuation on which he founds. The reasons are obvious. Take, for example, the present case. More than 200 years had elapsed from 1629 till the present question arose. In the interval all the properties have changed hands, most of them have been sub-divided, and separated, and formed into new groups, with new designations. Old names, not altogether abandoned, have undergone change of sound in pronunciation and change of orthography in transcription, so as to be not easily recognised. Some names may have passed away entirely, and some subjects that were treated as nameless pertinents may have come into prominence under separate names; and so it happens that of twelve subjects which the minister condescended on as being unvalued ten were, after much research and discussion, and having regard to the circumstances of the case, held to have been included in the valuation, either separately or in cumulo with others.

The question, therefore, comes to be, whether the appellant has been able to shew with reasonable certainty that the lands described in her titles in the terms I have quoted were included in the valuation of 1629, although "Knock" is not therein named, and notwithstanding the evidence relied on by the minister as excluding any evidence that they were valued.

The position taken by the appellant in the record is that the lands in question, and which are described in her titles in the terms I have already quoted, belonged in 1629 to Murdoch Makileane of Lochbowie, and were comprehended in his lands there valued, and which are thus described in the valuation—"The lands of Ardneis, Archabeig, Cowlecheylis, Auchaforsay, Achingawen, Unybeig, Darriness, Corwan, and Clwnlead, with the pertinents." The appellant maintains that the lands in question are there comprehended under "Cowlecheylis" and pertinents.

The minister, on the other hand, alleges that in 1629 the lands in question belonged to Angus Maclean, parson of Morvern, not to Murdoch Makileane of Lochbowie, and were not valued. This is denied by the appellant. The minister further alleges that in 1629 "Knock and Gualachaolis were, as now, incorporated with each other." The appellant admits that Knock and Gualachaolis have always been incorporated with each other. But this agreement in words is not an agreement in meaning. The minister means that Knock, which belonged to the parson of Morvern, had incorporated with it a Gualachaolis, though not named. The appellant means that the Cowlecheylis or Gualachaolis which belonged to Lochbowie had incorporated with it a Knock, though not named. I therefore do not think that anything can be rested on this verbal concurrence.

But the minister founds upon a series of title-deeds as shewing that in 1620 the lands of Knock did belong to the parson of Morvern, and as to tracing them down to 1706, when they were conveyed by Allan Maclean of Knock to Allan

July 10, 187

Paterson v. Macleod.

Cameron of Glendessary, without ever having belonged to Lochbowie, or any person deriving from him. He also founds upon another series of title-deeds, as tracing Lochbowie's lands down through a totally different course of transmission till 1698, when they were acquired by the said Allan Cameron of Glendessary from Lochbowie,—thus shewing, as he contends, that Knock, which belonged to the parson of Morvern, could not have been comprehended in the valuation of Lochbowie's lands, as alleged by the appellant. I shall as briefly as possible trace these two chains of transmission, in order to see how far they bear out the contention of the minister. In doing so I shall take them separately, and in each case follow the chronological order of the transmission.—(His Lordship here adverted to the titles.)

If, then, the title-deeds as printed by the parties are to be relied on, there was a sixteen shilling or sixteen shilling and eightpenny land of Knock, which was the property of the parson of Morvern in 1620, and of his son in 1640, and was subsequently transmitted to Glendessary, as I have described; while the Cowlkeylis that belonged to Lochbowie, and was valued in 1629, was a twopenny land, and formed an integral part of his twelve merk land before 1620, and so continued until the twelve merk land,—without having undergone any disintegration, and without any trace of a Knock having been connected with it,—came likewise into the hands of Glendessary. And all the titles from Glendessary downwards bear that Knock had been acquired from Allan Maclean of Knock, and that the twopenny land of Cowlkeylis had been acquired from Lochbowie. It seems next to impossible to reconcile with these facts the allegation of the appellant, that the Knock described in her own title as having been acquired from Allan Maclean of Knock was in 1629 in reality comprehended in the twopenny land of Cowlkeylis, which belonged to Lochbowie. The titles, when carefully examined, are clearly adverse to that allegation, and if the decision of the case is to depend upon the evidence afforded by the titles, or on any inference that can be drawn from them, I think it must be adverse to the appellant.

But the appellant maintained a very powerful argument, founded on the terms of the report of the sub-commissioners in 1629, and on the interpretation said to have been given to that report in the approbations thereof in 1785 and 1786, and also on the manner in which the teinds of the parish have been dealt with from that time till the present, and the presumptions thence arising. I now proceed to consider the elements of the case, and the inferences to be drawn from them.

In the report of 1629 the sub-commissioners set forth that they had been directed to try and inform themselves by all lawful means of the worth "of all lands of each paroche in the said presbetrie," and that they had "faithfullie, trulie, and diligentlie proidit in tryeing and cleiring the sds. valuations of the parochynes underwryten." The reasonable inference from that statement would be that they had valued all the lands in each parish, subject, however, to be rebutted by evidence that certain lands had been omitted. Further, in regard to what was then the parish of Kilcomkeill, in which the lands in question were situated, it appears that the Bishop of Lesmoir, patron of the kirk of Kilcomkeill and chief titular of all the teinds thereof, appeared by his procurator, and they "appoint nothing against the premises." Then, again, it appears that the person from whom the sub-commissioners derived their information as to the value of the lands belonging to Lochbowie and of the lands belonging to the parson of Morvern was the parson of Morvern himself, who certainly must have known everything regarding Knock. Yet, while he gives up and values the teinds of his own lands of Ulling, contained in his charter of 1620, he makes no mention whatever of Knock, which was contained in the same charter, and which, as we have seen, was also contained along with Ulling in his son's sasine in 1640. The reason of this silence as to Knock is not apparent. One suggestion might be that the parson had parted with it between 1620 and 1629, but that would not be consistent with the subsequent titles. Besides, if he had parted with it, some other person must have acquired it; but no person appears to have given it up for valuation, and the question is, was it or was it not valued? The minister suggests that, as the parson was himself both proprietor ıly 10, 1873. aterson v. acleod.

in occupation of the land and possessor of the teinds, he may have omitted to put, or thought it unnecessary to put, a value on the teinds. This suggestion is plausible rather than altogether satisfactory. If, however, Knock was in fact omitted, it is not incumbent on the minister to find out the cause of the omission. On the face of the report there is no trace of its having been valued eo nomine; and in the record the only suggestion by the appellant is, that it was comprehended in Lochbowie's twopenny land of Cowlkeylis, a suggestion which, for reasons I have already stated, cannot be accepted.

Then as to the two processes of approbation in 1785 and 1786:

The first was a simple process of approbation brought by the Duke of Argyll with reference entirely to lands belonging to himself in various parishes, including some lands in what was in 1629 the parish of Kilcomkeill. These were the lands which had been valued in 1629 as belonging to Lachlane Macleane of Morvern, and have nothing to do with the subject-matter of the present case.

The process of approbation of 1786 was brought by the then heritors of lands in the old parish of Kilcomkeill other than the Duke of Argyll. One of these heritors was Campbell of Ardslignish, a predecessor of the appellant. The persons called as defenders were the Officers of State, the Duke of Argyll, the minister of Morvern, and the moderator of the synod of Argyll. None of these entered appearance except the Duke of Argyll, and his interests were not affected by anything done. The process was one for approbation, valuation, and division. The summons contained a conclusion for approbation of the report of the sub-commissioners, a conclusion for division of the cumulo valuation of the teinds of such of the lands belonging to the different pursuers as had been valued in cumulo, and that such division should be made in terms of a mutual agreement between the pursuers, or conform to a division to be proportioned on a proof of the present rental of the lands, and to be approved of by the Court, or by any other proper rule, and also a conclusion of a precautionary character, to the effect that if the Lords should refuse to approve of the report of the sub-commissioners concerning the valuation of the stock and teind of "the lands thereinbefore enumerated, or any part thereof," a new valuation should be led of the teinds of "the several lands before enumerated, or such parts thereof." The lands there referred to were the same as were enumerated in the report of 1629, except such as belonged to the Duke of Argyll, and had been included in the approbation of 1785. The summons made no mention of Knock, or of a sixteen shilling or sixteen shilling and eightpenny land of Gualichelish. The only lands mentioned in the summons as belonging to Ardslignish were Achnaha, and the portions he had acquired of Lochbowie's twelve merk lands, viz., Arnies, Achabeg, and Cowlkeylis.

Let us now see what course was followed in that process. In the first place, nothing was done under the conclusion for valuation. That conclusion may therefore be disregarded. There remained the conclusion for approbation of the report of 1629 and the conclusion for dividing or apportioning such of the valuations of teind as had been made in cumulo. The conclusion for approbation was necessarily limited to the contents of the report, and no decree of approbation to be pronounced in that process could legally go, or could be intended by the Court to go, beyond the conclusions of the summons, or to give the character of valued teind to the teinds of lands that had not been reported as valued by the sub-commissioners under some name or description; and if the process had been, as in the case of the Duke of Argyll, a mere process of approbation, the expression "Cowlkeylis, now called Knock," which has caused so much difficulty in this case, would in all probability never have been called into existence. But there was a conclusion for division of teind, and the parties appear to have agreed that the division of teinds valued in cumulo should be made in proportion to the valued rent of the lands belonging to the several heritors. Accordingly a certificate of the valued rent of the parish of Morvern, so far as regarded the lands of the parties to the cause, was obtained. From the valuation-roll of the county it appears that the roll was made up in 1751, at which time Glendessary was proprietor both of the lands that had belonged to Lochbowie and of those acquired from Allan Maclean of Knock. The certificate produced in 1786 for he purpose of dividing the cumulo was made after Glendessary's estate had been old and partitioned, and at the time when Ardslignish was proprietor of the arts of that estate which fell to him. In both of these documents it will be een that "Knock and Gualichelish" are coupled together, and opposite to them placed one sum of valued rent, £5, 11s. 1d. Probably they were possessed s one tenement when the roll was made up. There is no other name at all imilar mentioned either in the roll or in the certificate. We have already seen hat Knock was acquired by Glendessary from Allan Maclean of Knock, but whether Gualichelish thus coupled with it represents the twopenny land of Cowlkeylis acquired by him from Lochbowie, or the sixteen shilling and eightenny land of Gualichelish mentioned somewhat mysteriously in the instruments f sasine in 1707, or both, does not appear. The appellant, of course, assumes hat it was the first, but whether it was so or not it was plainly something different from Knock. There are two things, Knock and Gualichelish, that go to make up the £5, 11s. 1d. of valued rent.

When the teinds that had been valued in cumulo came to be apportioned according to the valued rents of the lands, the clerk who made the scheme of division appears to have assumed that the report of the sub-commissioners comprehended all the lands in the parish; and in dividing and apportioning the teinds of Lochbowie's twelve merk lands, which had been valued in cumulo at 1 boll meal, 1 boll 2 firlots 1 peck bear, and £40 Scots, he apportioned to Arnies and Achabeg, which then belonged to Ardslignish, a proportion corresponding to their valued rent, which was £4, 3s. 4d., and he apportioned to what he describes as "Cowlkeylis, now called Knock," a proportion of teind corresponding to the sum of £5, 11s. 1d., which in the roll and certificate of valued rent stood opposite to Knock and "Gualichelish." This is the first appearance of the expression "now called." There is no warrant for it in the summons, or in the titles, or in the report, or in any document that has been referred to. The clerk who prepared the scheme no doubt saw from the report that one of the parcels comprehended in Lochbowie's lands was called "Cowlkeylis," and it was his duty to apportion to that parcel part of the cumulo teinds of Lochbowie's lands. He also saw that in the certificate of valued rent of the parish the only name at all similar to Cowlkeylis was coupled with Knock, and one sum of valued rent put opposite to them. Then, apparently assuming that all the lands in the parish would be embraced in the report, and not finding Knock mentioned eo nomine, but finding it in conjunction with the only name at all similar to one which he did find mentioned, he may have assumed that Gualichelish had come to be called Knock. It is apparent that in his own mind Cowlkeylis, not Knock, was the thing he was dealing with, as indeed it was the only thing he required or was entitled to deal with; but he adds, "now called Knock," so as to identify it with the valued rent of £5, 11s. 1d. By thus apportioning to Cowlkeylis a share of the cumulo teind corresponding to a sum of valued rent, which comprehended Knock as well as Cowlkeylis, it follows that more has been put on Cowlkeylis than its proper proportion, and consequently that less than the proper share has been put on all the other parcels of land comprehended in the cumulo valuation, and that the owners of these other parcels obtained an unjust advantage. It is scarcely supposable that Lochbowie's Cowlkeylis, which was only a twopenny or one merk land, could by itself have a valued rent of £5, 11s. 1d., seeing that his sixpenny or three merk lands of Arnies and Achabeg have in the same roll only a valued rent of £4, 3s. 4d.

If the clerk fell into this mistake in the way suggested, or in any way, none of the parties present had any interest to correct him, but the reverse. Ardslignish would be benefited by having his unvalued teinds of Knock treated as valued. The other heritors would be benefited by having part of the cumulo teind diverted to Knock, thereby lightening the burden on them. But the division and apportionment of that cumulo was not a matter in which the minister was interested. He would get the whole amount, whatever might be the apportionment among the several owners of what had been Lochbowie's twelve merk lands. The scheme of division, being unopposed, was of course approved of, and decree was of course given in conformity with it. Whether that decree opposes a technical bar to the contention of the minister I shall consider presently. In the meantime it is a judgment of the Court, to the effect that the parsonage and vicarage teinds "of the lands of Achnaha, Arnies, and Achabeg, and Cowlkeylis, now called Knock, with the pertinents belonging to John Campbell of Ardslignish," are of the worth and avail there specified, and are to continue so in all time coming.

The next thing that occurred was that, in the year 1800, the minister of Morvern raised a process of augmentation, modification, and locality. In that process the report of 1629, and the approbations thereof in 1785 and 1786, and the foresaid scheme of division, were founded on, and were recognised and treated as shewing that the whole teinds of the parish had been valued in 1629. No objection was stated to the regularity or sufficiency of any of these documents, although questions were raised which gave an interest to examine them. In that process of augmentation arrangements were made and judgments pronounced on the assumption that the whole teinds of the parish had been valued in 1629; and so matters rested until the present process, raised in 1863, disturbed the prevailing belief. The terms of the report in 1629, and of the decree of approbation in 1786, and the proceedings in the process of augmentation in 1800, raise a presumption that in 1629 the teinds of the whole lands in the parish were valued, though Knock was not specially named; and very clear evidence to the contrary will be required to rebut that presumption. But I am of opinion that, if it be competent to go into the inquiry, the presumption would be rebutted by the titles referred to by the minister, and an examination of the proceedings in the process of approbation. I think that the allegation of the appellant, that Knock had always been incorporated with Lochbowie's twopenny land of Cowlkeylis, if meant to apply to the Knock in question, is disproved by the titles, which shew that it never belonged to Lochbowie, but belonged to a different family. And if the allegation means only that there always was a Knock incorporated with Lochbowie's Cowlkeylis, it is of no value, because the Knock alleged to be unvalued is the Knock acquired from Allan Maclean of Knock.

I think that the other suggestion in the case for the appellant, that in the interval betwixt 1620 and 1640 Lochbowie may have possessed Knock by some right of liferent or other temporary right, cannot avail the appellant, because in that view it could not have formed any part of the nine parcels composing the twelve merk lands that were valued, and it is not mentioned as having been valued, and is not in any way referred to in the report of the sub-commissioners.

There still remains to be considered the question, whether the decree of approbation in 1786 excludes the contention of the minister. That involves points which I shall deal with separately.

First, What is the true reading and legal construction of the decree of approbation? I think it is merely an approval of the report of 1629, and of the valuation there made of the lands there mentioned, and cannot be held to extend to any different lands. If it had extended to different lands it would have been ultra vires. But it did not do so. The summons or libel had reference only to lands enumerated in the report. The conclusions of the summons were limited in like manner, and the decree of approbation refers throughout to "the pursuer's lands libelled," and no other lands. It is true that in that part of the decree which has reference to the conclusion for dividing such of the teinds as had been valued in cumulo, we find that in the approving of the scheme of division the words of the scheme are adopted, viz., "teinds of the land of Achnaha, Arnies, and Achabeg, and Cowlkeylis, now called Knock." These words, with the exception of "now called Knock," are quite in accordance with the report and the summons. The addition of these words can import nothing more than that what was called Cowlkeylis at the date of the valuation is now (in 1786) called Knock, —has now got a name which it had not formerly. There is no finding that the Knock known by that name at and before the date of the valuation was valued. Neither is there any finding that it was then or is now Cowlkeylis. In short, whether Cowlkeylis was or was not now called Knock, that alias conferred on rwlkeylis cannot be made to mean legally that the Knock acquired from Allan aclean of Knock was part of Lochbowie's twelve merk land, and that the Court s so decreed when it would have been ultra vires to have done so. I there- re think that the terms of the decree do not exclude the contention of the inister.

Second, Is it then excluded by prescription? As regards the positive pre- iption, I concur with the majority of the Judges in the Court below. I think at the plea is inapplicable. There is neither the kind of title nor the kind of session which the statute requires.

Then, as regards the negative prescription, I think that it cannot be founded to the effect of excluding the contention of the minister. If I am right in view I take of the true legal construction of the decree in 1786, it is not in- sistent with the contention of the minister as to Knock, and there is no room the plea of negative prescription. But further, it is to be observed that the l question here being one of identity, the plea of prescription can have no ce unless the identity, or, in other words, the matter in issue, is assumed in vour of the appellant and against the pursuer.

On the grounds I have stated I think that the Court of Session came to a ht conclusion in holding that the appellant's lands acquired from Allan aclean of Knock were not included in the valuation by the sub-commission in 29, and are unvalued. I therefore think that the interlocutors appealed from ould be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

Lord Cairns.—My Lords, it appeared to me throughout the argument of this se that the real question to be decided was not so much, perhaps not at all, e question of positive or negative prescription, upon which so much learning nd care appear to have been bestowed in the Court below, as what we should ther term a question of fact, viz.,—aye or no,—were the lands included in the itles of the appellant valued in the valuation of the teinds of the parish by the ub-commissioners in the year 1629, and more particularly were those lands hich in the titles of the appellant are now described as "Knock," or as "now alled Knock," so included?

Now, my Lords, if we were to deal with this case upon considerations of pre- umption only I own it appears to me that the way in which the valuation of the sub-commissioners was treated in the years 1785 and 1786 in the two pro- esses of approbation to which my noble and learned friend has referred would go very far to shew that the whole of the teinds of the parish had been included in the valuation of the sub-commissioners in 1629. Indeed, I might add that the valuation of 1629, ex facie, would rather raise in the mind of any one perusing it the idea that the sub-commissioners conceived that they were valuing the whole of the teinds of the parish. And further than that, when we come to the process of augmentation, which was concluded in the year 1804 and was raised by the father of the present respondent, who was then minister of the parish, nd who appears to have by his procurator represented that the teinds of this arish were all valued by the sub-commissioners of the presbytery of Argyll in he years 1629 and 1630,—I say, when we come to that process of augmentation, certainly would appear to me, and it did appear to me in the argument, that at presumption was very much advanced and very much strengthened, and at if the case were to rest there, and if we had nothing more to guide us, the ference to be drawn from these circumstances to which I have referred would so strong that it must be accepted as leading to the conclusion that the whole the teinds of the parish had been included in that valuation.

But, my Lords, in this case we are not left to presumption. The case having en argued in the course of last session, speaking for myself, I may say that uch of the delay that has occurred in deciding it has arisen from the circum- ance that I have felt, as I think every person would feel, a strong desire to ve the fullest weight that was allowable to those considerations of presump- on, and I felt some unwillingness to have the inference which had been raised my own mind by those circumstances of presumption that had been so strongly rged dislodged by a different view, without the clearest proof that that presumption could not be entertained. But I am obliged to confess that when I com to look at the titles which have been so fully explained by my noble and learne friend (whose explanation I do not mean to repeat), I am driven altogether o of the conclusions which I might have derived from the presumptive eviden to which I have referred; and after a great deal of time and trouble has bee expended in looking at these titles, I have evidence before me which appears me to be perfectly clear, and which I cannot disregard, that the lands include in the titles of the appellant, and which are there described as "Knock," or, "now called Knock," are not the same lands as those described by the old nam of "Knock" found in the earlier titles, and are not included under that o name. How the change has come about has been accounted for by my nob and learned friend; but whether the suggestion he has made is a correct one not, we have this fact as clear as if the matter had only occurred a few month ago—we have the devolution of the title of the different lands in the paris clearly marked in a succession of charters and deeds, and it appears to me fro that to be perfectly clear that the titles under which the present appellant clain to shew that her land was included are not the titles under which this land mu be included, and that there is in the valuation of 1629, and in the lands therei described, no name or denomination of territory under which we can range th land which is the subject of the present appeal.

My Lords, I own I have some regret at the conclusion at which I have t arrive, more especially as I find that the late minister of the parish himself wa clearly under a different impression. But that of course could not prejudice th case we have now to decide on; and I must say that I agree entirely in the con clusion at which my noble and learned friend has arrived, and in the motio with which he has concluded his statement, namely, that this appeal be dis missed.

Lord Hatherley.—My Lords, I confess that I approached the consideratio of this case with the same degree of doubt and difficulty as that which has bee expressed by my noble and learned friend who last addressed the House, wit regard to a claim made for teinds in a case where, at least as long since as 178 there appears to have been an assumption on the part of many of those wh were interested in the consideration of the matter that the teinds in questio had been valued by a process of valuation which took place as long as near 250 years ago, especially as we find that that assumption was not only acquiesce in, but actually put forward by the minister himself in the year 1804, now som seventy years ago. Having regard to the principles which have prevailed in a systems of jurisprudence, and especially having regard to some not otherwis than recent cases in your Lordships' House with reference to the amount of pr sumption which ought to be justly entertained when claims are put forward co trary to that which has been the current view of parties (especially parties i terested) for a long period of years, I was anxious to look into the case (and do not think it was a misplaced or an improper anxiety), to see if there was an thing which would justify your Lordships' House in coming to the conclusio that the general agreement, apparently, of thought and opinion during so long course of time as that to which I have referred was founded in right and i title.

But as it happens in this case (and we owe the demonstration of it in a gre degree to the extreme attention which has been devoted to the case by my nob and learned friend who first addressed the House), there really is not the thinne interstice in which there can be interposed a presumed arrangement or a pr sumed agreement which would justify the claim set up by the appellant to tre this particular parcel of land as having been valued in the valuation of 162 for we have, with a degree of distinctness and completeness which could scarce be expected in a title derived from so remote an antiquity, a clear deduction title, which has been made much more clear, I admit, to my own mind, by t statement of the noble and learned Lord who first expounded the deduction titles. We have a clear and continuous stream of documents of title, whi evince the course in which the land now in question, namely, the land of Knoc came down from the parson of the parish in 1629, and we have another exactly similar stream of clear and continuous titles with reference to the land belonging to Maclean of Lochbowie, which comprehended another parcel which the appellant in this present case wished to represent as including the land of Knock. It is impossible, as was demonstrated by the deductions of title traced by my noble and learned friend, so to include Knock in the lands which came from Maclean of Lochbowie. Having these two clear and distinct streams of title, beginning from a period considerably antecedent to the valuation—beginning from 1620 (nine years before the valuation) in the one case, and from a period still more remote in the other case, we find these two streams at last in confluence in the title of Cameron of Glendessary, and we find nothing from that time forward which can leave room for a presumption of an arrangement to be interposed at any time, by which your Lordships can now say that the land of Knock was comprised in the valuation of the Lochbowie land under another title, namely, Cowlkeylis. It appears to me to be clearly made out that the Knock in question is the Knock which belonged to the parson at the time when the valuation was made, and it appears to be equally clear that it is not named or included in that valuation.

Under these circumstances, and being anxious to say these few words, in order to shew that I am not unmindful of the duty which is incumbent upon every Court to presume all that can be presumed in favour of what have been believed for a long course of time to be the respective rights and titles of the parties, I think it is impossible in this case to make a presumption which will exclude the positive and clear matters of fact which have been placed before our minds, and therefore I find myself compelled to join with my noble and learned friends in the conclusion at which they have arrived.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c.

WINTER SESSION.

JOHN HOME, Appellant.—Muirhead.

Home v. Paterson.

Franchise—Parish Schoolmaster—24 and 25 Vict. c. 107, Parochial and Burgh Schools (Scotland) Act, 1861, sec. 18.—By sec. 18 of the above Act it is provided that in any arrangement for the retirement of a schoolmaster the schoolmaster's house, &c. shall be made over "to the person actually discharging the duties of schoolmaster."

Held that the proviso did not apply to the case of a schoolmaster who had on account of bad health been allowed to employ an assistant for a period of years to discharge his duties, but had not retired.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

JOHN HOME, W.S., Merchiston House, objected to Robert Primrose Paterson being continued on the roll as a voter for the county of Midlothian. Robert Primrose Paterson stood enrolled as a voter as "Robert Primrose Paterson, schoolmaster, proprietor in virtue of his office, houses, and pertinents, Duddingston." It was objected that he was not schoolmaster of the parish of Duddingston, in the actual discharge of the duties of schoolmaster, and had not been so for ten years past.

The facts as stated in the special case by the Sheriff were:—"That the voter was duly appointed schoolmaster of the parish of Duddingston in the year 1850; that in 1862 there was an arrangement between the voter and the heritors of the parish, by which the voter, as schoolmaster, was permitted to appoint an assistant, or a person to act for him as schoolmaster, and the salary was to be received by this person; that the terms of this arrangement and the cause of it, and whether it was in writing or verbal, have not been stated to the Sheriff; that the arrangement was for a period of years, and ended in April or May 1872; that the person so appointed discharged the duties of schoolmaster since 1862 till April or May 1872, and he continued to discharge these duties after the conclusion of the said arrangement and till recently, when he was dismissed by the voter; that the voter has now appointed another person to act as schoolmaster for three months, whom he is to pay for his services; that the voter has not personally discharged the duties of schoolmaster since 1862; that he has without interruption occupied the schoolmaster's and garden. He considers himself to be, and always to have bee schoolmaster of the parish, and that he could at any time act as sc master if he was not prevented by his medical adviser on account c state of his health."

By the Parochial and Burgh Schools Act, 24 and 25 Vict. c. 10 18, it is enacted that "nothing in this Act shall be held to interfere any arrangement which shall have been concluded between the he and the schoolmaster of any parish for the retirement of such sc master, except as regards the house and garden and premises att thereto, which shall in every case be made over at the term of Whits next after the passing of this Act to the person actually dischargin duties of schoolmaster."

The decision of the Sheriff was,—That it had not been proved th has ceased to be schoolmaster, and that his name should be continu the roll.

Home appealed, and argued;—That as the voter had ceased to disc the duties of schoolmaster, his title to occupy the house had also cea

The respondent answered[1];—There was here no final retirement Paton's case, and the schoolmaster might at any time resume the c of his office.

LORD BENHOLME.—I am satisfied that no case has been made out for fering with the Sheriff's judgment. There is a clear distinction betwee case and Paton's case, where the schoolmaster resigned his office, and no merely the active duties of the office. There was no actual resignation h the voter retained the status of schoolmaster. The distinction betwee schoolmaster and an assistant appointed by the schoolmaster to dischar duties is very obvious.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I retain the opinion expressed in Paton's case, th authoritative separation of the voter from the active duties of his office pr a very serious obstacle to the enjoyment of the franchise in respect of occupancy of the house. In the present case the voter has had his name roll for many years as occupant of the schoolmaster's house, and that occupancy he still retains. The objector is bound to make out that the who is actually occupying the school-house is so separated from the discha the duties of his office as to be no longer entitled to the position of schooln It is, on the one hand, not sufficient that he continues to occupy the But, on the other hand, it is not sufficient for the objector to prove that been compelled by the state of his health to cease from giving instructio sonally, and to appoint a temporary substitute. The person now actin appointed, and the person formerly acting was dismissed, by this voter from all that appears in the case the voter, who has never been dismis suspended, might still be discharging the duties of the office if he were i health, and will resume them on recovery. I therefore think that the v not in the same position as in the case of Paton, where the heritors had re the schoolmaster from the sphere of his official duties, so that he could n and could not resume them.

LORD ORMIDALE.—The case of Paton cannot be held to rule the presen that case the schoolmaster had resigned, or was held to have resigned his while in the present the schoolmaster not only retains the house but all th to discharge the duties of schoolmaster which he ever had. It is true t does not discharge the active duties of the office, but his title is not t destroyed. It can be easily understood that any legitimate cause might to prevent a schoolmaster for a time personally discharging the duties of his office. I do not therefore think that the objector has made out a case for having him struck off the roll. No. 1. Oct. 21, 1872. Home v. Paterson.

JOHN HOME, W.S.—T. F. WEIR, S.S.C.—Agents.

JOHN HOME, Respondent.—Muirhead.

No. 2. Oct. 21, 1872. Sandilands v. Home.

Franchise—Valuation-Roll—Proof of Value—Valuation Act, 1856, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 91, sec. 34.—Certain subjects were entered on the valuation-roll of 1871-72 as of the annual value of £12, and on the valuation-roll of 1872-73 as of the annual value of £16. The assessor stated that the value for 1871-72 was truly £14, and that it should have been so stated in the valuation-roll. Held that the statement of the assessor that the valuation-roll was wrong could not be admitted to contradict the valuation-roll.

WALTER SANDILANDS claimed to be enrolled on the register of voters for the county of Midlothian as "tenant, Moffat Park Cottage, Inveresk." Registration Appeal Court. B.

John Home, W.S., objected that the value of the subjects on which Walter Sandilands claim to be enrolled had not been, during the twelve calendar months immediately preceding the 31st July 1872, of the annual value of £14, as appearing on the valuation-roll of the county.

The facts as stated by the Sheriff were—"That the annual value of the subjects, as appearing on the valuation-roll for 1872-1873, is £16; that the annual value, as appearing on the valuation-roll for 1871-1872, is £12; and that the claimant returned the said sum of £12 as the value for the valuation-roll of 1871-1872. The assessor stated that the value for 1871-1872 was truly £14, and that it should have been so stated in the valuation-roll of that year."

LORD BENHOLME.—I cannot doubt but that the assessor's opinion is here brought directly to impeach the valuation-roll of the previous year, because what he says comes shortly to this, that subjects the value of which he put down at £12 ought truly to have then been valued at £14. Now, I do not think that we can allow him to do that, and so get behind the valuation-roll. It might have been a different case if a rise in the value towards the latter period of the year had been proved to the Sheriff, but that was not attempted. We cannot allow the authority of the valuation-roll to be impeached in this way.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—In my opinion this case can be disposed of without interfering with previous decisions, or deciding the general principle.

We cannot separate the two sections of the statute as to owners and tenants. The recognition of the effect and authority of the valuation-roll must be the same in both. I am still of opinion that the valuation-roll in existence at the date of the claim is in a different position from that of the previous year; and this is best illustrated by taking the case of a claimant as owner who must have been in possession for six months. If the current valuation-roll states the value of his property at £10, while the roll of last year makes it £4 or £5, and if, in the interval, he has built his house, or an addition to his house, or has so increased it and improved it as to augment its value,—is he to be excluded from the franchise?

No. 2.

Oct. 21, 1872. Sandilands v. Home.

As I read the statute, the current valuation-roll cannot be impugned or challenged. Nor is a challenge of the old valuation-roll to be lightly received or favourably viewed. That I consider to be the general view of the statute. But the case here differs from that supposed in its special circumstances. This claimant, when giving up his value to the assessor for taxation, stated it to be £12, and now, when he wishes to obtain the franchise, he says that the true value at that time was £14, and he is probably correct, because we see that his property is stated at £16 of value in the present year. But we cannot allow such a proceeding. We cannot permit him to challenge a value taken on his own statement. I think we should affirm the decision of the Sheriff in the circumstances of this case; but we must be understood not to differ from the principle decided in the quoted case of M'Gaw when circumstances occur to require the application of that principle.

I am glad we have not here to decide any general principle as regards the valuation-roll, for though the 34th section of the Valuation Act (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91) would be of great importance in assisting that principle, it has not been brought under our notice. That section is in these terms:—"In all questions and proceedings under any Act of Parliament relating to the franchise or to the representation of the people in Parliament, it shall be sufficient to refer to an entry in the valuation-roll in force for the time, or last in force under this Act in any county or burgh, and such entry shall be received and taken in all such questions and proceedings as conclusive proof that the gross yearly rent or value of the lands or heritages specified therein is at the date of such reference, and has been from the commencement of the year to which such valuation-roll applies, of the amount therein set forth. . . ."

That section could not cover the case of new houses erected after the making up of the roll. For example, suppose that several new and valuable houses were erected during the latter part of a year, they could not be in the valuation-roll of that year. But without remarking further upon the principle, there is here no proper or reliable evidence to shew that the value of the subjects in question was not correctly stated in the valuation-roll. If the assessor entered these subjects in the valuation-roll at too low a valuation he must be held to have done so in violation or neglect of his duty; and therefore, when we find that the claimant himself had stated the value at £12, being the sum entered in the valuation-roll, I think the attempted correction by the assessor is quite inadmissible.

Oct. 21, 1872. Rutherford v. Dunn.

WILLIAM RUTHERFORD, Appellant.—Darling.
THOMAS JOHN DUNN, Respondent.—J. A. Young.

Franchise—Tenancy—Precarious Possession.—A person occupied a house, garden, and lands belonging to his brother under a verbal agreement that he should pay the taxes and feu-duties, and keep them in repair, with power to sublet. Held that the occupant had right to the franchise as tenant of the subjects.

Registration Appeal Court. B.

THE following case was stated by the Sheriff of Roxburgh (Pattison):—"William Rutherford, shoemaker in Yetholm, claimed to be entered in the register of voters for the election of a member of Parliament for the county of Roxburgh as 'tenant of house, garden, byre, and lands at Yetholm, in the parish of Yetholm.' The claim was objected to by Thomas John Dunn, a registered voter.

"It was established as matter of fact that the claimant had personally occupied the subjects specified in his claim for several years, and is now in the personal occupancy thereof. That his elder brother, who succeeded to them as heir of their father at the father's death, about eight or nine years ago, agreed with the claimant to allow him to possess the subjects, upon condition that he kept them in repair, with liberty to sublet if he thought fit, and make the most of the subjects for his own benefit. No writing passed between the parties then, or at any subsequent period. No term for which possession was to endure was mentioned, nor was any rent specified. The claimant has since personally occupied the subjects. He had never sublet the same or any part thereof, and has from time to time expended sums of money in keeping up the subjects, has paid the feu-duty of the subjects, and taxes payable by the brother as proprietor in respect thereof, and has also paid poor-rates. He has never paid any rent to the brother directly or indirectly, or has had any settlement of accounts with him in reference to his expenditure on the house and otherwise, or his possession of the house.

"In these circumstances, the claimant maintained in point of law that he had been and was in possession of the subjects as tenant, and was therefore entitled to be registered and to vote, in terms of the 6th section of 'The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868.'

"The Sheriff rejected the claim, holding that the claimant's possession was not in law that of a tenant, but a precarious possession, terminable at any time at the will of the brother, and therefore not such as the said statute (section 6) requires."

William Rutherford appealed, and argued;—Actual personal occupancy was proved. There being no written contract, the law presumed that the bargain was for a year, and was renewed from year to year by tacit relocation. The power to sublet implied power to maintain occupancy for a year.[1]

LORD ARDMILLAN.—Permission to sublet must be assumed to have been part of the bargain, according to the distinct statement to that effect made by the Sheriff in the special case, and we must hold that it is so. If permission to sublet be a condition between the proprietor and the tenant, the proprietor making such a condition could not eject a subtenant; and the man who can thus sublet must be tenant, because no man can sublet unless he himself be tenant of the subjects. Besides, the claimant has occupied on the footing of tenancy. He has paid the annual burdens and taxes which were due by his brother as proprietor, such payments by him being a consideration in lieu of rent; and if, while so doing, he also had power to sublet, there can be no doubt that his tenure is of such a nature as to entitle him to the franchise.

The case may be tested in this way: Suppose a question had arisen in the Sheriff-court between this claimant and the party from whom he derives his right, and that the latter had, after the claimant had the possession, as is here set forth, and had paid annual burdens and taxes as stated, tried to eject him summarily, the claimant could, I think, have successfully answered that, according to the true construction of the agreement, he held at least a yearly tenure of this property as tenant. As tried by that test, the construction here contended for by the claimant must, I think, be held to be the true construction.

I therefore agree with your Lordship that the Sheriff has fallen into error in the present case, and that the judgment appealed against must be reversed, and the appellant's name should be added to the roll.

LORD BENHOLME.—I agree with your Lordships.

The Sheriff here has gone upon the ground that this claimant had only a precarious possession, entitling the landlord to turn him out on a week's notice. But surely this view is quite inconsistent with the fact that the claimant got a power to sublet. This power to grant a sublease seems to me necessarily to imply that he was tenant for a year at least, and unless he got notice before Whitsunday he must be considered to have held upon tacit relocation from year to year. We must alter this finding, and remit to the Sheriff to add the claimant to the roll.

THE COURT reversed the Sheriff's judgment.

Oct. 15, 1872. Lord Advocate v. Marchioness of Lansdowne.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, First Party.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Rutherfurd.
THE MARCHIONESS of LANSDOWNE, Second Party.—Shand—Marshall.

Succession—Inventory-Duty—23 and 24 Vict. c. 80—Discharge—Confusion—Entail.—The proprietrix of an estate under a deed of entail granted a bond of annualrent for improvement outlay under the Montgomery Act in favour of herself, her "heirs, executors, successors, and assignees," on which bond infeftment was taken. It was afterwards discovered that the entail was defective, and that she held the property in fee-simple. She thereupon executed a new deed of strict entail, expressly under burden of the above mentioned bond of annualrent, but with the provision that, in the event of her making no separate conveyance of it, it should accrue to the institute or heir of entail succeeding to the estates. She died without making any such separate conveyance.

Held that the bond of annualrent did not fall to be included in the inventory of the deceased's estate, under the statute 23 and 24 Vict. c. 80, as it was not in bonis of the deceased, there never having existed a proper relation of debit and credit between the entailed estate and her.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. R.

THIS special case was brought under the Act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 56, with reference to the succession to the late Margaret Mercer Elphinstone of Aldie, Baroness Keith and Nairne and Countess de Flahault.

The Baroness Keith was the only daughter and child of the marriage between the Honourable George Keith Elphinstone and Jane Mercer. She was served heir of tailzie and provision in special to her maternal grandfather, William Mercer of Aldie, who died December 1790 in the lands of Meikleour, Kinnaird, Aldie, &c., in the county of Perth. The service was dated 16th March, and the retour was recorded 4th April 1793. The Baroness Keith, as heiress of entail in possession of the lands and estates of Aldie and Meikleour, &c., as authorised by the Court of Session, granted bond of annualrent, dated the 1st and 3d March 1851. She thereby bound and obliged herself "and the heirs of entail in their order successively succeeding to me in the foresaid entailed lands and estates of Aldie and Meikleour, &c., to make payment to myself, the said Margaret Mercer Elphinstone, Baroness Keith and Nairne, Countess de Flahault, and my heirs, executors, and assignees," of an annualrent of £485 15s. 6d., or such other annualrent or interest during her life as should correspond to the sum of £9715, 10s. 9d., being three-fourths of the sums expended by her on improvements on the said estates. Further, by the said bond the Baroness Keith bound and obliged herself "and the heirs of entail in their order successively succeeding to me in the foresaid entailed lands and estates of Aldie and Meikleour, &c., to make payment to myself, the said Margaret Mercer Elphinstone, Baroness Keith and Nairne, Countess de Flahault, and my heirs, executors, successors, and assignees, of an annualrent of £7, 2s. sterling for every £100 of the foresaid sum

f £9715, 10s. 9d., for each and every year of the full period of twenty-ve years after the day of my death, and no longer." The bond gave real xcurity over the estates of Aldie, Meikleour, &c., for both annualrents. n instrument of sasine in favour of the Baroness Keith followed on ie said bond, and was recorded in the General Register of Sasines at dinburgh the 22d July 1851.

After the execution of this bond of annualrent it was discovered that ie deeds of entail under which the Baroness Keith held the said nds of Aldie, Meikleour, &c., were defective, and that she really held as e-simple proprietrix. She accordingly, on 21st November 1866, exe-ıted a deed of strict entail comprehending the said lands and estates Aldie, Meikleour, &c., by which she conveyed the said lands to her dest daughter, the Marchioness of Lansdowne, and the other heirs of en-il therein mentioned, but reserving her own liferent of the said lands ıd estates thereby disponed, and full power and liberty to herself, at any me of her life, to alter or revoke the deed of entail in whole or in part. he disposition in the deed of entail was granted expressly under burden f the bond of annualrent already referred to, and it further contained the ollowing clause:—"And I hereby declare that in case I shall not, during my lifetime, nor by any mortis causa deed or settlement, specially dispone or convey the whole or any part or portion of the foresaid two annualrents, then the whole, or such part or portion thereof as may not have been so disponed and conveyed by me, shall accrue to the institute or heir of entail succeeding under this present deed of entail, and the lands and others above disponed shall be free and relieved from the same in all time coming." No special disposition or conveyance of the said annualrents was ever made by the Baroness Keith. She died in 1867, and was survived by two daughters, the said Marchioness of Lansdowne and the Honourable Georgina Elphinstone de Flahault. Her personal and other property not included under the foresaid deed of entail was, in terms of a trust-disposition and settlement dated 13th December 1824, equally divided between her two daughters. The elder, the Marchioness of Lansdowne, succeeded to the entailed estate of Aldie, Meikleour, &c.

In the succession-duty account delivered to the legacy and succession-duty department of the Inland Revenue on behalf of the Marchioness of Lansdowne the rental of the heritable property was stated without deduction of the annual amount of the bond of annualrent in favour of the Baroness Keith for the improvement debt of £9715, 10s. 9d. The value or amount of the bond of annualrent was not added to the inventory of the personal estate of the Baroness Keith.

In these circumstances the Lord Advocate for the Crown maintained that the disposition and deed of entail of 1866 being revocable was testamentary, and was one of the instruments forming the will of the Baroness Keith; that the bond of annualrent for the improvement debt of £9715, 10s. 9d. was a real burden on the estates of Meikleour, &c., and was money secured on heritage belonging to the Baroness Keith at the time of her death, and formed part of her succession; that the said entail of 1866 being unrevoked, and no other testamentary deed disposing of the said bond of annualrent having been made by the Baroness Keith, the said bond of annualrent was carried by the destination in the said entail to the Marchioness of Lansdowne; that the said sum of £9715, 10s. 9d. secured by the said bond of annualrent was liable to inventory-duty, and such duty was payable by the Marchioness of Lansdowne.

On the other hand, the Marchioness of Lansdowne maintained that the Baroness Keith, by the disposition and deed of entail of 1866, "freed and relieved" the entailed estates of the bond of annualrent, and th the deed of entail did not carry the bond of annualrent to her, and th the same never belonged to her, and she never had power to assign t same, or to keep the same up as a debt against the estates: Further th the estates, freed of the bond, having been conveyed to her as institu under the deed of entail, and she having paid the whole Governme duties exigible from the lands, without deducting from their value t bond of annualrent, the claim for inventory-duty on the capital of t bond of annualrent, which was not bequeathed to her either in lifere or fee, and which from the date of the deed of entail (if not also pr viously, confusione) had ceased to exist, was unfounded. Separatin Although it were held that the Baroness Keith had not discharged t bond of annualrent during her life by a formal deed, she had, under t disposition and deed of entail executed by her, effectually indicated h intention that the bond of annualrent was not to burden the estates an series of heirs called to the succession. Such intention destinatione regu lated the character of the succession and mode of payment of the duti to Government, and in the present case was equivalent to a formal di charge of the bond executed by the Baroness Keith in her lifetime.

The question submitted for the decision of the Court was whether t Marchioness of Lansdowne was liable to pay inventory-duty on the su in the bond of annualrent, under the statute 23 and 24 Vict. c. 80, a part of the succession of the Baroness Keith, deceased.

The Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) pronounced the following interlocutor:— "Finds, in answer to the question submitted for the decision of the Cou in the special case, that the Marchioness of Lansdowne is liable to pa inventory-duty on the sum in the bond of annualrent, under the statut 23d and 24th Victoria, cap. 80, as part of the succession of the Barones Keith, deceased." *

* "NOTE.—By the statute referred to it is enacted that the money secured o heritage shall be liable in inventory-duty as if it had been personal or moveabl estate.

"That the bond of annualrent in question was in itself of the nature and i the form of an heritable security is indisputable. But the defender contend that, as the entailed landed estate over which the bond bears to be heritabl secured turned out not to be entailed at all, but held in fee-simple by the Bar ness Keith, and as she was then also the creditor in the bond—or in other word as the Baroness was thus at one and the same time in right of the bond and u fettered proprietrix of the lands over which the sum in the bond was heritabl secured, the latter became extinguished confusione. It appears to the Lor Ordinary that this contention of the defender is not well founded.

"As a general principle of law it is no doubt true that when the same perso comes to be both debtor and creditor in an obligation it is to be held as e tinguished confusione. But it is equally clear, on the authorities which will b afterwards referred to, that this principle is subject to modification and exce tion according to the circumstances in which it arises.

"No alteration or revocation having been made by the Baroness the result i that the bond of annualrent in question has upon her death devolved upon he eldest daughter, the defender, as institute under the entail of 1866 of the lande estates; and in this way it may be said that the bond then came to be e tinguished confusione in the person of the defender. But the duty now claime is on the inventory, not of the defender's estate, but of that of the deceased Bar ness Keith. In these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary thinks that, in the pe son of the Baroness, the bond had not been extinguished confusione or otherwis but, on the contrary, must be held to have subsisted down to her death, as separate and independent heritable right, and that equally whether the landed estates are to be considered as entailed or unentailed when the bond was executed. It may be that while, and so long as the Baroness lived, and was herself in right both of the entailed lands and the bond of annualrent, the latter was dormant, but not extinguished; for she might, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, have destined and left it, not to the defender, but to her younger daughter, or any one else she pleased. It is true that she left it to the defender as institute in the entail of 1866, but this of itself shews that it had been down to her death a separate part of her estate, and so dealt with. Accordingly, if she had not by her deed of 1866 specially disposed of the bond in the way she did, the succession to it and to the entailed lands would have been different, the bond going to her two daughters equally, and the entailed lands devolving, in the first instance, wholly upon her elder daughter.

"The views entertained by the Lord Ordinary, in regard to this case, as now explained, are supported, he thinks, by the authorities—Stair i. 8, 19; Ersk. iii. 5, 27; and Bell's Principles, sec. 580. According to these authorities, it is clear that confusio does not always, when the two rights come to be vested in the same person, effect an extinction of either right. Thus, in the words of Mr Erskine—'Sometimes it produces only a temporary suspension of it, while the debtor and creditor continue one and the same person, or while the same person is entitled to the succession of the two several rights from the different destinations of which the confusio flows. But when the succession of these rights happens again to divide in two, the obligation or right which lay for a while sunk or dormant confusione revives and recovers its first force—(Stair, December 21, 1680; Cuninghame (Dict., p. 3038), January 4th, 1726; Cumin (Dict., p. 3042), cited (folio) Dict. i. p. 196; Stair, i. 18, 9). Hence the conveyance of a debt affecting an entailed estate in favour of the heir of entail and his heirs whomsoever does not import a perpetual extinction of the debt. The debt is indeed dormant during the life of the disponee; but if the heir-at-law and the heir of entail happen at any time after to be different persons the ground of the extinction, or rather of the suspension, ceaseth, and consequently the debt will revive in the person of the heir-at-law against the heir of entail, for it is considered as a separate estate in the absolute power of the heir who purchased it, and affectable by his creditors—Fac. Coll., ii. 63, art. 2 (Gordon, Dec. 1, 1757, Dict., p. 11,164). Nay, though the deed assigning the debt to the heir of entail should also contain a discharge of it in his favour, as having made the payment, the discharge hath not the effect of extinguishing it confusione, seeing that part of the deed which assigns it is a sufficient indication of the heir's intention that it should still continue to subsist in his person—Fac. Coll. ii., 101 (Kerr v. Turnbull, February 15, 1758, Dict., p. 15,551).' Mr Bell states the same doctrine thus:—'Where the creditor has an interest to keep up the debt, it is held to be suspended, not extinguished. So the debt may be assigned, and money borrowed on it; or it may be kept up for the benefit of children, as by an heir of entail; or in contemplation of a divergence of the lines of succession, it may be made available to a particular heir,'—and both the learned authors refer for illustrations of the doctrine they state to numerous decided cases.

"It was argued, however, for the defender, that the doctrine and decided cases referred to can have no application except where one of the rights relates to an entailed estate, the destination of which is beyond the power of the proprietor to alter. It no doubt appears to be true that in most of the decided cases the question has arisen where one of the rights related to an entailed estate; but the doctrine, as stated by the commentators, is not limited to such cases, and the decisions do not in every instance relate to entailed estates. For example, in the case of Lady Halgreen v. Burnett, 30th July 1702, vol. iv. of the sum in the bond of annualrent, under the statute 23 and 24 Vict. c. 80, as part of the succession of the Baroness Keith, deceased. The clause under which the claim is made is in these terms :—"All money secured on heritable property in Scotland, and all money secured by Scottish bonds and other instruments excluding executors, and all money secured by Scottish bonds or other instruments the rights to which shall be taken excluding executors, constituting the succession or part of the succession of any person who shall have died after the 3d day of April in the year 1860, shall be liable to inventory-duty under the said recited Act." The 2d clause of the Act is that the said duty, with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent from the expiry of six months after the death of such deceased person, shall be a debt to Her Majesty, and shall be payable by any and every person who shall take any money secured as aforesaid, constituting the succession or part of the succession of any person deceased, and that whether he shall take the same as having a beneficial interest therein, or as trustee, or in any other capacity, and whether he shall have an absolute right or only a liferent or life interest or other limited right or interest therein, and whether he shall take the same by mortis causa conveyance or by special destination or by inheritance."

Lord Advocate v. Marchioness of Lansdowne.

The question is, whether the money which is said to have been secured, viz., the sum of £9715 contained in this bond of annualrent, is within the first clause,—in the first place, whether it secured a sum of money on heritable property, and in the second place, whether it constituted part of the succession of the Baroness Keith. The state in which the right and interest of Lady Keith stood at the date of her death was simply this, that she was the uncontrolled proprietrix of the whole of that estate on which it is alleged that this burden had been laid and this money secured. These bonds were executed for the purpose of making a burden on an entailed estate in respect of certain moneys expended on improvements, on the footing and supposition that the estate was limited by fetters, when in point of fact these fetters were entirely null. The way in which Lady Keith dealt with these bonds is this : she executed a new entail upon the footing that the former entail was defective in the solemnities required by the law. The new entail is substantially the same as the previously existing one, and keeps alive the feudal investiture which had been taken under the bond at the time when it was thought that that was necessary to make it a burden upon the fee of the estate, but with this provision that unless she shall leave the bond and the money secured by it to any one else, it is on her death to cease and determine absolutely, leaving the institute or heir of entail in full possession of the unburdened estate. Now, whatever effect might have been given to any conveyance or deed in favour of a third party under which Lady Keith might have tried to create a new burden, or to impose on the heir in possession the burden of these bonds, I have come to be very clearly of opinion that upon the facts as they actually occurred, and under these instruments, there was no rela-

Brown's Supplement, p. 533, where it was held that one having first acquired an infeftment of annualrent and then the right of property, he was entitled to use both as separate rights, the property was not entailed.

"The defender, besides maintaining that the authorities and cases which have been now referred to, were favourable rather than adverse to her, cited and seemed to rely on the case of Burnett v. Burnett, 30th April 1766 (Paton's Appeals, vol. ii., p. 122). The principles of decision, however, in that case appear to be inapplicable to the circumstances of the present. The destination of both the rights there, although expressed in different terms, were held to result in the same thing ; and it was on this ground, and having regard to what clearly appeared to be the intention of the party, that no separate estate was to be kept up, it was decided that confusio had taken effect.

"For the reasons which have now been explained, the Lord Ordinary has, although not without difficulty, come to the conclusion that the question in the special case ought to be answered favourably for the Crown, and he has accordingly so answered it."

ion of debit or credit at all between Lady Keith and the estate of which she was the absolute proprietor, and that as there was no such relation there was no right in which she was a creditor secured upon this heritable property, and consequently that there was no money so secured which did or could form any part of her succession. Whether a person holding in fee-simple could create such a relation is a matter involving some subtlety, into which I think we need not enter, but the substance of the thing is beyond all doubt, viz., that the bond of annualrent in substance effected nothing. It effected nothing during Lady Keith's life, for she had the whole uncontrolled property of the estate, and it effected nothing after her death, for the moment Lady Keith died the whole thing came to an end. No one had any beneficial interest in it. No doubt if it had been a separate debt heritably secured over this estate, and there had been such declaration in a settlement by a party entitled to make the declaration that it should cease and determine in favour of the heir, that might have been the case put to us a legatum liberationis, but that is not at all the nature of this case. The fact is that these bonds were executed under a misapprehension in point of law and also in point of fact, and when Lady Keith died she was in possession of this estate on which the succession-duty is payable, but the money secured by the bonds was no part of her succession. Therefore, as the question is put in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court, I am for finding in favour of Lady Lansdowne, in the question put to us, that she is not liable to pay inventory-duty on the sum in the bond of annualrent.

Lord Cowan.—I concur with your Lordship in thinking that there were several points brought into the argument in this case which we do not require to solve in giving the judgment which must be pronounced. As regards the question of creating, in the terms here employed, a burden upon an estate which the party has in absolute property, I do not wish to express any opinion whatever. I am very far from thinking that it may not be within the power of a party so to deal with the succession to his estate as to enable him to give over a burden so created on the estate to a third party, and to leave it as a burden upon the heir to whom he gives the estate itself. We do not require to consider that question. Had there been an assignation of the bond of annualrent in favour of a third party the state of the rights of parties under the Revenue Acts would just have been this—that the value of the estate taken in absolute property would have suffered a deduction, to the extent of the burden so created upon the succession, in the question as to the succession-duty; and then the party who got the benefit of the assigned bond of annualrent would have been liable in the succession-duty for the sum that he took under the assigned bond of annualrent. But with that we have no concern whatever in this argument. That was not the state in which this lady left her estate to be taken by her heirs and representatives. On the contrary, it is impossible for me to read the clause in the deed of entail to which our attention was so frequently called without being convinced that the estate was left absolutely unaffected by any burden whatever in favour of her daughter, seeing it is there said that, unless there should be an assignation of the bond of annualrent (which there never was), the lands would be entirely free and relieved from the bond in all time coming. The Baroness Keith had power to make such a declaration. That is undisputed. And therefore the estate was really left unburdened and free of the bond of annualrent, to be taken by her eldest daughter as absolute and uncontrolled fiar. Now, in that condition of matters, how can it be said that there was here money, secured over the estate in terms of the statute, which fell to be included in the inventory given up of the lady's succession. That is the first point; and as to it I think Mr Shand's argument was good; but in the second place, under the same clause of the statute it required to be a part of the succession of the lady; and upon the same footing I hold that there was no succession to the bond of annualrent, and never could be, because it terminated the moment the lady died without having assigned that annualrent. Therefore, upon the whole matter, from an early part of this argument, I came to be quite satisfied that we had to deal here really in principle and in substance with nothing else than this,—a reserved power to burden the estate which was given by the deed, if the granter thought fit thereafter to burden the succession so given to the party who is disponee; and undoubtedly a reserved power to burden, if not exercised, ceases to have any existence at the death of the party who has the power. Upon the same ground it seems to me that, in principle, we must deal with the question that is now before us, and that we have no ground for holding that there was here an estate created, which required to be destroyed by confusion. Upon that point I do not enter into the argument of the Lord Ordinary at all. I cannot understand that view of the case, because there was no proper debtor and creditor to give rise to the doctrine of confusion so as to extinguish this bond of annualrent. That would have raised an entirely different question if it had existed here, but I go simply upon the grounds I have stated in holding that, in the state in which this lady left her succession, there was nothing to be given up in the inventory of her estate under the statute as being liable for inventory-duty.

Lord Advocate v. Marchioness of Lansdowne

Lord Benholme.—The bond of annualrent about which we have heard so much in this case was executed with reference to the Montgomery Act; and the object of the Montgomery Act is to enable a proprietor who holds an estate under fetters, when laying out money in a particular way, to secure to the proprietor's representatives, who may be supposed not to be his or her heirs of entail, the amount, or a certain portion of the amount, of moneys so laid out by executing a bond of this kind. It is held that if that expenditure gives benefits to a special class of disponees who are protected by the fetters of a good entail this is the statutory method of affecting their interests, by making them liable to pay the annuity under the bond. Now, in this case, there is no room for that view, and no room for the application of the law by which the doctrine of confusion is excluded, because there are no parties here entitled, under the protection of the fetters, to be considered as heirs of entail in the sense of the Montgomery Act. I look upon this bond as having been executed under a mere false impression of the Act, and to be no better than if the granter had been the fee-simple proprietor, without any entail at all, or any destination at all upon her estate. The mere circumstance that her estate is destined to heirs-male, for instance, does not make it a fettered estate; and it is against fetters, and with reference to fetters and the necessity of overcoming these fetters, that the whole operation of the Montgomery Act is directed. Now, having said so much on that point, I must say that I quite agree with your Lordship that this bond had no effect at all, either in favour of or against Lady Keith. It had no effect in her favour in conveying to her a right which she herself was debtor in. It was conveying to her an estate which she held simply, and she might have altered the destination at her pleasure. There was no use of fettering such a bond, which had no effect, and consequently I look upon it that it was no benefit to her on the one hand, and no burden upon her on the other, either upon her or upon her estate. The Act of Parliament, I think, clearly requires that the money secured in the way contemplated by the statute was a part of the succession of the lady, with reference to whom inventory-duty is to be paid. Inventory-duty suggests that it is an inventory of something that belonged to the deceased, and that is taken up by her representatives,—it may be her trustees, or it may be her general representatives; but it is something that belonged to her, and that is the estate which forms part of her goods. Now, can it be said that this estate was of that kind? I think it neither belonged to her, nor was debtor to her in any way; and consequently I think it is perfectly plain that inventory-duty cannot be charged upon a thing she never had any interest in at all, and which could only come into operation as a debt, or as money secured upon her death, and in consequence of some peculiar provision that she contemplated. I think it is impossible to say that that formed part of her succession. On these grounds, I think there has been an entire mistake here, and that the question contained in the case should be answered as your Lordship suggests.

Lord Advocate v. Marchioness of Lansdowne.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. This case has been complicated r introducing into it questions as to confusion which forms an important part of ir law, and in so far as regards the general principles applicable to that matter am inclined to hold with the Lord Ordinary that there is a strong equity in pplying those principles to all cases where there is a substantial interest to do . But the principle is, that in certain events where rights have merged into e they should be capable of being kept separate. Where there is a substanal interest in the party I would extend that principle as far as possible, not nly in cases of entail, but in other cases. There are various rights that ought be kept separate, although they come into the person of the same individual,— , for instance, in a ranking and sale; when a creditor gets a decree of sale he ot only gets that decree but he gets a virtual or expressed assignation to all e adjudications, and all the heritable securities that exist over that estate in vour of his debtor's creditors, so that he may resort to them at any time to efend himself equitably against the claims of other parties. The same thing ccurs in other cases. It is competent to preserve these rights separate, so as to e capable of separate assertion, and he may ascribe his title to any of them to btain what is reasonable and equitable in his defence of it. These are cases by hich debts that would otherwise run into one are prevented from being extinuished by confusio; but a thing cannot and need not be extinguished before t exists. Now, I know no case in which a party becomes his own debtor in a ond of this kind, heritable or moveable, or whatever it may be, even although he adds at the end of it, "I bind myself and my heirs-male to pay to myself and my heirs-female £1000," which virtually imports this: "I bind myself after I am dead to pay to myself that sum." That is a thing I never heard of. A man may, by conveyance or by other means, say, "I bind my heirs-male to pay to my heirs-general after my death" so and so; but that is another affair. That is not a regular bond, but it may become binding upon both parties, if it is made in connection with grounds or conditions that will compel the parties in justice to fulfil the wish so expressed. That is a different thing; but for any one to bind himself or herself after death to pay to himself or herself a certain sum of money, and to say that that obligation is in bonis of him or her, seems to be a great absurdity. In point of fact it is nonsense. Now, that is the general aspect of this matter according to the view that is taken of it, that of debtor and creditor; but when we come to the other question, it resolves itself into this—Is this a part of the succession which in any right sense was vested in Lady Keith, and after her death was to descend to her representatives of some kind? It cannot be a part of her succession, unless it is first in bonis of her, and I cannot see that it was ever in bonis of Lady Keith. She could have done nothing in any way to enforce it. It is a mere fiction, so far as that is concerned; and if not in bonis of her, it cannot become a part of her succession on which duty is to be paid. It may be a revelation or expression of will, valid or invalid, by which after her death certain rights in her property are to take effect, but the rights are not to take effect in her lifetime, and they are mere rights of property affecting an estate, and have no reference to money which is to come into her possession. Upon these grounds I think it plain that there is nothing here in bonis of Lady Lansdowne which can be the subject of a claim such as is here made.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor complained of, and find that the Marchioness of Lansdowne is not liable to pay inventory-duty on the sum in the bond of annualrent dated 1st and 3d March 1851, under the statute 23 and 24 Vict. c. 80, as part of the succession of the Baroness Keith, deceased, and decern: Find the reclaimer entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

City of Edinburgh v. Montgomery.

THE CITY OF EDINBURGH, Objectors.—Watson—M'Laren.
WILLIAM MONTGOMERY, Common Agent in the Locality of St Cuthberts, Respondent.—Adam—Gloag.

Teinds—Locality—Res Judicata.—Held that a judgment in a question between two heritors given effect to by a final locality was res judicata in a subsequent locality in a question between the common agent and one of these heritors.

Teinds—Locality—Old Stipend.—Opinion (per Lord Cowan) that when an augmentation of stipend is granted, the allocation of the old stipend remains fixed and falls to be taken as the first step in the new locality.

Teinds—Locality.—In a process of locality a heritor whose teinds were not valued for stipend was localled upon an admitted rental of £409. In a subsequent locality he alleged that the rental was now less, and that the teinds were exhausted. The Court held that the heritor was entitled to a proof of his averment that the rental was diminished.

2D DIVISION. Lord Gifford. Teind Clerk.

IN the locality of the stipend of the parish of St Cuthberts, modified in 1821, approved of as final by interlocutor dated 4th February 1864, the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh were localled on as follows:—

	BARLEY. B. F. P. L.
"For lands of Lochbank and others, . .	18 1 2 0
	MEAL.
For lands of Bruntsfield Links and the Meadows,	70 0 2 2½"

A new augmentation having been granted in 1862 the common agent proposed in the interim locality to local on the Magistrates for the above amounts as old stipend, and for 3 0 1 1 meal, and 3 0 1 1 barley, as augmentation for the lands of Bruntsfield Links and the Meadows, treating the teinds of "Lochbank and others" as exhausted.

In so localling on Bruntsfield Links and the Meadows the common agent assumed the rental to be £409 in terms of a judicial admission made by the Magistrates in the previous process of locality.

The Magistrates of Edinburgh now objected that as appeared from various documents produced, of the 18 1 2 0 of old stipend localled on "Lochbank and others," 8 bolls only were applicable to the lands of Lochbank, and that the remaining 10 1 2 0 was truly applicable to the lands of Bruntsfield Links and the Meadows, and that that amount added to the amount of 70 0 2 2½, localled on these lands exhausted these teinds. The Magistrates, therefore, objected (objection 8) to the interim locality, and craved that the scheme of locality in the present process be rectified as follows:—

	BARLEY. B. F. P. L.
"Lochbank, per locality of 1805, . . .	8 0 0 0
Bruntsfield Links and Meadows, per do., . .	10 1 2 0
	MEAL.
Do. do. per locality of 1821-64, .	70 0 2 2¼"

The respondent, the common agent, stated,—"In the process of locality of the stipend modified in 1821 the city appeared and objected to Bruntsfield Links and the Meadows and the lands of Lochbank being localled on for stipend, on the ground that they were not teindable subjects, and never were so. A record was made up between the objectors and Mr Learmonth of Dean, a heritor in the parish. On 12th May 1858 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor in which he, inter alia, that the lands of Bruntsfield Links and the Meadows, belonging ity of Edinburgh, are teindable; that the rental thereof has been ly admitted to be £409 per annum, and that one-fifth part of such d rental falls to be taken as teind: Finds that the old stipend in 1805 appears to have been, and ought now to be, held as being out of the teinds of certain lands known as the lands of Loch-nd others belonging to the city of Edinburgh;' and with these he remitted the process to the clerk to frame a correct scheme of in accordance therewith. This interlocutor, in so far as regards ıdings, was adhered to by the Inner-House, First Division, on 1st 59 (21 D. 890). A scheme of locality was accordingly framed by k in accordance with these findings, which was thereafter, on 4th y 1864, approved of as final, and is the basis on which the interim in the present process was framed."

s pleaded for the city of Edinburgh, objectors;—1. The proceedich took place in the former process of locality did not constitute ata as regards the question now at issue—(1) because the present ı was not raised, far less discussed and determined, in the last of locality; and (2) because the respondent in the present pros did not represent, officially or otherwise, either of the parties to ner proceedings. 2. The documents set forth in the objections hed that the stipend in question was payable for the lands of rs and Bruntsfield Links, as well as for the lands of Lochbank, and the proportions set forth in the objections.

ıs pleaded for the common agent, respondent;—1. The objections o be repelled, in respect that it was not the fact that any part of stipend of 18 b. 1 f. 2 p. was payable or paid for Bruntsfield nd the Meadows. 2. It was res judicata that the lands of Bruntsnks and the Meadows paid no part of the said old stipend.

Lord Ordinary, on 11th June 1872, pronounced an interlocutor ıg the objections for the city of Edinburgh.*

OTE.—The Lord Ordinary has carefully looked into the old localities, documents relative thereto, so far as the same are accessible, and he has be of opinion that the city's objections are ill founded, and that no part 8 b. 1 f. 2 p. 0 l. of old stipend is really applicable to the teinds of the s and Bruntsfield Links. But he is further of opinion that even were rise the question is excluded by the judgments in this locality, or in nediately preceding, first by the Lord Ordinary on 12th May 1858, and by the Inner-House on 1st June 1859.

h the pleas of the common agent in the present record seem therefore nded, and the Lord Ordinary on both grounds has repelled the objec- the city.

The first plea in order, though last stated, is that of res judicata.

s quite fixed that a question, whether of law or fact, decided in foro con- and causa cognita in one locality is binding on all concerned in subsecalities of the same parish—See Blantyre v. Earl of Wemyss, 22d May 5 S. 1009, and the recent case of Graham Bonar v. The Lord Advocate, 1870, 9 M. 58. Even admissions by a common agent in one locality en held binding on the heritors in future localities, at least where they the interests of parties who had both right and interest at the time to them—Earl of Hopetoun v. Ramsay, H. L., 22d May 1846, 5 Bell's , 69; Duke of Buccleuch v. Common Agent, Inveresk, 10th Nov. 1868, . Now, in the locality of St Cuthberts it was finally decided both by l Ordinary and the Court 'that the lands of Bruntsfield Links and the s, belonging to the city of Edinburgh, are teindable; that the rental has been judicially admitted to be £409 per annum, and that one-fifth

The objectors reclaimed, and at the debate in the Inner-House they proposed to amend their record, to the effect of adding a statement that, since the final locality of 1864, the rental of Bruntsfield Links and the Meadows, confessed to in 1858 as £409, had considerably fallen, and that, even assuming that they formed no part of the subjects localled on as "Lochbank and others," their teind was now more than exhausted by the 70 b. 0 f. 2 p. 2¼ l. meal laid upon them in that locality, and craving to be allowed to lead proof of the present rental of the lands.[1] of such admitted rental falls to be taken as teind: Finds that the old stipend localled in 1805, appears to have been and ought now to be held as being payable out of the teinds of certain lands known as the lands of Lochbank and others belonging to the city of Edinburgh.' This was in substance a finding that no part of the old stipend localled in 1805, which was just the 18 b. 1 f. 2 p. 0 l., was applicable to Bruntsfield Links and the Meadows, for these last were found teindable for the first time in 1858, and directed to be localled upon to the extent of a fifth of £409. In 1858 the city strenuously contended that the Meadows and Bruntsfield Links were not teindable, and had never paid teind at all. The expression 'and others' is fully accounted for, for it is undeniable that in 1805 the city had many lands subject to teinds which do not appear by their specific names. It seems to the Lord Ordinary to be too late now to maintain that the Meadows and Bruntsfield Links had all along, at least from 1805, paid teind along with Lochbank.

"(2) But in point of fact the 18 b. 1 f. 2 p. 0 l. of barley laid upon 'Lochbank and others' is traced and accounted for without any part thereof being localled on the Meadows and Bruntsfield Links.

"So far back as 1708 there was laid on the lands of Lochbank 5 bolls of bere and 3 bolls of bere. These lands then belonged to Hepburn and Anderson's heirs, but that they were parts of the lands of Lochbank, afterwards the city's, is clear from the disposition to the city in 1716, No. 457 of process, and from other evidence. This accounts for the eight bolls barley which is laid upon the lands of Lochbank in 1805. Barley seems to have been taken as interchangeable with or equivalent to bere, as appears from comparing various entries in the old localities. Again, in the same locality of 1708, there is laid on the lands of Newhaven (and Newhaven is evidently a large district comprehending Trinity and Warriston), 'formerly pertaining to the heirs of Mr James Pillans,' 3 b. 1 f. 2 p. bere. In the rental of 1803 there appear lands belonging to the city of Edinburgh, localled upon for 3 b. 1 f. 2 p. barley, and, assuming barley and bere to be interchangeable, there are no other lands excepting those formerly of James Pillans' heirs to which this precise allocation is applicable. Then, in the locality of 1805 there appear lands belonging to the city of Edinburgh.

"Old stipend, ...	3	1	2	0
"Barley—augmentation then first laid on, .	7	0	0	0	barley.
"In all,	10	1	2	0	do.
"Add Lochbank,	8	0	0	0	do.
"Making the whole old stipend, . .	18	1	2	0	do.

"But this is just the old allocation now in dispute, and it seems quite plain that no part of it is laid upon the Meadows or Bruntsfield Links. There are other items of evidence pointing to the same result, but it is unnecessary to go into further detail."

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On the first question which was argued before us, namely, as to what subjects were included under the words "Lochbank and others" in the old locality, I think we must adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, so far at least as to repel the eighth objection stated for the city of Edinburgh. The reason first given by the Lord Ordinary sufficiently determines the point so as to render it unnecessary for me to enter upon the evidence. Oct. 16, 1872. City of Edinburgh v. Montgomery.

There remains, however, a point which was raised for the first time before us, and was not dealt with by the Lord Ordinary.

There being no valuation of the lands, a fifth of the actual rental was taken as the teind in the last locality. The objectors say that the rental has since diminished, and that the sum localled upon them in the last locality now exhausts their teind. The question is, whether they are entitled to an inquiry into the state of their actual rental with a view of shewing that their teind is thus exhausted. This is a matter on which the decision in the former locality does not preclude inquiry. I think therefore that before further answer we should allow the objectors an opportunity of leading evidence as to the amount of their present actual rental.

LORD COWAN.—On the general question I concur in what your Lordship has said. I do not see that we can do otherwise than repel these objections, as the Lord Ordinary has done. We cannot go back on the principle upon which the stipend was calculated and stated in former localities. The old stipend is held to be thereby finally adjudicated in any new process of augmentation and locality subsequently brought. There is no declarator or reduction, or any new process before us which can interfere with what has been fixed by the decree of locality last pronounced by this Court. Unless a reduction or some such process be brought neither the Teind-Clerk nor the Court can do otherwise than accept the old locality as it stands as the first step towards making up a new locality for allocation of the augmented stipend.

It is a totally different question when it comes to be decided what part, if any, of the present augmentation shall be localled upon these particular lands of Bruntsfield Links and the Meadows. On that question I agree that we can do nothing until we have a valuation of the teinds of the lands, proceeding on the existing rental. The objectors are entitled to lead a valuation if so advised.

LORDS BENHOLME and NEAVES concurred.

The case was adjourned to allow the Magistrates to consider whether they would move for a proof as to the present rent of their lands or bring a process of valuation of the teinds.

The Magistrates having intimated that they did not intend to move for a proof, but intended to bring a valuation,

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Refuse the reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Repel the objection No. 8: Allow additional expenses to the common agent since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and reserve to the reclaimers to lead a valuation of their teinds, and allow the amendment of the record referred to in the interlocutor of 3d July last to be withdrawn."

James Yates Simpson, writer, Largs, was on 2d June 1855 appointed judicial factor on the estate of the late Mr Robert Lowe, teacher of dancing.

The present petition was presented by Mrs Anne Lowe and her husband, who were beneficiaries under the settlement, for removal of the judicial factor, and for a new appointment. The prayer of the petition then proceeded:—"And thereafter to ordain the said James Yates Simpson to lodge a full and complete continuation of his accounts, as judicial factor foresaid, since 14th January 1868; and to remit to the Junior Lord Ordinary to ascertain the state thereof, and the balance due thereon by the said respondent; and to decern and ordain him, and his said cautioner, to make payment to the judicial factor to be appointed under this petition of such balance when ascertained."

Mr Simpson was removed from his office as judicial factor by the Court, and Mr Robert Cameron Cowan, C.A., appointed in his place on 19th May 1871, the petition, quoad ultra, being remitted to the Lord Ordinary to inquire and report.

On 19th July 1871 Lord Mackenzie ordained the late factor to lodge his accounts, and remitted to Mr A. W. Robertson, C.A., Edinburgh, to examine and audit the same and to report.

The accounts from January 1868 till October 1871 were lodged in November 1871.

On 1st March 1872 Mr Robertson issued a report fixing the balance due, and, inter alia, instructing that Mr Simpson failed to lodge with the clerk of the process, as required by the Act of Sederunt under which he held his appointment, accounts of charge and discharge of his intromissions for the two years ending the 14th day of January 1870, and has consequently made himself "liable to such mulct as the Lords of Session shall modify, not being under a half year's salary."

By the Act of Sederunt of 13th February 1730, concerning factors appointed by the Lords, it is enacted (section 2), "That every factor shall, within six months after extracting his factory, make a distinct and special rental of the estate committed to his management, and lodge the same in the hands of the clerk to the Act appointing and authorising him to be factor on the said estate, where it shall lie, and be made furthcoming, and the inspection and perusal thereof to be allowed unto all persons having interest, without fee or reward, to the end the same may be examined, and the said factor charged thereby, or otherwise, as shall be found just;" and (section 4) that "such factor shall, once every year give in a scheme of his accounts, charge and discharge, to the clerk afore-said, that all concerned may have access to see and examine, and provide themselves with proper means of checking the same, wherein if the said factor fail he shall be liable to such a mulct as the Lords shall modify, not being under an half year's salary."

The commission charged by the factor in his accounts for the two years amounted to £22, 19s. 11d., one-half whereof is £11, 9s. 10d.

The Lord Ordinary reported to Inner-House.

The petitioners moved the Court to impose a penalty in terms of the Act of Sederunt, and contended that the late factor should be mulcted in a penalty amounting, at least, to half a year's salary of each of the two years for which he had failed to lodge accounts.[1]

No appearance was made for Mr Simpson.

LORD PRESIDENT.—My Lords, this argument having been ex parte we were naturally anxious to be quite sure whether the point were settled by decision. Oct. 19, 1872. Lowe.

It is now clear that it has been decided in several cases that the minimum fine is one half of each year's salary during which the accounts are not lodged.

It is unnecessary to go into the previous cases, but in that of Nairne on 4th March 1863, reported in 1 Macph. 515, I myself delivered the judgment of the Court, and though, from the report in Macpherson, there might be a doubt as to whether the factor was mulcted for one year only or for each year, it must be for each year, because the Lord Ordinary says so very distinctly in his note, and if I had differed from him I should have remarked upon it. My recollection is fortified by the report in the Scottish Jurist,[1] from which it appears that I distinctly stated that the fine was to be for each year. And upon reference to the session papers I find that the Jurist report must be correct, because from these it appears that there was a balance due to the factor of £32, 3s. 6d., and yet the sum we decerned against him for, as appears from the interlocutor printed in Macpherson's report, was £195, 2s., which, though of course partly interest, must be mainly the mulct. I am satisfied, therefore, that the case of Nairne is a direct authority on this point; and following as it does on a series of previous decisions, there can be no doubt as to the construction of the section of the Act of Sederunt.

It is plain that Simpson must suffer loss of one-half of his commission for each of the three years from 1868.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with your Lordship that this point is quite settled by previous decisions.

It is perhaps a pity that the Act of Sederunt should have been so construed, because it might have been better to deal with each particular case by itself. The Act has, however, now been frequently under consideration, and its construction is fixed.

LORD KINLOCH was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the said James Yates Simpson failed to lodge his account for each of the two years ending 14th January 1870, in terms of the Act of Sederunt of 13th February 1730; therefore mulct the said James Yates Simpson in the sum of £11, 9s. 10d., being one-half of his commission for the said two years, in terms of the said Act of Sederunt: Find that the balance due by the said James Yates Simpson on his intromissions, in terms of the accountant's report, No. 114 of process, is £3, 1s., which, with the said mulct of £11, 9s. 10d., makes the sum due by him to the trust-estate mentioned in the proceedings amount to £14, 10s. 10d., and decern against the said James Yates Simpson for payment to Robert Cameron Cowan, the present judicial factor on the said trust-estate, of the said sum of £14, 10s. 10d. sterling: Find the said James Yates Simpson and his cautioner liable in the expenses of the petition, in so far as not already found due; allow an account thereof," &c.

Greig v. Greig.

GREIG AND OTHERS (Mr and Mrs Greig's Marriage-Contract Trustees), First Parties.—Millar—Watson.
GREIG AND OTHERS (Mr Greig's Testamentary Trustees), Second Parties.—Lord-Adv. Young—Asher.

Tutors and Curators—Statute 1696, c. 8—Deathbed.—A father appointed his testamentary trustees to be tutors and curators to his children, declaring that if the nomination should fall, a prior nomination of tutors and curators should take effect. The second nomination having fallen as regarded the appointment of curators, not having been executed in liege poustie, held that the nomination of tutors subsisted, the nomination of tutors and curators being separate.

GEORGE GREIG of Eccles, in his marriage-contract, appointed his marriage-contract trustees to be tutors and curators to the children of the marriage. Afterwards, in his trust-disposition and deed of settlement, of date 22d May 1869, he revoked this nomination, and appointed the trustees under the trust-disposition to be tutors and curators, "declaring that if from any cause the nomination of tutors and curators contained in this deed shall not take effect or be set aside, then I expressly declare that the nomination of tutors and curators as contained in my said contract of marriage shall stand, and be of full force and effect."

Mr Greig died on 19th June 1869, leaving a son, James Lewis Greig, and two other children, all in pupillarity. The trust-deed was reduced on behalf of the son as heir-at-law on the ground of deathbed. The question then arose, whether, the nomination of curators in the trust-deed being invalid, as not being executed in liege poustie, in terms of the Act 1696, c. 8, and the deed having been reduced quoad the heir-at-law, the nomination of tutors therein made fell also, and whether in consequence the prior nomination of tutors revived quoad the whole children of the marriage, or at least quoad the heir-at-law, James Lewis Greig.

A special case was presented by the marriage-contract trustees of the first part and the testamentary trustees of the second part.

Argued for the first parties, the marriage-contract trustees;—The nomination is a joint nomination of tutors and curators, which must stand or fall in toto. The father's intention was that the guardianship of his children should be continuous and undivided. But if the second parties are preferred to the office of tutors, there will be one set of guardians for the children in their pupillarity, and another set in their minority, and when the eldest child reaches minority there will be one set for him and another for the younger children.

Argued for the second parties, the trustees under the trust-disposition;—The nomination of tutors and curators is joint ex figura verborum merely. This is shewn by the provisions of the Act 1696, c. 8, which allows parties to accept the office of tutors and decline that of curators. Even if the children who have attained minority should have different guardians from those who are in pupillarity this is no grave objection, being a matter of everyday occurrence.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is no difficulty in this case up to a certain point, for it is clear that the nomination of curators in Mr Greig's trust-disposition and settlement is not a good one. But the question arises, whether the nomination of tutors must fall along with it. When Mr Greig made the nomination of tutors and curators he knew it to be doubtful whether it would be good to the full extent; but I cannot doubt that he meant it should stand good to the extent to which he could make it good. I am therefore of opinion that the testamentary trustees are entitled to the office of tutors both to James Lewis Greig and the younger children of the marriage.

No. 7.
Oct. 19, 1872
Greig v. Greig

LORD COWAN.—I am clearly of opinion that this is a separable nomination. As I read the Act 1696, c. 8, which gave power to fathers in liege poustie to nominate curators to their children, that statute contemplated that there might be separate nominations of tutors and curators. In this relation that clause is exceedingly important, which says that where the same parties are appointed to the two offices, i.e. by the same deed—for that must be inferred—it shall be in their power to accept the tutory and decline the curatory. Apart from that, I cannot think that we are to refuse effect to Mr Greig's nomination of tutors because his nomination of curators cannot take effect, not having been made in liege poustie. In the trust-disposition and deed of settlement he declares that if this nomination of tutors and curators shall fall, the nominations of the tutors and curators in the marriage-contract shall stand. The right construction of this clause is that the testamentary trustees shall be tutors, and if their nomination as curators shall fall then there may be a failure of curators altogether, or else the first parties shall take the office of curators if they please. But what shall happen at the expiration of the tutory is not a matter on which we are now called upon to give an opinion.

LORD BENHOLME.—If I thought that the effect of the two deeds taken together was that the office of tutor goes to the testamentary trustees and the office of curators falls altogether, that would be inconsistent with the father's wishes, for he wished the management to be harmonious. He desired the guardians to be persons of his appointment, and the same persons to fill both offices. Now, I am not prepared to say that when the tutory expires the parties nominated in the first deed will be entitled to the office of curators. It is this which creates a doubt in my mind. At the same time I do not dissent from the judgment proposed, viz., that the testamentary trustees are entitled to the office of tutors.

LORD NEAVES.—I have considerable difficulty in this case. The question is not as to the power of the father to make separate nominations, but as to his meaning. He meant the same parties to be tutors and curators. In both deeds the parties named as tutors and curators are the same. If Mr Greig's meaning was that if there was a partial failure of the nomination in the second deed there should be a partial adoption of the first that could so easily have been said that the absence of such a statement seems to me very important. I have great difficulty, but at the same time I agree with your Lordships that the nomination of tutors and curators is separable. It is plain that the nomination of tutors and curators is not a concurrent or simultaneous appointment. It is a present nomination of the one, and a prospective nomination of the other.

As to the nomination of curators, I doubt whether that nomination in the first deed revives. The statute has said that a tutor accepting may decline to be a curator, but I never heard of one who declined the office of tutor and afterwards accepted that of curator.

On the whole, I concur with your Lordships. I think that the nomination of tutors and the nomination of curators not only are separable, but are separate.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the special case are of opinion and find that the first parties are not entitled to the office of tutors of James Lewis Greig, and that the second parties are entitled to that office: Further, that the first parties are not entitled to the office of tutors of the younger children, and that the second parties are entitled to that office; and authorise the expenses incurred in connection with this special case to be paid out of the heritable estate, and remit to the Auditor," &c.

Testament—Mutual Settlement—Revocation.—By mutual settlement each of two sisters conveyed her estates, heritable and moveable, to the other in liferent in case she should survive, and to a nephew in fee, reserving "full power to us at any time during our joint lives to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part as we may see proper." Held that the mutual deed was simply testamentary, and could be altered by the surviving sister in so far as regarded her own estate.

Testament—Legatum rei Alienæ—Surrogatum.—A person who was proprietrix of one pro indiviso half of a house, and had the liferent of the other half, in the belief that the whole belonged to her, disponed it mortis causa to a beneficiary.

Held that the beneficiary was not entitled to a surrogatum out of the deceased's general estate for the pro indiviso half which was not carried by the conveyance.

1ST DIVISION. B.

MRS JANET TAYLOR or STEWART, a widow, and her sister Miss Joan Taylor, who resided together in Edinburgh, were entitled to equal shares of certain heritable subjects in Edinburgh derived from their father.

In 1854 Mrs Stewart with her own funds purchased the house 20 Dublin Street, Edinburgh, in which she and her sister resided, and took the disposition (after a narrative of the payment of the price by her, and a discharge thereof), to and in favour of herself and her sister "in conjunct fee and liferent, and their heirs and assignees whomsoever." They were both infeft for their respective rights.

On 4th March 1852 Mrs Stewart and Miss Taylor executed a mutual disposition and settlement, which set forth that the sisters, "from our affection for each other, and other good causes, have agreed to grant these presents." In this deed each sister assigned and disponed to the other the whole heritable and moveable estate that should belong to her at her death, "in case she shall survive me, in liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, and Robert Taylor Traquair, my nephew, ... and his heirs, executors, and assignees, under the conditions and provisions aftermentioned, in fee;" . . . . . "and for rendering this deed the more effectual, and facilitating its execution, we do hereby severally nominate the survivor of us to be the sole executor of such one of us as shall predecease, hereby debarring all others from that office;" . . . "reserving always to us, and each of us, our respective liferents of the estates and effects above conveyed, with full power to us, at any time during our joint lives, to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part as we may see proper; but declaring always that the same, in so far as not altered, innovated, or revoked as aforesaid shall be effectual though found lying by either of us at the time of her predecease, or in the custody of any other person for our behoof, with the delivery whereof we hereby dispense for ever."

Miss Joan Taylor died on 13th February 1859.

On 29th August 1863 Mrs Stewart, by holograph writing, bequeathed to Agnes Martin, for her long and valued services to her as her servant and friend, the furniture of certain rooms in the Dublin Street house, and a number of specified articles.

On 30th July 1867 Mrs Stewart executed a disposition and assignation of her household furniture, &c., conform to an inventory, and also of the house in Dublin Street, in favour of the said Agnes Martin in liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, and after her death to the said Robert Taylor Traquair, and his heirs, executors, and assignees in fee." The inventory relative to this disposition did not include certain silver articles, and a gold watch bequeathed by the holograph writing of 1863.

In a special case for Robert Taylor Traquair, son of the said Robert Taylor Traquair, and Miss Agnes Martin, the following questions were submitted (along with others which it is unnecessary to mention), for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"1. Is Agnes Martin, the party hereto of the second part, entitled to the gold watch and silver articles bequeathed by the holograph writing No. 2 of the appendix? 2. Is she also entitled to the liferent of the house and household furniture in terms of the disposition No. 3 of the appendix? 3. Should the foregoing question (2) be answered in the negative, is she entitled to a surrogatum out of Mrs Stewart's general estate equivalent to the value of her liferent of said house and household furniture?"

It was argued for the first parties;—Mrs Stewart had no power to execute the disposition of 1867, the power to revoke being reserved only to the granters of the mutual deed during their joint lives.[1]

It was argued for the second party;—The destination in favour of the nephew in the mutual deed of 1852 was purely testamentary, and therefore revocable by Mrs Stewart after her sister's death.[2]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The answers to the questions in this special case depend on certain testamentary papers left by Mrs Stewart, an old lady who lived in Edinburgh with an unmarried sister, Miss Joan Taylor, and survived her for some years.

The second question is the most important, and it is most convenient to take it first. It depends on a disposition executed by Mrs Stewart, by which she conveyed to Agnes Martin in liferent, and to Robert Taylor Traquair in fee, her whole household furniture, as also a dwelling-house, consisting of a flat in No. 20 Dublin Street. The granter reserves her own liferent, and the deed is obviously intended to come into operation only after the death of the granter. Upon this deed registration has taken place in favour of Agnes Martin as liferenter, and Robert Taylor Traquair as fiar, which puts them in the same position as if they were infeft.

As regards the moveables contained in the deed, their identity is ascertained by an inventory which forms part of the deed. These moveables were undoubtedly in the possession of the granter at the time of her death, and unless there was some restraint on her power of disposing of them there is no doubt of the validity of the conveyance. The house stands in a somewhat different situation.

The first argument maintained for the party of the first part, who is son and heir of the Robert Taylor Traquair mentioned in the deed, is that Mrs Stewart was not in a condition to execute this deed at all, in consequence of a mutual settlement executed in 1852 by her and her sister Miss Taylor. In this deed it was set out that the two sisters "from our affection for each other, and other good causes, have agreed to grant these presents." That is the narrative or inductive clause of the settlement. Mrs Stewart, in the first place, conveys to her sister Joan Taylor, in case she shall survive her, in liferent, her whole heritable and moveable estate. Miss Taylor, in like manner, conveys her whole estate in liferent to Mrs Stewart if she shall survive her; the deed provides for the payment of debts and legacies, and the fee of the entire estate is destined to Robert Taylor Traquair, a nephew of both ladies. The deed also contains a clause reserving to each of the ladies their respective liferents of the estates conveyed; then follow the words—"with full power to us, at any time during our joint lives, to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part, as we may see proper; but declaring always that the same, in so far as not altered, innovated, or revoked as aforesaid shall be effectual though found lying by either of us at the time of her predecease, or in the custody of any other person for our behoof, with the delivery whereof we hereby dispense for ever."

It is said that after the death of Miss Taylor it was not in the power of Mrs Stewart to alter this deed, and that her estate, heritable and moveable, necessarily fell to the person designed as fiar; in short, that after the death of Miss Taylor she could not dispose of any part of her estate which she had conveyed to her sister in liferent and her nephew in fee.

It is beyond dispute that two persons may so contract by mutual settlement as to bind one another in the way contended for. Such a deed puts the survivor in a very peculiar and unenviable position. But if they contract in such terms as to leave no doubt of their meaning there is nothing illegal in such a contract, and the Court will give effect to it. The Court, however, will not readily presume from ambiguous words such a very unusual and extraordinary intention, and in this case I am quite unable to gather from the deed that the two sisters entertained any such purpose. It was very natural that, living together as they did, and having the same intentions with regard to a favoured nephew, they should embody their testamentary intentions in one deed. It will be observed that the inductive clause of the deed is the affection they bear to one another—a circumstance to shew that its main purpose was that the survivor should enjoy the liferent of the entire estate belonging to both. But, in regard to the destination of the fee, the deed appears to me purely testamentary as regards the estate of each of them, and effectual to convey the estate of each sister mortis causa to the favoured nephew in fee. But as there is no express exclusion of the power of revocation of each sister in regard to her own estate, I cannot infer any such exclusion. I think that Mrs Stewart was quite entitled, after the death of Miss Taylor, by any proper testamentary paper, to dispose of her own moveable estate. It therefore appears that the disposition of 30th July 1867 must receive effect as a disposition to Agnes Martin in liferent of the moveables contained in the inventory referred to.

The heritable property stands in a different position. The house in Dublin Street did not belong to Mrs Stewart alone. It is admitted that the existing title was a disposition by Mr Graham Stirling "to and in favour of the said Mrs Janet Taylor or Stewart, and Miss Joan Taylor, her sister, in conjunct fee and liferent, and their heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably." The disposition, no doubt, bears that the price was paid by Mrs Stewart alone. But still the title was taken to the two sisters jointly, and they were in fact joint proprietors.

Reading the mutual disposition in the manner most favourable to the party claiming under the will of the survivor, I cannot hold that Mrs Stewart had any power to convey more than one-half of the house. The other half, belonging to Miss Taylor, was effectually conveyed to her sister in liferent and the nephew in fee. So far as regards Miss Taylor's half, the party of the first part is entitled to that. The other half passed in terms of Mrs Stewart's subsequent disposition to Agnes Martin in liferent, and Robert Taylor Traquair, the younger, in fee. This enables us to answer the second question.

In the third question we are asked to say whether, in the event of the foregoing question being answered in the negative, Agnes Martin is entitled to a surrogatum out of Mrs Stewart's general estate equivalent to the value of her liferent of the house and furniture. Now, the question, as put, does not require to be answered, because to a very large extent the disposition to Agnes Martin in liferent is effectual; but, in so far as regards the one-half of the house, it equire to be answered. I entertain no doubt that Agnes Martin is not ed to any equivalent out of the general estate. It is not a case of legatum lienæ, where it is assumed that the testator knew that he was conveying roperty of another. Mrs Stewart thought that the house belonged to her, hat she had power to convey it.

regards the first question, it depends on the consideration of the holograph ıg and subsequent disposition. The holograph writing conveyed a quantity niture and a gold watch, and certain other articles particularly described. late of this holograph writing is August 1863. By the subsequent dis- on of 1867 the whole of the household furniture belonging to Mrs Stewart bodied in the inventory, and conveyed in liferent to Agnes Martin. To xtent the bequest of household furniture is altered, and instead of Agnes n receiving a portion absolutely as her own she receives the whole of that ined in the inventory in liferent. But certain things are mentioned in the raph writing which are not in the inventory of 1867. The question is, ıer the holograph writing receives effect as regards these? On that I have ubt. The holograph writing is ineffectual only so far as it is superseded e subsequent disposition. The first question must therefore be answered vour of Agnes Martin.

ıe other Judges concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find and declare, in answer to the first question, that Agnes Martin, the party of the second part, is entitled to the gold watch and silver articles bequeathed by the holograph writing No. 2 of the appendix: Find and declare, in answer to the second question, that the said Agnes Martin is entitled to the liferent of one-half pro indiviso of the house, and to the liferent of the whole household furniture, in terms of the disposition No. 3 of the appendix: But find that she is not entitled to the liferent of the other half pro indiviso of the said house, which belonged to the deceased Joan Taylor, and was conveyed by her to her sister Mrs Stewart in liferent, and Robert Taylor Traquair in fee, by the mutual deed of settlement No. 1 of the appendix: Find and declare, in answer to the third question, that the said Agnes Martin is not entitled to any surrogatum or equivalent for the one-half of the house provided by the said disposition No. 3 of the appendix, and to which she has been found not entitled," &c.

In 1822 Alexander Campbell became proprietor of a piece of ground in Glasgow, described in his disposition as follows:—"All and Whole that area or piece of ground, consisting of 1042 square yards," &c.: "Declaring that the west gable of the lodging belonging to the said Robert Craig, together with the brick dyke enclosing the back area behind the same on the west, shall be mean and common to the said Alexander Campbell junior and his foresaids, and to the said Robert Craig and his successors, now and in all time coming."

Alexander Campbell built a house upon the piece of ground, consisting of two square storeys and a half sunk storey. The gable wall of one side rose above the second storey, and the roof sloped from this gable down to the opposite wall and enclosed a space which was never occupied until the present question arose.

In 1830 Alexander Campbell disponed to Nathaniel Stevenson the second storey of his tenement, which was described as "All and Whole the second or upper flat of the tenement situated on the north side of Bath Street and east side of Wellington Street, together with access thereto by a street door from Wellington Street, and the cellarage on the sunk floor and plot of ground adjoining to Wellington Street, which belong as parts and pertinents to the said second or upper flat, all as sometime possessed by William Buchanan: . . . Declaring that the said Nathaniel Stevenson and his foresaids shall be bound and obliged to maintain and uphold the roof of the said tenement without relief from the proprietor of the lower flat of the same: and that I, the said Alexander Campbell, and my successors in the lower flat of the said tenement, shall be bound to maintain and uphold the pavement and causeway in Bath Street and Wellington Street opposite to the said subjects, without relief from the said Nathaniel Stevenson or his foresaids."

Stevenson subsequently conveyed the subjects to William Taylor.

In 1831 Alexander Campbell disponed to Archibald Grahame Lang the area or piece of ground, "together with the tenement of land and offices erected thereon, excepting from this conveyance All and Whole the second or upper flat of the said tenement, situated on the north side of Bath Street and east side of Wellington Street, together with access thereto by a street door from Wellington Street, and the cellarage on the sunk floor and plot of ground adjoining to Wellington Street, which belongs as part and pertinent to the said second or upper flat, all as then presently possessed by William Buchanan, conveyed by me to Nathaniel Stevenson of Braidwood, Esquire: . . . . . Declaring that the said Archibald Grahame Lang and his foresaids shall be bound and obliged to maintain and uphold the pavement and causeway in Bath Street and Wellington Street opposite to the said subjects, without relief from the proprietor of the second or upper flat of said tenement, and that the proprietor of the said second or upper flat shall be bound to maintain and uphold the roof of the said tenement without relief from the said Archibald Grahame Lang or his foresaids; and also declaring that the west gable of the lodging which formerly belonged to the said Robert Craig, so far as attached to the said tenement erected on the area or piece of ground above disponed, also the brick dyke dividing the said area or plot of ground, shall be mean and common to the said Archibald Grahame Lang and his foresaids, and to the disponees of the said Robert Craig and their successors, now and in all time coming, and that the brick dyke dividing the area or plot of ground attached to the lower ground flat from the area or plot of ground belonging to the second or upper flat of said tenement belonging to the said Nathaniel Stevenson shall be mean and common to the said Archi-

l Grahame Lang and his foresaids and the said Nathaniel Stevenson his successors, now and in all time coming."

Irs Jane Anderson Grahame or Dunlop afterwards became proprietrix his tenement disponed to Archibald Grahame Lang.

Villiam Taylor proposed to make alterations on his tenement, and ordingly presented a petition for lining to the Dean of Guild of Glasgow. alleged (Cond. 3),—"The operations proposed to be carried out on property, as shewn on the plans in process, consist of—(1) the erection a wooden stair leading from the upper flat to the attic floor, and the version of the latter into four separate apartments, three of which are e used as rooms in connection with the petitioner's dwelling-house, the fourth as a laboratory in connection with the petitioner's business; the putting and fitting in of seven skylight windows in the roof of the l tenement; and (3) the fitting up of a portion of the sunk flat as a shing-house." (Cond. 5). "That the said operations, instead of injuring respondents' property, have materially strengthened and improved it, d the burden on the respondents' property has not thereby been in-eased."

Mrs Dunlop opposed the petition, and stated (Stat. 6),—"That the peti-oner proposes to increase the burden on the respondents' property from ne flat to two flats, to form fireplaces in the said additional flat, with flues, nd to use a portion, if not the whole, of said additional flat as workshops r otherwise. Farther, the petitioner proposes to cut and otherwise injure he roof of the tenement by the insertion of skylight windows instead of wood and slates, which was the original condition of the tenement. The petitioner farther proposes to convert the cellarage which belongs to the upper flat into washing-houses, and to fit up heating-apparatus therein, immediately underneath the property of the said respondents; and this will have the effect of endangering the said respondents' property."

The petitioner pleaded;—(3) The petitioner, in respect of his right of common interest in the tenement in question, is entitled to make whatever alterations, improvements, and additions he pleases in suo proprio, provided that in doing so he does not go beyond his title, or endanger the common interest. (4) The petitioner, as proprietor of the upper flat of said tenement, and, as such, burdened with the maintenance of the roof, was entitled to make the alterations, improvements, and additions shewn upon the plans in process. (5) The title-deeds of the tenement having provided for the erection of a house of three square storeys and a storey half sunk, and for windows in the roof of the said property, the petitioner did not exceed his right in connecting the garret floor with his house, and occupying it for family and business purposes. (6) The petitioner's operations having neither increased the burden upon, nor endangered in any way the respondents' property, the respondents are barred from objecting to the said operations.

The respondents pleaded;—(8) The petitioner is not entitled to increase the burden upon the respondents' part of the tenement, which would be done by the erection of an additional flat, with fireplaces, &c., as proposed. (9) The petitioner is not entitled in any way to alter or interfere with the roof of the tenement, so as to make it less wind and water tight than it originally was, which would be done by the skylight proposed. (10) The petitioner is not entitled to make any alteration upon the cellarage which might in any way endanger the respondents' property, or subject it to any risk of fire or otherwise.

The Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Find that, according to a fair interpretation of the foresaid provisions in the title-deeds of parties, the roof of the tenement must be held to form an essential and inherent portion of the uppermost of 'the second or upper flat' of the tenement in question, and which, as such, the petitioner is bound to uphold, particularly as the roof or attics are not otherwise specially dealt with or conveyed: On this footing, find that the petitioner seems entitled to make all reasonable or beneficial use of the attics, not injurious or prejudicial to the other portions of the tenement belonging to the respondents, and decern; but before approving of or sanctioning the particular erections or alterations on the attics proposed by the petitioner, or the intended conversion by the petitioner of the cellarage in the sunk flat into a washing-house, remit to Messrs James Grant junior and Hugh Kennedy, trades members of Court, to inspect the said subjects in question, and to report whether, in their opinion, the said operations can be carried on without prejudice to the other portions of the tenement belonging to the respondents."

After a report the Dean of Guild allowed the alterations.

The respondents appealed, and argued;—Taylor's property was bounded by the ceiling of the second or upper storey, and he was not entitled to execute any operations beyond that. So far as right went the appellants were proprietors of all above the ceiling, as they acquired from Campbell the whole tenement except what was conveyed to the respondents, and that was merely the second or upper floor. Taylor, apart from the stipulation to maintain the roof, had no more right in it than the other proprietor. He had no right to execute operations which would add a storey to the house. He had no right to erect a flue in the staircase, in which he had only a right of access under his title.[1]

The petitioner replied;—The conveyance of the upper storey included the roof and the space enclosed by it. The roof belonged to the upper storey just as the walls of each floor belonged to the proprietor of the floor. The operations proposed to be made there were within the petitioner's own property, and the lower proprietor could not object, unless he alleged that some injury would be done to his property. No such injury was alleged, and the proprietor of the under floor had no more than a common interest in the roof, which would not entitle him to object unless some danger or injury was done. There was no danger or injury here.[2]

Lord Deas.—It appears from the disposition, No. 21 of process, that in 1832 Alexander Campbell acquired from Messrs Burns and Forrest an area of building ground consisting of 1042 square yards. It is to be inferred from the next disposition, which is one from Campbell to Stevenson, in 1830, that between these dates Campbell had erected a tenement on the area consisting of two storeys and a lower storey one half above and the other below ground. It appears that the tenement had either been originally built as two houses, or had been converted by Mr Campbell into two houses. By the disposition of 1830 Campbell conveys to Stevenson "all and whole the second or upper flat of the tenement situated on the north side of Bath Street and east side of Wellington Street, together with access thereto by a street door from Wellington Street, and the cellarage on the sunk floor and plot of ground adjoining Wellington Street, which belong as parts and pertinents to the second or upper flat." The deed afterwards proceeds to declare "that the said Nathaniel Stevenson and his foresaids shall be bound and obliged to maintain and uphold the roof of the said tenement, without relief from the proprietor of the lower flat of the same," and "that I, the said Alexander Campbell, and my successors in the lower flat of the said tenement, shall be bound to maintain and uphold the pavement and causeway in Bath Street and Wellington Street opposite to the said subjects, without relief from the said Nathaniel Stevenson or his foresaids; and also declaring that the west gable of the lodging belonging to the said Robert Craig, so far as attached to the said second or upper flat, shall be mean and common to the said Nathaniel Stevenson and his foresaids, and to the said Robert Craig and his successors now and in all time coming." Mr Taylor, the respondent in the appeal, has come to be in the place of Stevenson, and Mrs Dunlop in place of Campbell. The respondent desired to make certain alterations on his part of the property, and appealed to the Dean of Guild Court for warrant to do so. That Court, after making a remit to two of its members,—described as trades members—that is, two of them skilled in such matters,—and having received a report that the proposed alterations would not be injurious to Mrs Dunlop's property, or to any other, sanctioned the operations. The question is, whether that sanction should be recalled.

If the operations are in any way dangerous or injurious to Mrs Dunlop's property they ought not to be sanctioned, to whomsoever the property of the roof may be held to belong, because there exists, undoubtedly, a common interest in all lower proprietors to object to such operations.

It is necessary to consider separately the operations in the upper storey itself, —those in the staircase—and those in the cellar below the first storey.

As regards the operations in the upper storey, the trades members of the Dean of Guild Court are agreed that no injury to the tenement will be caused by them, but that, on the contrary, it will rather be strengthened and improved. The report does not specify the details of the operations in the upper storey, but these were fully explained to us at the bar, and from the explanations so given it was easy enough to see how it was that the skilled reporters in the Dean of Guild Court had no difficulty in certifying that no injury to the strength and safety of the building would be caused by these operations.

As to the argument that by increasing the accommodation Mr Taylor was changing the character of the building, I can give no weight to that view. He was in that respect simply exercising the ordinary rights of a proprietor. He might equally have increased the number of persons using the staircase by letting each of her previously existing rooms to a separate family, as by increasing the number of the rooms and letting the new ones. There is no restriction of that kind in Mr Taylor's title-deeds, and the common interest of a lower proprietor does not entitle him to interfere on any such ground.

The whole question, therefore, so far as the operations in the upper storey are concerned, comes to be, whether the appellants, although they can qualify no injury from these operations, have nevertheless a legal right to object to them, and that again, I think, depends mainly on whether the property of the vacant portion of the building between the ceiling of Mr Taylor's rooms and the roof itself belongs to Mr Taylor or not. If the property of the vacant space belongs to Taylor, he may make any use of it he pleases which is not injurious to the lower portion of the tenement. There may be a narrower question as to Mr Taylor's right to alter or affect the roof, which I shall consider separately.

As respects the vacant space under the roof, I can have no doubt that it is the property of Mr Taylor. The walls of each flat belong to the proprietor of the flat, and the other proprietors have only a common interest to prevent their being interfered with in a way injurious to their property. In the present case there is a gable wall at one end of the building which is declared by the title-deeds to be common to Taylor and the next proprietor—the vents, on both sides, going up, of course, to the chimney tops. At the other end, the wall, in place of going up all the height in a gable form, finishes with a portion of a pavilion roof. The vacant space inside, up to the top of the gable wall at one end, and to the pavilion roof at the other, might have been used by Mr Taylor to heighten the ceiling (or the coomceiling) of his rooms, if he had thought proper to do so, and I think the appellants have neither right nor interest to object to his converting that space into additional rooms any more than they v have had to object to his using it as a sort of attic, which it is said he occasionally done by means of a trap-door in the ceiling, so long as the s lants could qualify no injury from the uses so made of the space, which it i pretended they can here do.

All this, however, is not conclusive in favour of the operations in the u storey, because there is to some slight extent an interference with the although not of an injurious kind, and if the appellants have a right of con property in the roof they may stand upon that right as entitling them to o without alleging any injury.

It appears to me, however, that the property of the roof, as well as o upper portion of the walls, is vested in the proprietor of the upper storey. does not appear to have been made matter of express decision. But I s suppose the reason of this is that it has always been taken for granted. roof is just the covering wall which keeps out the weather, and without Taylor's house would not be a house at all. The roof might have been of crete or pavement, or a stone and lime arch, instead of wood and slates. nature of the materials of which the roof was composed would not var nature of the right to it vested in the proprietor of the upper storey, no nature of the burden of maintaining and upholding it which always attacl him—where there is no provision to the contrary—just because he is the prietor. In the present case the burden is expressly laid upon him wi relief, but that is nothing more than an expression of his common law o tion, introduced, apparently, for clearness at the same time with stipulatin the proprietor of the lower storey should uphold and maintain the foot ment and causeway at his own expense.

As regards the washing-house and the flue proposed to be carried up from it in the wall of the staircase I have come to a different conclusion cause I think Mr Taylor has not the exclusive property of that wall, and wh the appellants have the property, or only a right of common property i wall, they are equally entitled—apart from all question of injury—to obj its being interfered with. The flue is by no means so clearly unobjectic in itself as the other operations, but it is not necessary to go further than I done to entitle the appellants to object to it.

Lord Ardmillan.—Mr Taylor, the respondent, is the proprietor of the part of a certain tenement in Glasgow—Mrs Dunlop, the appellant, being prietor of the lower part of the tenement. I need not again refer to the of the titles. The two houses do not enter by a common stair. There are rate doors, entering from different streets. They are quite distinct, both spect of title and in respect of possession.

The first and most important question here raised is, whether Mr Taylor titled to construct attic chambers in the roof, as proposed and explained by In disposing of this question, two points are to be considered—1st, who owner of the roof? I am of opinion that, in the present case, and looki the titles of the parties and the nature and position of the premises, the respo Taylor is the owner of the roof. He is bound by stipulation to maintai uphold the roof, and I think that the obligation so to maintain and u would have rested on him without stipulation, as incident to the owners the roof.

In the case of property in a town, divided into storeys or flats, I think there is a separate property in each flat, but that there is a common inte each owner, from which emerges a right to each owner to protect that co interest, and to insist that the owners of other flats shall not injure or end the property belonging to him. As matter of property, and apart from the eq introduced by the existence of a common interest, the upper flat, or floor, or s of this tenement, including, as I think, the roof, belongs to Mr Taylor, j the lower flat belongs to the appellant, Mrs Dunlop. The idea of there any property or possession above Mr Taylor's house was, I think, not co plated. But the property, whether of the lower or the upper floor, must be so as not to injure or endanger the rest of the house. This is quite clear, and has been so decided repeatedly. The existence of a common interest in the tenement imposes an equitable restriction on the owners. Each must use the subject of which each is owner so as to conserve that common interest, which is supported and specially protected by the maxim—Sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas, a sound general rule, and peculiarly applicable to a case of common interest. The limitation of the owner's right is not in titulo, but in utendo, the use being limited by the equity and the necessity of protecting the interests of the other owners, but the property remaining to all other effects unrestricted. If it appears that the common interests will be injured or imperilled by the operation complained of, the law will restrain the operation; and I think that the party proposing alteration must instruct that the operation does not injure, or create reasonable apprehension of injury.

In this case, I think that Mr Taylor has sufficiently instructed that the operation on his property on the upper floor and attics will not injuriously affect or endanger the appellant's property, or her common interest in the tenement. Perhaps the report by men of skill might have been, in some respects, more explicit, but they appear to have made careful and workmanlike examination, and, taking that report in connection with the decision of the Dean of Guild, I have no doubt that we may rely on it as instructing the absence of actual injury, or of reasonable apprehension of injury. Indeed, the case has been argued at the bar without serious objection to the report in this respect, and also on the footing of the continued possession by Mr Taylor of the whole subject.

Injury, and reasonable danger of injury, being thus excluded, I am of opinion that, having regard to the state of the facts, the restriction in utendo is inapplicable, and that Mr Taylor, as owner of the whole upper part of the tenement, is entitled to make the alteration which he proposes in the attics. On this point I concur generally in the opinion of Lord Deas.

On the second question raised—viz., the proposal to convert a cellar belonging to Mr Taylor into a washing-house and to carry up a flue at the side of the staircase into a chimney at the top of the house—I am of opinion that access by the stair, not an absolute right to the stair, is all that is given to Mr Taylor by his title; but that in any view of the question of property in the stair—whether it is common or separate property—Mrs Dunlop's common interest is sufficient to entitle her to object to the proposed operations in the cellar, and to the carrying of this flue up the staircase, which staircase is intended only for access.

LORD PRESIDENT.—My Lords, I agree with what I understand to be the opinion of both of your Lordships, that we must assume that the operations here proposed will not be injurious to Mrs Dunlop's property. That is the result to which the report in the Dean of Guild Court comes, and no attempt has been made to impugn that report. We must, therefore, deal with this case as purely a question of law.

As has already been remarked by your Lordships, there is a material distinction between the two kinds of operations here to be carried out. By one of these the cellar, which is half under ground, is to be changed into a washing-house, with a fire-place—where there had been no fire-place before—and in order to get rid of the smoke which would be caused by the fire, it is proposed to carry a horizontal flue along the cellar, and up the staircase to the roof. I agree with Lord Deas, that Mr Taylor has no absolute property in the staircase, and that I think is sufficient to enable us to dispose of this branch of the case. I do not, and I cannot, go upon the ground that this operation might be injurious, as that would be to go against the report of the men of skill to the Dean of Guild. My ground is that the staircase is the property of Mrs Dunlop.

Upon the other branch of the case, which has regard to the operations on the roof, I have greater difficulty. This question becomes a very peculiar one under the titles. The common author of both the parties to this case, Mr Campbell, stood infeft in an area or piece of ground, unbuilt upon, extending to 1042 square yards and 6 feet or thereby, which formed the corner of Bath Street and Wellington Street. He proceeded to build upon that ground; and I consider

NOV. 5, 1875.

Lord Deas.

Taylor v. Ferrie.

It very important to observe the precise nature of the tenement which he then erected and which he retained his own property. He built a house with two fronts, one to Bath Street and one to Wellington Street, as he was probably entitled to do by the conditions of his right. That house consists of two squares—one of which is the street or lower room floor, and the other the upper or drawing-room floor. There was also what Lord Deas has properly called a half sunk story, the upper part being above, and the lower below, the level of the street. The tenement also contained a space between the drawing-room floor and the roof which might be turned into attics; and which might be turned by Mr Campbell into attics for the whole house, or for the upper story, or the attics might be made use of so as to form a separate house by itself. What Mr Campbell chose to do with the house was this: he divided it into one house (the dining room floor, which entered from Bath Street, and another house (the drawing room floor, which entered from Wellington Street, and he assigned to each a portion of the half sunk flat. He, however, left the space below the roof unconverted into attics, and it comes to be a very important question whether Mr Campbell intended to, and did in point of fact, leave this space unoccupied, and designed that it should remain unoccupied and belong to the owner of neither the one house nor the other as regarded occupation. That depends upon the wording of the titles. Mr Campbell, being himself the owner of the entire tenement, first proceeds to convey the upper or drawing-room flat to Mr Taylor's predecessor in June 1830; and what he conveys is described as follows:—"All and whole the second or upper flat of the tenement situated on the north side of Bath Street and east side of Wellington Street, with access thereto by a street door from Wellington Street, and the cellarage on the sunk floor."

Now, the words of that disposition confine the right of the disponee, in my view, to the second flat, which is also called the upper flat: and in so far as the words of the conveyance are concerned I see nothing which could have prevented Mr Campbell from selling the attic flat to another person, and giving that person access to the flat by the same staircase. He did not do so, because I conceive his intention was that this space was to be left unoccupied. He did some things which not only indicate that such was his intention, but which actually prevented him from ever making the vacant space into a separate house, with an access through the staircase from Wellington Street.

The disponee was also taken bound to maintain and uphold the roof, and it seems to be thought that this obligation infers a right of property in the roof. I take a very different view. If the disponee had a right of property in the roof then the burden of maintaining it would have been laid upon him at common law, so that the very insertion of this clause seems necessarily to infer that he had no property in it. The clause here was inserted in order to divide the burdens connected with the whole tenement, because, while the disponee was taken bound to maintain the roof, Mr Campbell bound himself "to maintain and uphold the pavement and causeway in Bath Street and Wellington Street opposite to the said subjects without relief."

Now, what was Mr Campbell's position after granting this disposition. He remained infeft in the 1042 square yards along with the buildings which he had erected, with the exception of what was conveyed in this disposition. Whatever he had not given out remained feudally vested in him. Upon that ground I agree with Lord Deas that he retained the property of the staircase, the right of access through which he conveyed to the disponee. In like manner the property in the roof, and in everything above the joists of the upper flat, remained in Mr Campbell. The only thing he had given out was the second or upper flat of his tenement. Now, I do not think that it is necessary here to consider any general question of law applicable to such tenements. The whole of this case depends upon the construction of the titles, and I do not think that there is any difficulty as to the general law. If the floor here disponed had been an attic floor, there is no doubt that the roof would have been the property of the disponee, because, as Lord Deas has said, the roof would be the wall of his house; but when the disponee is not the owner of the space between the roof and the ceiling of his house, what right of property can he have in the roof itself? The owner of the re storey next the roof has no concern with the roof beyond what the pro- tors of any other square storey have, merely because he happens to be higher The only person who has a right of property in the roof is he who lives in roof, so to speak,—that is, whose house is formed by the roof. There is no son like that here, and I think it was intended from the beginning that there uld be no such person. Accordingly, when Mr Campbell sold the rest of the ement to Mrs Dunlop's predecessor, we find that it is not the lower flat that conveyed, but the centre tenement, with the exception of the second or upper . Whatever remained in Mr Campbell after the disposition of 1830 he con- ed to the predecessor of Mrs Dunlop in 1831.

The conclusion to which I come is, that the owner of the upper floor has no re right, and probably less right, than the owner of the rest of the tenement construct a house in the roof. The latter has, in my opinion, a greater right every way. I do not think, however, that Mrs Dunlop could now make any a house in the roof, because Mr Campbell left the staircase as an access to second floor alone. But so far as title is concerned, Mr Taylor has still less ht to do so, because if it is in his power to construct such a house he would entitled to sell that house off separately, and so introduce three families, and o owners into a tenement which was constructed by the common author to tain only two families and two owners. For these reasons I cannot concur h your Lordships in the judgment which you propose to pronounce allowing e operations in the roof of this house to be carried out.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Alter the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild, dated 28th February 1872, in so far as it approves of and authorises the operations proposed to be made by the respondent on the cellar belonging to his property, and the construction of the relative flue and chimney: Find that the respondent is not entitled, as owner of the second or upper floor of the tenement at the corner of Bath Street and Wellington Street to execute the said operations: Quoad ultra refuse the appeal, and affirm the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild, and decern: Find no expenses due to either party in this Court."

HE deceased David Martin, writer in Newton-Stewart, was employed he petitioners, Mrs Andrew and Miss Macadam, sisters, residing in chester, to find a safe investment for a sum of £1000 which was about e paid up to them at the term of Whitsunday 1871. On 8th May Mr Martin wrote that he had found a safe investment on heritable security at five per cent interest, of which he gave particulars in subsequent letters. The transaction was concluded with the borrower, and on 5th June Mr Robert Macadam, the petitioners' brother, forwarded to Martin, on their behalf, two cheques on the London and Westminster Bank in their favour, requesting him to send the odd money to his sisters in Manchester at his earliest convenience, "retaining the £1000 for their new investment." He sent the cheques to the petitioners for indorsation. On 8th June he received them back, and wrote as follows to Miss Macadam:—"I am this morning favoured with your letter of yesterday, returning the two cheques, value £1020, 11s. 6d., indorsed by you and your sister. I enclose bank order in your favour for £20, 11s. 6d., being the interest due by Messrs Chambers on the two bonds. The new bonds will be with you in course of next week. I shall take care that the money is not paid over until the bonds are duly completed. As I mentioned before, they will bear interest at 5 per cent from 26th of last month."

Some delay having occurred in completing the transaction, Mr Martin, on 15th June, without the knowledge of the petitioners, paid the two cheques into the British Linen Company's Bank at Newton-Stewart to the credit of a deposit-account which he kept with them in his own name. At this date there was a balance of £186 standing at Mr Martin's credit in the account, and the only subsequent entry was a payment of £4 to Mr Martin's order. Mr Martin died a few days after, on 21st June 1871.

The receipt given to Mr Martin by the bank agent was in these terms:—"Newton-Stewart, 15th June 1871.—Received from David Martin, Esq., Ten hundred and twenty pounds 11/6 sterling, which is this day placed to his credit with the British Linen Company.

"£1020 : 11 : 6. DAVID STROYAN, Agent."

In consequence of Mr Martin's death the transaction with the intended borrower was never completed. Martin's estates were sequestrated on 21st May 1872, and Mr M'Cutcheon was elected trustee.

The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, enacts (sec. 104) that "any person claiming right to any estate included in the sequestration may present a petition to the Lord Ordinary praying to have such estate taken out of the sequestration, and the Lord Ordinary shall order the trustee to answer, within a certain time, and on expiration of such time he shall proceed to dispose of the application."

The petitioners brought this petition under the said clause, praying the Lord Ordinary to "find that the said sum of £1000 and bank interest accruing thereon belongs to the petitioners, and does not form part of the estates of the said David Martin, to take the same out of the said sequestration accordingly, and to grant warrant to and authorise and empower the said bank to make payment thereof to the petitioners."

The trustee lodged answers, in which he stated,—"The money obtained by the deceased from the discounting of the cheques sent him by the brother of the petitioners was, as has been stated, lodged by him in the ordinary bank account kept in his own name, in the same way as any monies he received on his own account. It was not lodged in the bank or entered in the bank-account as money belonging to the petitioners, or as held by Mr Martin in trust for them or for their behoof, and it was in no way identified as belonging to the petitioners. The said money thus became part of the ordinary funds belonging to the bankrupt, which he or his representatives alone could claim from the bank, and which falls to be administered as part of the bankrupt estate."

ing "that the petitioners have right to the sum of £1000 specified in the prayer of the petition, with the bank interest which has accrued thereon since 15th June 1871, and that the same must be taken out of the sequestration of the estate of the deceased David Martin: Grants warrant to and ordains the British Linen Company to pay to the petitioners the said sum of £1000, with the whole interest which shall have accrued thereon since 15th June 1871, and decerns: Finds the petitioners entitled to expenses," &c. *

* "NOTE.—The deceased David Martin, writer in Newton-Stewart, the agent of the petitioners, was entrusted by them on or about 8th June 1871 with the two cheques in their favour for £510, 5s. 9d. each, Nos. 20 and 21 of process, making together the sum of £1020, 11s. 6d., in order that he might remit them £20, 11s. 6d. thereof, being interest, and invest the balance of £1000, being principal, on a heritable security over certain subjects in Kirkcowan, belonging to Mr Milroy, to whom the £1000 were to be paid in exchange for that security. These two cheques were delivered to Mr Martin in trust for that special purpose. Although, in consequence of some difficulty in connection with the completion of Mr Milroy's title, the settlement of the transaction was delayed for a few days, and Mr Martin paid the sum on 15th June 1871,—that is, six days before his death,—into his deposit-account with the branch bank of the British Linen Company at Newton-Stewart, in which there was then a credit balance in his favour, it was not mixed or confounded with the other moneys in that deposit-account belonging to him so as not to be distinguishable; and it was not operated upon so as to be extinguished. On 15th June 1871 there stood to the credit of that account the sum of £186, 11s. 6d., and the only operations thereon afterwards were the paying in on that day of the £1020, 11s. 6d., the proceeds of the two cheques, and the drawing out of a sum of £4 on 17th June 1871. On 21st June 1871, the date when Mr Martin died, there stood at the credit of this account, exclusive of interest, £1203, 3s., which consisted of the £1020, 11s. 6d. remitted by the petitioners, and £182, 11s. 6d. the balance of Mr Martin's own funds, after deducting the draft of £4 above-mentioned. The petitioners' money was and still is quite distinguishable from Mr Martin's own funds.

"The rule of law, as defined by Mr Bell (Com. i. 267), is, that 'where the factor is entrusted with property or money of his principal to buy stock, exchequer bills, &c. and misapplies it, the produce will be the principal's if still clearly distinguishable;' and he refers to the leading case of Taylor v. Plumer, 1815, 3 Maule and Selwyn, 562, in which the authorities are reviewed by Lord Ellenborough, who delivered the judgment of the Court. Mr Bell further states (Com. i. 268), that 'the general rule may be laid down that in all cases of factory, where the property remitted by the principal or acquired for him by his order, is found distinguishable in the hands of the factor, capable of being traced by a clear and connected chain of identity in no one link of it degenerating from a specific trust into a general debt, the creditors of the factor, who has become a bankrupt, have no right to the specific property.' The case of Sayers, 22d January 1800, 5 Ves. jr. 168, cited by Mr Bell, is a strong example of the application of this principle.

"In the present case, the sum of £1000 claimed by the petitioners (the £20, 11s. 6d. having been remitted to them by Mr Martin), is clearly identified as their money. It is not mixed and confounded with Mr Martin's money, but is distinguishable in his hands. It remained in his hands as a specific trust, and was never otherwise dealt with either by him or by the petitioners, and it never degenerated into a general debt. Mr Martin evidently paid the money into bank for safe keeping, after retaining the cheques in his hands for seven days, when he found there was delay, from the state of the title, in completing the transaction, and he had no intention of applying it, and he never converted or applied it to his own uses and purposes.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that such payment into Mr Martin's bank

The respondent reclaimed, and argued;—The money in question wa dealt with by the bankrupt as part of his ordinary funds. It was pai into his own bank account in his own name, and entered in that accoun to his credit; and he would have been allowed to operate upon it to th full amount. It could not be distinguished from the other funds in th bankrupt's bank account.[1]

The petitioners argued;—The money must be regarded in this case a if it was in the hands of Mr Martin. No fraud is insinuated; and it plain that he put the money into the bank merely for safe keeping durin the few days of delay which occurred in completing the security transa tion. The money never ceased to be the property of the petitioners, an having been handed to Mr Martin for a specific purpose, he was merel custodier of it, and it can make no difference that he chose to keep it i his own bank account, the account itself shewing that he never dea improperly with it in any way, and that the only transaction in th account after it was paid in was a payment to his order of £4. Even he had acted with a dishonest intention in paying the cheques into h own account, the proceeds would have remained the property of th petitioners as long as they were distinguishable. The trustee has n higher or other right than Martin himself could have claimed in thi question.

Lord Deas.—I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right Mr Martin was employed to find an investment for the money of these ladies He did find a suitable heritable security, and he intimated to them that he ha done so. After concluding the transaction with the borrower the cheques no in dispute were sent to him, on the part of the ladies, and were received by hi on the 7th or 8th of June. His letter of the 8th, acknowledging receipt of them says:—"I am this morning favoured with your letter of yesterday, returnin the two cheques, value £1020, 11s. 6d., indorsed by you and your sister. enclose bank order in your favour for £20, 11s. 6d., being the interest due b Messrs Chambers on the two bonds. The new bonds will be with you in coun of next week. I shall take care that the money is not paid over until the bon are duly completed. As I mentioned before, they will bear interest at 5 p cent from 26th of last month.—With best regards to you and Mrs Andrew, am, &c."

The terms of the transaction are contained in that letter. The money was bear interest from the date specified (May 26), whether the borrower was ready take it or not. The only reason why the bonds were not at once received a transmitted to the ladies, was, that the borrower was not quite ready, in co sequence of the state of his title, to take the money. Mr Martin, after retaini the cheques for some days very properly cashed them with the bank with whi he usually dealt, thinking that they would be in safer keeping there than in l office. The two cheques were specifically entered in the cash-book of the bran bank in the terms which we have in the print. It next appears that the co pletion of the transaction was prevented by the death of Mr Martin almo deposit-account, in which there was then a credit balance, cannot, having rega to the fact that there were thereafter no operations thereon which in any w affected the money, alter the rights of the petitioners, or divest the funds of t trust in their favour, or confer upon the respondent, as the trustee on Mr M tin's sequestrated estate, any greater right than Mr Martin had therein. T Lord Ordinary considers that the respondent can, as trustee for the credit in the sequestration, only take the right of the bankrupt to this sum tanti et tale as it stood in his person—(Gordon v. mediately after, viz., on the 21st of the same month. But for the delay in completing the borrower's title in the first place, and for Mr Martin's death in the second place, there is no room for doubt that the transaction would have been completed. A sequestration of Mr Martin's estate was, however, obtained a year after his death; and the question now arises whether these ladies, the owners, are to get this money, or whether it is to go to the trustee in the sequestration, for the benefit of Martin's general creditors. I am clearly of opinion that the latter result would not be according either to law or justice. If Martin had appropriated the money to his own purposes that would have been a fraud. One thing is quite clear in point of law that if a person gets money for a specific purpose it must be applied to that purpose or returned to the owner. That doctrine was recognised in the case of Blyth, &c. v. Maberley's Assignees, June 10, 1832, 10 S. 796, although it is true that in that case the point was not decided. The Lord President there says:—"Had there been a Scotch sequestration we should have remitted the multiplepoinding to it, and so we may dispose of the multiplepoinding to the effect of having the questions it involves disposed of in the Court of Bankruptcy in England. I have considerable doubt as to the right of property in the funds in dispute; but the lawful possession of these funds is clearly with Maberley. It has been found that money paid in for a specific purpose must be so applied without being mixed up with the general estate on a bankruptcy occurring. But such a question involves a claim of preference merely, not of property; and I think the existence of such a claim ought not to bar the assignees from obtaining possession of the disputed funds leaving the preference to be tried in England." It was thus laid down in that case that the fact that money had been paid to a bank-agent for the fulfilment of a special purpose did not prevent a claim of preference over it by the party who had so paid it in. I remember the discussion in that case quite well, and that Lord President Hope stated the doctrine I have referred to, and it has remained in my mind since. I see that in another report (5 Deas and Anderson, p. 488), it is added to what Mr Shaw has given, that the Lord President said that it had been so decided again and again. As regards any claim the bank may have, I am clearly of opinion that there is no need for any reservation at all. Such a reservation might appear to the officers of the bank to lay on them an obligation to try a question in which, as it seems to me, the bank has no interest.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The two cheques from the London and Westminster Bank reached Mr Martin covered by a special trust for a well defined purpose, and they passed into the possession of the British Linen Company's Bank only for temporary custody and security, with a view to the early—the almost immediate—fulfilment of the purpose of the trust, viz., the investment of the petitioners' money. All this appears clearly from the documents, the entries in the books of the bank, and the letters of Mr Martin. I have no doubt that Mr Martin was, up to the date of his death, which occurred within a week, under the responsibility of a special trust for the benefit of the petitioners. It was his duty—and I feel sure it was his intention—to apply that money, according to the trust, to the specific trust for which he held it. Martin was not rendered bankrupt during his life. When he died he was bound to fulfil, and appeared able to fulfil the trust as above. £1200 was then at his credit with the bank. Since his death it has been discovered that he was insolvent. In respect of that fact, of the subsequently ascertained insolvency, the trustee on the estate of Mr Martin claims this sum.

I am of opinion, and, I must add, without difficulty or hesitation, that the specific trust under which alone Mr Martin received the money was not discharged or impaired by the deposit for safe temporary custody in the bank, but that the trust adhered to the sum so deposited. To have used the money for his own purposes would have been a breach of trust and a fraud on the part of Mr Martin, and I am of opinion that Martin's trustee cannot claim this money.

The authority of the law of England on this question is most important, and is explained by Mr Lewin (Lewin on Trusts, p. 647), who refers, among other cases, to a case of Pennell, which is very instructive.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with your Lordships. I have no doubt that the doctrine of Lord President Hope is directly applicable. The point which arises here has been expressly decided in one case in England, viz., in Pennell v. Deffell, 4 De G. M. and G. 372. That was a long and complicated case, but the result is clearly and accurately stated by Mr Lewin in his book on Trusts, p. 647. He says:—"If a trustee pay trust-money into a bank to the account of himself, not in any way earmarked with the trust, and also keep private monies of his own to the same account, the Court will disentangle the account and separate the trust from the private monies, and award the former specifically to the cestui que trust." The law being thus clearly settled it is unnecessary to say more on the special circumstances of this case. I agree with Lord Deas that no special reservation should be inserted. If the bank has a claim, it is a claim of retention which can be quite easily settled independently of this question with the trustee in the sequestration.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for Alexander M'Cutcheon, trustee on David Martin's estate, against Lord Mackenzie's interlocutor of 22d July 1872, No. 44 of process, adhere to the said interlocutor and refuse the reclaiming note: Find the petitioners entitled to additional expenses; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit," &c.

JOHN COOPER, Petitioner and Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Scott.
ANDREW FRASER and JAMES SCOTT, Respondents.—Shand—Asher.

Bankrupt—Discharge—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 146.—Circumstances in which a discharge was granted to a bankrupt convicted of breach of trust and embezzlement after the expiry of the term of his imprisonment, and after the lapse of a year from the date of his application for discharge.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff-substitute of Forfarshire. I.

JOHN COOPER, who was sequestrated on 5th March 1870, presented, on 16th November 1871, a petition for his discharge, in the usual terms, to the Sheriff of Forfarshire at Dundee. The accompanying report of the trustee on his sequestrated estate was as follows:—"I hereby certify and report that the bankrupt has complied with the provisions of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and in particular that he has made a fair discovery and surrender of his estates, has attended the diet of examination, has not been guilty of any collusion, and that his bankruptcy has arisen from innocent misfortunes or losses in business."

Appearance was entered to oppose the discharge by the respondents, on the following grounds:—"Mrs Jane Jamieson or Fraser, residing at Blackhill, farm of Balgay, who died on 14th May 1866, by her trust disposition and settlement appointed the appellant her sole trustee and executor. By her said trust-settlement the said Mrs Jane Jamieson or Fraser, 'inter alia, and thirdly, appointed her said trustee, as soon as convenient after her death, to invest the sum of £600 sterling on heritable or personal security, railway debentures, or otherwise, as to her said trustee might seem best, and to pay the annual produce to be derived therefrom half-yearly, quarterly, or at such other times as her said trustee might consider best, to David Fraser, her son, as an alimentary provision during all the days of his life, which should not be assignable, or subje to his act or deeds, or liable to be attached by the diligence of his creditors, but paid to himself, on his own receipt therefor; and at the death of the said David Fraser, or as soon thereafter as convenient, £100 of said sum to be invested should be paid to David Fraser, son to David Fraser; and the balance of £500, or, failing the said David Fraser junior, the said sum of £600 to be equally divided betwixt the respondent, Andrew Fraser, her son, and Jessie Fraser, now wife of the respondent, James Scott, her daughter, or their issue.'"

The appellant accepted of the trust, and realised the estate. He did not, however, make any investment of the £600 as directed by the third clause of the settlement, but applied it to his own purposes, paying regularly the interest thereon at the rate of five per cent up to the date of his sequestration, at first to the said David Fraser junior and afterwards by concurrence of the respondents to his widow—David Fraser junior having predeceased.

In August 1867 the appellant purchased heritable property in Hilltown, Dundee, which he professed to be an investment for the £600. He paid £2275 for the property, and borrowed £1750 on the security of it, taking the titles in his own name, and without any reference to the trust. The respondents, who, on the death of the Frasers, became in right of the £600, only obtained an ordinary ranking upon the appellant's estates to the extent of £128, 18s. 3d., in place of the £600 to which they were entitled under Mrs Fraser's trust-deed.

They accordingly pleaded;—That the appellant's fraudulent conduct in embezzling trust-funds and the circumstances had been such as to disentitle him to a discharge from his debts.

The appellant pleaded;—(2) There being no fraud or embezzlement with the funds of the property of the estate, and no reckless or culpable conduct on the part of the petitioner, he was entitled to his discharge. (3) The trust-funds referred to in the objections having been left, by arrangement of parties, in the hands of the petitioner, at interest, and he having paid, and the beneficiaries having received such interest, they were barred by acquiescence and homologation from now stating objections to such arrangement.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne), having allowed the parties a proof of their averments, on 16th January 1872 pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Defers the consideration of the petition for three months from this date: Further, appoints the Sheriff-clerk to transmit the proceedings to the Lord Advocate for his consideration."

As stated in a minute for the appellant, "the proceedings were accordingly transmitted, and a criminal charge was preferred against the petitioner of breach of trust and embezzlement. The trial on this charge took place before the Circuit Court of Justiciary held at Dundee on 24th and 25th April last, before a jury. After evidence had been led, and addresses delivered by the counsel for the Crown and the petitioner, the jury, after retiring, returned with a verdict finding, by a majority of five, that the petitioner was guilty of breach of trust, but without felonious intent. The presiding Judge stated that he could not take that verdict; and having read over the libel to the jury, he asked them to retire again and reconsider their verdict. They did so, and returned to the Court with a verdict unanimously finding the petitioner guilty as libelled, but recommending him to the leniency of the Court; and thereupon the presiding Judge sentenced the petitioner to three months' imprisonment, which sentence the petitioner has undergone."

On the expiry of the term of imprisonment the appellant again applied to the Court to grant the prayer of his petition for discharge. On 16th

September 1872 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlo cutor:—"In respect it is in his opinion proved that the petitioner ha been guilty of breach of trust and embezzlement in connection with th sum of £600 of trust-funds referred to in the objections, finds that he i not entitled to a discharge under the Bankruptcy Statute: Therefore di misses the petition and decerns."

The bankrupt appealed.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The petitioner in this case became bankrupt and w sequestrated in March 1870. In September 1871 he obtained a certificate fro his trustee in terms of the 146th section of the Bankruptcy Act, and al obtained the concurrence of a number of his creditors who are certified as bein a majority in number and value. So armed, he applied, in terms of the Ban ruptcy Act, to the Sheriff for his discharge, in a petition dated 16th Novemb 1871. This was opposed by the present respondents, the beneficiaries under trust-deed under which the bankrupt was trustee. It seems that the bankrup had used £600 of the trust-estate for his own purposes. The Sheriff-substitut allowed a proof, and pending the proof the Sheriff adjourned the inquiry fo three months, and directed the proceedings to be laid before the Lord Advocate They were so, and the result was that the bankrupt was tried at the Circui Court in April 1872, on a charge of embezzlement under which he was con victed, and suffered three months' imprisonment. He has now resumed the pro ceedings, and again applies for his discharge. The Sheriff has refused it, and hi judgment is now under our review.

I have no doubt that the appellant was guilty of a fraud in the use he mad of these trust-funds. That indeed was evident enough from the statement mad on his behalf; and it was a fraud of a dangerous kind, for this trustee admit that he used this money in making a purchase of real property, the titles o which he took in his own name, at a time when there seems some reason t think that he knew himself to be embarrassed. On the other hand, there ar some considerations on the other side. The bankrupt has obtained the certificat of the trustee, which has not been impugned, and indeed could not be, for th fraud was not to the prejudice, but was rather to the advantage of the gener body of creditors; and there is no reason to suppose that it in any way con duced to his becoming bankrupt. Moreover, the extent of the sentence inflicte shews that Lord Cowan did think there were mitigating facts in the case.

The question therefore arises, what effect are we now to give to this delinquenc on the appellant's part? I do not think that he has a legal right to deman his discharge, should we think he was guilty of dishonest or irregular or unfa dealing. This would entitle us to delay the discharge for such period as w might think sufficient as a penalty; and the question is, whether we are t exercise this power. Now, here the appellant has satisfied the public intere so far as his sentence went, and he has also suffered a delay of a year in obtai ing his discharge. I am of opinion that he has suffered sufficiently, and ough now to obtain his discharge.

LORD COWAN.—The objection to the discharge for which the petitioner appli is his conviction of the crime of breach of trust and embezzlement in the crimin Court. The case came before me last April, at the Circuit Court of Justicia in Dundee. The bankrupt was indicted by the public prosecutor on a charge breach of trust and embezzlement; and the jury at first proposed to return verdict finding by a majority that the panel was guilty of a breach of trust wit out felonious intent; but as the charge of embezzlement was not noticed by th jury, and as there could be no guilt, if there were no felonious intent, I direct the jury to reconsider the matter. They accordingly retired a second time, an thereafter returned with a unanimous verdict finding the panel guilty as libelled but with a strong recommendation to the leniency of the Court. And there were certainly circumstances in the case tending greatly to diminish the criminality attaching to the panel. Indeed I should not have been surprised had the jury returned a verdict of acquittal. At the same time, it is impossible to say that the verdict was contrary to evidence, and I cannot adopt the argument of the Solicitor-General that the petitioner was really not guilty of any crime, seeing that it appeared at first to the jury that he had acted without felonious intent. The verdict which the jury actually returned was "guilty as libelled"; and such a verdict necessarily implies felonious intent. We must take it for certain that the petitioner has not only been convicted, but has been truly guilty of the crime of breach of trust and embezzlement.

But when I come to consider the present application on its own merits I do not think that the objection of the petitioner's criminality is in the circumstances of the case sufficient to deprive him of the privilege conferred by the Bankruptcy Act to obtain a discharge. Having complied with all the statutory requisites he is entitled to his discharge, in a certain sense as a matter of right, unless there has been proved against him concealment of funds or something criminal in his conduct by which the interests of his creditors are affected. In that case there may be room for refusal, either in hoc statu or for a period more or less in endurance, of the petition for discharge. But here the sentence pronounced in the criminal Court of three months' imprisonment, and which the petitioner has undergone, may well be regarded as adequate to the offence, and such as to preclude the necessity of delay in granting his discharge for any longer period.

Another circumstance which I cannot altogether throw out of view in the present application is that the only parties who oppose the petitioner's discharge are the beneficiaries under the private trust which has been abused; and that they appear, from the letter of their agent, dated 27th February 1871, to have proposed, as the condition of their consent to the bankrupt's discharge, an illegal arrangement or bargain struck at by the Bankruptcy Act; and their opposition may so far be traced as proceeding from sinister and selfish sources.

On the whole matter, I think that the petitioner is entitled to his discharge.

LORD BENHOLME.—The Sheriff-substitute has found by the interlocutor now submitted to our review that the bankrupt is not entitled to a discharge under the Bankruptcy Act, and has therefore dismissed the petition. Now, that looks very like an absolute bar to his ever obtaining a discharge; and the respondents have so argued. But I hardly think that a case of fraud even much worse than the present would deprive a bankrupt for ever of his right to obtain a discharge. We could scarcely hold so in any case. We must therefore take for granted that if we refuse the present application the petitioner may again apply for his discharge, after the lapse of some time. Any delay that we may impose must be regarded as a punishment. Lord Cowan, who necessarily knows more about the circumstances of the case than any of us, has told us that the offence of which the bankrupt was convicted was not of an aggravated character; and in that view of the case I think the imprisonment of the petitioner for three months was a punishment quite adequate to the offence.

Reference has been made to the supposed analogy of an application under the Cessio Act. But the analogy is not very strict; because a decree of cessio does not discharge a bankrupt from his obligations, but merely frees him from incarceration. Still, the proceedings in the two cases agree in this respect, that any delay in granting the application must be considered as a matter of punishment. On the whole, I am inclined to think that the punishment already inflicted is sufficient, and that we ought not to delay granting the discharge.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. I heard the whole evidence in the criminal trial, although I did not happen to be present when the jury returned their verdict. There were many mitigating circumstances in the case, and I should not have been surprised if the verdict had been "not guilty." The sentence of three months' imprisonment was, I think, quite adequate to the offence.

Where bankruptcy is the result of a system of fraud upon his creditors generally, the bankrupt is not within the provisions of the statute conferring the privilege of a discharge. But when bankruptcy has been brought about by innocent misfortune I do not think that a discharge is to be refused merely because the bankrupt may have acted culpably towards one or more of his various creditors.

In the present case, it appears to me that the petitioner has sufficiently expiated the wrong which he did to the objectors, and that in every other respect his conduct as a bankrupt has been unexceptionable. I therefore concur with your Lordships in thinking that his discharge should be no longer delayed.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the judgment: Find the appellant entitled to his discharge, and remit to the Sheriff to grant the same: Find no expenses due in either Court, and decern."

CHARLES BRAND and SON, Pursuers.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Johnstone.
Mrs JESSIE HILL or BELL and OTHERS (Bell's Trustees), Defenders.—Watson—Mackintosh.

Relief—Agreement to allow building-stone to be taken out of lands at a specified rate—Lease.—By an agreement between a railway contractor and a landed proprietor the former was allowed to take building-stone for a viaduct from any part of certain lands, at a certain rate per superficial yard, of whatever depth, the contractor being bound to make good all surface damages, and fill up the quarry when his contract was completed. The contractor opened a quarry near the bank of a river, and in consequence of his operations water flowed into the quarry, and thence into an old coal-waste which communicated with going coal-mines on the estate of the same proprietor. The lessee of the minerals brought a process of suspension and interdict, in which the contractor was ordered to execute certain works, and was found liable in the expenses of process. In an action of relief brought by the contractor against the proprietor, held that the agreement was not a lease, and the pursuer was not entitled to be relieved by the proprietor, either of the sums which he had been obliged to expend for the protection of the coal-mines, or of the expenses of the former process.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. B.

IN 1868 Messrs Brand and Son, railway contractors, undertook to construct for the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company a large viaduct across the river Ayr, at Knockshoggle Holm, on the estate of Enterkine, belonging to Mr Bell. Finding that there was suitable rock on the lands of Knockshoggle Holm, close to the site of the intended viaduct, they entered into an agreement with Mr Bell, dated 11th and 15th December 1868, in the following terms:—"Whereas the said Charles Brand and Son are to be allowed to open up a quarry at Knockshoggle and Craufurdstone Holms, in order to obtain building stones, to be used towards the execution of their contract for the formation of certain branch railways of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway, and it is proper that the arrangment made for the said quarries be reduced to writing, Therefore it is hereby witnessed as follows:—First, The said Charles Brand and Son are to be allowed to open quarries in these farms on either side of the river Ayr, in the property of the said John Bell, and to work the same during the period of the formation of said railways. Second, The said Charles Brand and Son are to pay to the said John Bell 6s. for every square yard of rock wrought out, of what-ver depth, payable at the following times and in the following proportions—viz., £50 at the 1st day of January 1869, and the remainder by uarterly settlements thereafter. If the lordship on the quantity of rock rought out at 1st January 1869 shall not amount to £50 they shall be ntitled to credit for the balance at next settlement. Third, The said harles Brand and Son are to settle all surface damages of every kind, ntil the ground shall have been restored as hereinafter provided. ourth, The said Charles Brand and Son are also to preserve carefully he top soil, fill up said quarry, and restore and make up the ground after heir operations are completed, in every respect as good as before they ommenced operations, to the satisfaction of the said John Bell and his enants. In witness whereof," &c.

In pursuance of this agreement Messrs Brand opened a quarry in Knockshoggle Holm, near the south bank of the river. The river was very liable to floods, and in the autumn of 1869 the trustee for Mr Taylor Gordon, the tenant of the minerals in Enterkine estate, complained that the water of the river percolated through the bank into the quarry, and thence found its way through a coal-waste into the going coal workings in the neighbourhood.

In consequence of these complaints and of a process of suspension and interdict brought in the Sheriff-court of Ayrshire, certain dams and works were erected by Messrs Brand; but these proved insufficient to keep out the water.

In December 1869 Mr Taylor Gordon's trustee raised a process of suspension and interdict against Mr Bell and Messrs Brand in the Court of Session. After some procedure, in the course of which answers were lodged for both defenders, and Messrs Brand and Son intimated to Mr Bell that they would hold him liable to them for any loss or expense they might incur by or through the interdict proceedings, the complainer, on 19th July 1870, abandoned the action as against Mr Bell, and paid his expenses, and the action was dismissed as against Mr Bell.

The process was proceeded with against Messrs Brand, who were ordained to execute certain operations at the sight of Mr M'Creath, a mining engineer. These operations were executed, and the cause being exhausted, the Lord Ordinary decerned against Messrs Brand and Son for he expenses of process.

Messrs Brand and Son brought this action against Mr Bell (whose trustees were sisted in his room on his death) for relief (1) of the sum of £195, 10s. 2d. of taxed expenses, and £1, 0s. 4d. of dues of extracting he decree in the said process of interdict; and (2) of the extra cost or xpenditure (amounting to £629, 14s. 9d.) incurred by the pursuers in xecuting the operations ordered in the said process, "over and above or n excess of the operations stipulated for in the lease of the said quarry ranted by the defender to the pursuers, and relative agreement between he defender and the pursuers," dated, &c.

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The defender having let to the pursuers he stone in question, for payment of a fixed rent, and stipulated for the hole operations or works required by him to be performed by the purers in filling up and restoring the ground, he is bound to free and elieve them of the action at the instance of Mr Jamieson foresaid. 2. he pursuers having opened the quarry and excavated the stone in quesion under and in terms of the lease or agreement foresaid between them nd the defender, and in a proper and workmanlike manner, and being illing to execute the whole operations stipulated in their agreements ith the defender, the defender is bound to relieve them of the proceedngs foresaid, and also of the expense of the operations foresaid not contemplated by said agreements, and of all claims at the instance of the mineral tenant. 3. The pursuers were only bound to fill up the quarry in the manner and with the material agreed upon between them and the defender, and the defender is bound to relieve them of the extra expenditure incurred by their having been compelled as aforesaid to fill up the quarry in a different manner, and to execute extra works for the protection of the mineral workings. 5. The pursuers having fulfilled all their obligations under their lease of the said quarry, and paid the defender for the stone excavated, are entitled to be protected from all claims of damages that may be instituted by the defender's mineral tenant because of the opening of, or in connection with, the said quarry.

The defenders pleaded;—1. The defender is not bound to relieve the pursuers as concluded for—(1) In respect the defender did not come under any obligation to relieve the pursuers; (2) in respect that upon a sound construction of the defender's agreement with the pursuers the pursuers only acquired such rights as the defender himself had and could lawfully exercise; (3) in respect that the said application for interdict, and the said operations ordered by the Court, were rendered necessary by the undue and improper exercise by the pursuers of the right derived by them from the defender; (4) in respect that, in any view, the expenses of filling up the quarry in the manner ordered by the Court were expenses which the pursuers were bound to incur in order to fulfil their obligations under their agreement with the defender. 3. The pursuers are barred from insisting in the claims of relief sued for (1) by having allowed the action of suspension and interdict to be abandoned as against the defender without objection; and (2) by having thereafter made an arrangement for filling up the quarry in any way to be recommended by Mr M'Creath, to which arrangement the defender was not a party.

A proof was led before the Lord Ordinary, the import of which is stated in the latter part of his Lordship's note.

The Lord Ordinary (26th March 1872) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the decree and sums of money, relief from and payment of which are concluded for in this action, resulted from the acts and conduct of the pursuers themselves, and that they have failed to establish any ground or obligation of relief from or payment of said decree or sums against the defenders: Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—This action of relief and payment, as originally brought, was directed against the late Mr Bell of Enterkine, and, in consequence of his death during its dependence, has been latterly insisted in against the present defenders, his trustees and executors.

"The foundation of the action is the document called 'minute of agreement,' No. 18 of process. It bears to have been entered into by the late Mr Bell and the pursuers on the 11th and 15th December 1868, and is to the effect—(1) That the latter were to be allowed to open quarries in the farms or grounds belonging to the former, called 'Knockshoggle and Craufurdstone Holms,' for the purpose of obtaining building stones to be used in the execution of their, the pursuers', contract for the formation of certain branches of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company. (2) That the pursuers were to pay Mr Bell six shillings for every square yard of rock wrought out, of whatever depth. (3) That the pursuers were to settle all surface damages, of whatever kind; and (4) That the pursuers were 'to fill up the quarry, and restore and make up the ground after the operations are completed, in every respect as good as before they commenced operations, to the satisfaction of the said John Bell and his tenants.'

Brand and Son v. Bell's Trustees.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The right given to the pursuers by the agreement of December 1868 was not qualified or restricted by

"This agreement contains no express warrandice, or indeed any other obligation whatever on the part of Mr Bell, except that he was to 'allow' the pursuers to open quarries in the grounds referred to. It is not said that Mr Bell did not fulfil his engagement to allow the pursuers to open any quarries they pleased on the grounds referred to, nor is it said that he in any way whatever controlled or interfered with them in their operations, so as to bring about the claims of his mineral tenants against the pursuers in respect of which the present action has been brought. It is important also to observe that although the pursuers are taken bound to pay Mr Bell at the rate of six shillings per square yard for the 'rock wrought out,' it is not made incumbent on them to put out any given quantity, or to open the quarries on any particular plan, or to work them in any particular way, or to any particular depth. All that appears to have been left to themselves.

"Such being the nature of the agreement, the question arises—upon what ground can it be maintained that Mr Bell is bound and liable to relieve the pursuers from the consequences of their operations as affecting Mr Bell's mineral tenants, Messrs George Taylor and Company? These parties complained that by and in consequence of the pursuers' operations in working the quarries which they had opened on Mr Bell's property their mines were inundated with water, and on this ground they presented a suspension and interdict against both the pursuers and Mr Bell. The latter was, after some procedure, assoilzied; but decree was pronounced against the pursuers, inter alia, ordaining them to execute certain works connected with the filling up of the quarry necessary for the protection of the mineral tenants, besides being found liable in certain expense of process. It is for relief of that decree and their liabilities under it, as well as for payment of the expenses incurred by themselves in resisting the proceedings taken against them by the mineral tenants, that the present action has been brought. The defenders cannot be liable in such relief, in respect of any express warrandice or obligation in Mr Bell's agreement with the pursuers, for by that agreement Mr Bell undertook no express warrandice or other obligation whatever. As already remarked, he merely gave the pursuers leave, so far as he was concerned, to open quarries on certain grounds of his. They were left apparently to do so or not, and where and in what manner they pleased. The defenders cannot therefore be liable to the pursuers in the relief and payment they conclude for, in respect of any express warrandice or other obligation in their agreement with Mr Bell, and this was not maintained by them.

"The next question which arises is, whether Mr Bell was under any such implied warrandice or obligation? That he was, the Lord Ordinary understands was the contention of the pursuers. He understood them to maintain that under the agreement there was an implied, if not an express warrandice or undertaking by Mr Bell that they were to have the right to take out all the rock in his grounds of Knockshoggle and Craufurdstone Holms, and that he was to free them from all the consequences of carrying out and making that right effectual so long as they conducted their operations with ordinary skill, and according to the ordinary methods of quarrying. The Lord Ordinary has been unable to satisfy himself that the pursuers are sound in this contention. It appears to him to be founded on assumptions which have no place in the agreement or circumstances of this case. Mr Bell did not give a lease to the pursuers, and in respect thereof take them bound to pay him a certain or definite amount of rent. All he did was to give them leave to open a quarry or quarries. And, on the other hand, the pursuers did not become bound to open a quarry or quarries in any particular spot, or to put out any specific quantity of rock, or to conduct their operations in any particular way. All that was left to themselves. Where, then, is the implied warrandice or obligation on which the pursuers rely, and how does it arise? The pursuers failed at the debate satisfactorily to answer that question; and, as it appears to the Lord Ordinary, no clear or dis-any right previously communicated by the landlord to his mineral lessees. If Mr Bell had worked his own minerals he could not have insisted on tinct answer to it is to be found in the record. The Lord Ordinary cannot indeed collect either from the pursuers' condescendence or their pleas in law, looked at separately or in combination, the precise grounds upon which the warrandice or other obligation on which the pursuers rely, is founded.

"Even in the case of a regular lease, where a subject is let to a tenant for an onerous consideration, the lessor is not, in the absence of express obligation, liable to protect the tenant against rights affecting the subject let arising from vicinage—1 Bell's Comment. p. 644; and 2 Hunter's Treatise on Landlord and Tenant, p. 260. And the case of Reid v. Shaw (21st February 1822, 1 Sh. 334), cited by these learned authors, appears to have an important bearing on the present. There a party who had obtained for a money consideration right to take by any course he pleased the spring water from a farm for the purpose of a bleachfield having been interdicted by a neighbour from diverting the water from its previous course through his estate was found not entitled to claim damages from the granter of the right, 'in respect,' as the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, which was adhered to by the Inner-House, bears, 'that the pursuer has not been deprived of the water from the fields mentioned in the libel by any act or deed of the defender; that absolute warrandice is not expressed in the contract or agreement libelled on; that the said agreement has been fully implemented by the respondent; that under it the pursuer has obtained all that he stipulated from the defender; and that the respondent is not responsible for the interruption of the pursuer's operations by a third party, of whose rights to interrupt them it must be presumed that both parties were aware at the date of the agreement.' These grounds of absolvitor appear to the Lord Ordinary to be in all essential respects applicable to the present case. In one respect indeed—and a not unimportant one—the case referred to is an a fortiori authority in support of the defenders here, for there the party seeking relief had, under the agreement on which he founded, obtained for an onerous consideration, in express terms, the full and unqualified right to take the whole spring water on a particular farm in any course he pleased, and yet the granter of that right was not held liable in warrandice of it against the claims of a neighbour.

"Independently, however, of either express or implied warrandice, the Lord Ordinary understood the pursuers to maintain that the special circumstances of the present case entitled them to the relief and payment from Mr Bell for which they conclude. But it appears, on the contrary, to the Lord Ordinary that the special circumstances of the present case, as disclosed on the proof, are adverse, rather than favourable to the pursuers' claim. (1) It was the pursuers, in consequence of their having ascertained, in the course of their railway operations, that there was rock of the description they wanted in Mr Bell's grounds, who applied to him for leave to quarry it. There is no evidence of Mr Bell having made any statement to them on the subject. There is no evidence, indeed, that he was previously aware that the stone in question was to be got in his grounds. (2) The pursuers state, in their letter to Mr Shaw of 4th February 1869, that they could have taken the quarries under the railway's compulsory powers; and from this circumstance, as well as others disclosed on the proof, it appears that the agreement with Mr Bell was entered into merely in order to save the pursuers the expense of enforcing the compulsory powers. Now, if this be so, and supposing the pursuers had proceeded under their statutory powers, it cannot be disputed that they would have been liable not only to Mr Bell, but to his mineral tenants also, for all the consequences of their operations—that is to say, they would have been bound to compensate and make good to each of these parties their respective claims arising from the quarrying operations in dispute without any right of relief whatever. If this be so, it is not very easy to see how a right of relief can be available to the pursuers because they have proceeded by the private agreement in question with Mr Bell, in place of under the railway statute, there being no stipulation rformance by the pursuers of any operations beyond those expressly No. 12.

v. Bell's Trustees.

D DEAS.—The question in this case is as to the construction of the agreentered into in December 1868. The material facts lie in a narrow comlthough the proof extends to a considerable length. At the date of the ent matters stood thus:—The late Mr Bell of Enterkine was proprietor farms of Knockshoggle and Craufurdstone Holms mentioned in the ent, extending along both sides of the river Ayr. The Glasgow and Western Railway Company were in the act of forming a viaduct across er Ayr, in the course of constructing a railway through Mr Bell's lands.
Brand were the contractors for building the viaduct, and were naturally s to get freestone for it as near the spot as possible. Mr Bell's farms, ; effect in the agreement. (3) The defenders knew perfectly well when ntered into the agreement that Messrs Taylor and Company had right to inerals, and were working them, if not actually under the quarry, in its iate neighbourhood. (4) They also knew, or had good and sufficient to know when they entered into the agreement, that there was a coal under the quarry communicating with the mineral tenants' workings.

s other pregnant evidence to this effect, the pursuers' manager Thomas , who had explored the underground workings, expressly says—'I had no the waste extended to the quarry and under the quarry.' (5) On 7th ıber 1868, being a few days before the agreement was entered into, Mr ıt, the manager of the mineral tenants, wrote the pursuers, warning of the risk they were incurring by their quarrying operations (which had enced, although the agreement had not been actually executed), and ning them that 'the growth of the water in Craufurdstone Coal, No. 3 ıre, has increased so rapidly of late as to become quite alarming;' and Mr ıt added—'At the same rate of increase the colliery will be flooded and n ruins in a few weeks. From information which has reached me this se can only be attributed to your operations at Knockshoggle and Crau-one in connection with the railway works you are constructing there for lasgow and South-Western Railway.' The pursuer, Mr Brand, when exa-l in regard to this letter, said,—'I don't think I wrote him (Mr Wright) ly.' And he does not say that he communicated the letter, or the inforn it contained, to Mr Bell. And (6) there is no evidence whatever to the that it was through the fault or wrongous conduct in any way of Mr Bell he injurious consequences of the pursuers' operations, which have given the decree and claims, relief and payment of which are now concluded ere caused.

ll these are important features of this case, tending, in the Lord Ordinary's of them, to shew that the pursuers' present action is not well founded. In ular, they shew that although the pursuers were well aware before they enced, and throughout their quarrying operations, not only of the risk were incurring, but of the actual injury that was being done to the mineral
, they persisted in these operations without even notice to or communica-with Mr Bell on the subject; and this was all the more culpable, seeing hey might, by using the necessary precautions, have obtained all the stone hey required without danger or injury to any one. The Lord Ordinary s that this sufficiently appears from the proof, and especially from the lers' witnesses, Mr William Robertson and Mr Robert Brown.

f the Lord Ordinary is right in the preceding view, it is unnecessary to e how far the circumstance of the pursuers having entered into the refer-o Mr M'Creath, without the concurrence of Mr Bell, affects the question ef, as there is enough in the case otherwise, and independently of that cir-ance, to entitle the defenders to the absolvitor which has been pronounced ir favour."

referred to, are notoriously situated in a mineral country, and it was quite well known that there were coal wastes and going pits in the neighbourhood. Mr Bell had let his minerals to Mr Gordon; and Messrs Brand knew the existence of the mines still better, if possible, than Mr Bell, because the railway company had sunk a number of shafts down to what proved to be a coal waste in endeavouring to get information to enable the contractors safely to found the viaduct. The plans of these operations of the company were laid before Messrs Brand to enable them to prepare an estimate. Mr James Brand was bred a civil engineer. He says that he did not know that a waste extended under the piece of ground where he opened the quarry; but he cannot dispute that he knew that coal wastes existed in the neighbourhood, and might very probably extend under it.

Under the agreement Messrs Brand were entitled to take the stone from any part of the farms, and were to pay a specified lordship for each superficial yard. They fixed to begin at a distance of 100 yards from the river, and to work forward to within 30 yards of the river. They had previously tried to get rock on the other side of the river. But it is not proved that there was not good freestone in other parts of the ground to which the agreement applies, although the precise extent of that ground does not appear. There is in no view any evidence that rock could not have been found somewhat further from the river within the ground from which Messrs Brand were entitled to take it.

If, then, the pursuers were to take rock from near to the river—a river subject to floods, and with its banks considerably higher than the surface of the ground where the pursuers began to dig—it must have been quite clear to any man of common sense, who turned his mind to the subject, that the rock could not be taken out with safety to the mineral field below without precautions. With due precautions there was no impracticability in taking out rock even in that spot. Even there the stone could be got, only it was necessary to incur expense in protecting the quarry against the river. If this had been done at first the expense would have been moderate.

Such being the state of matters, the whole question comes to be whether it was incumbent on Mr Bell or on Messrs Brand to provide for that expense. It has been observed repeatedly in the course of the argument that this is not a question under a lease, and that we do not need to go into the matter of leases; for this was not a lease, but an agreement to purchase a quantity of stone for the construction of the viaduct, at a certain price per superficial yard, to be taken out at any place within the lands where Messrs Brand could most conveniently get it. Is it reasonable to suppose that Mr Bell was to be at the expense of whatever operations might be necessary to enable Messrs Brand to get that rock wherever they chose to work for it? That is an extravagant idea, and would require something very plain in the agreement to support it.

Even if we go beyond the agreement, and look at the history of the proceedings, everything goes to confirm the view which I have stated. At the very outset we find the letter of 7th December from Mr Wright, Mr Gordon's manager, calling Messrs Brand and Son's attention to the increase of water in the Craufurdstone coal at No. 3 pit, and stating that it could only be attributed to their operations at Knockshoggle, which he desired permission to examine. To this Mr Brand did not return a written answer; but it appears from the proof that some conferences took place, at one of which Mr Brand had "a long discussion" with Mr Taylor Gordon on the subject. Then from time to time calls were made on the pursuer to take the precautions which in the end it was found necessary to take. In short, the whole expense and all this litigation appears to me to have arisen from that sort of fearlessness—I shall not call it recklessness—so common with contractors and other persons engaged in similar operations, who trust to providence that certain unfavourable contingencies, which may or may not be involved, will turn out not to be involved, and so go on without due inquiry or due precautions against the risks they are incurring. Mr Brand admits that he made no inquiry at all. He paid no attention to the nature of the soil between the quarry and the river, or to the near vicinity of the coal waste. It is said not to be surprising that Mr Brand took that easy view of matters, but the foundation of this simply is that others say they might have done the same. That, in my opinion, is no answer to the case made for the defender, and on the whole I concur in the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, though I do not entirely agree with some of the remarks he has made on the law applicable to leases, which is a subject of great delicacy.

The commencement of the correspondence here is an application by Mr Brand for leave to open the quarry. Then he has a personal communication with Mr Bell; and after that he writes a letter to Mr Bell's agent on 26th September 1868, in which he, inadvertently, or otherwise, uses the word "lease." But in the reply that word is not used, and more correctly the word "agreement" is used, and that word agreement is thereafter alone used throughout the whole correspondence.

Therefore the first remark that I would make is, that this was not a lease, but a mere permission to open a quarry for purposes not apparently permanent, and to raise stones from a considerable extent of ground, payment to be made for the stone, according to what at first strikes one as a strange system, but which appears to be not unusual, viz.—at so much per superficial yard, whatever the depth might be. The next point which attracts consideration is, what was the knowledge which, at the date when he obtained this permission, Mr Brand had with regard to the coal workings in the neighbourhood. I must observe that the viaduct was close by the field for quarrying, upon the same estate, on the same farm even, and there is no doubt that it was in the knowledge of Mr Brand that the viaduct was over a coal waste; and it is proved that the manager for the mineral tenant gave Mr Brand distinct warning as to the hazard of flooding the workings. There is abundant evidence to instruct his knowledge. It is in the knowledge of all this that Mr Brand takes permission under this agreement to work out the stone. Now, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that where these two parties were equally aware of the existence of the coal workings, and also, at least generally, of the waste, Mr Bell came under no obligation, written or implied, to bear the cost, or to share the cost, which might be incurred in preventing the working of the quarry from injuring the mineral tenant's rights. Brand must have known from the very beginning that he incurred great risk, and that in the course of his work he might be involved in expense; but that he was bound to expect and to meet. It gives him no claim against Mr Bell, for it was a danger incident to his contract or agreement, and to the working of the quarry. I think that, looking to the circumstances of this case, the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion; though, if there had been a regular lease to Mr Brand, I would, as I have already said, have some difficulty in agreeing with all his remarks.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of relief. The claim made under the conclusions of the action is that Bell, the landlord, shall reimburse Messrs Brand, the contractors, for the expense which they have been obliged to incur for the protection of the mineral tenant from the consequences of their quarrying operations. The pursuers propose to deduct from the total amount of such expenses the estimated amount which they would have incurred in carrying out their agreement with Mr Bell. That does not, however, vary the nature of the claim, which is a claim to be relieved of the expenses disbursed by the pursuers in protecting the minerals against these quarrying operations. This is an action not at all in the nature of a claim of relief by a cautioner against the principal debtor, nor is it founded on any express clause of warrandice, or obligation of relief, or any joint written obligation out of which an obligation of relief might be inferred in favour of one of two co-obligants against the other. The only possible ground of the claim is implied warrandice, or an implied obligation by the landlord in favour of Messrs Brand.

In order to determine whether there was implied warrandice or an implied obligation of relief, it is necessary to bear in mind the leading facts of the case. In the first place, it is beyond dispute that the pursuers were directly liable to the mineral tenants for the consequences of their operations, and that they could not resist the claim of the mineral tenant in the process of interdict and restoration at his instance. Not only do the pursuers admit this, but it is a necessary part of their case; because if they had not been liable to the mineral tenant, they would have lost their right of recourse against the defender by consenting to decree against them. It is therefore an absolutely necessary part of the pursuers' case that they were directly liable to the mineral tenant to make such operations as Mr M'Creath directed for his protection.

In the next place, this liability of the pursuers should be no matter of surprise to them. It is perfectly well established either that the pursuers did know, or that they ought to have known, that there was great risk in working this quarry of injuring the rights of the mineral tenant. The nature of the ground itself suggested this. Still further, the pursuers knew that in the immediate neighbourhood of the viaduct there was an old coal waste, and they must have known that this waste was likely to communicate with the existing workings, and that if they worked the freestone down to the waste, and allowed water to get into the waste, it was almost inevitable that the water should find its way into the existing coal workings. They entered into this agreement, then, with quite sufficient knowledge that they must incur risk.

In the third place, it is clearly proved that it was quite possible to take freestone out of this very ground without injury to the mineral tenant. No doubt the precautionary measures necessary for this purpose might have cost a good deal of money. But if, after entering into this agreement, the pursuers had found that the cost of the precautionary measures was too great,—that the value of the stone to them was insufficient to justify so great an expenditure,—it was quite within their option not to take any stone out. They had not come under any obligation to pay a rent, or to work under the agreement at all. As far as they were concerned, the agreement was purely permissive. If they found the risk too great, or the expense necessary to avoid the risk too great, they had nothing to do but to give up working.

Keeping these facts before us, we come to the construction of the agreement. By it the landlord gives permission to the contractors to take the stone out of these lands upon the condition that they shall pay at a certain rate for what they took. He was quite entitled to do this in a question with his mineral tenant. It cannot be said that he incurred any liability to his mineral tenant by allowing some one else to do what he was entitled to do under a reservation in the lease to him, viz.,—to take out freestone. No doubt he was not entitled himself to take out the stone in such a way as to injure the mineral tenant, but he was quite entitled to take out the stone in such a way as not to injure him. And the question is, whether, by this agreement, he authorised the pursuers to work out the stone without reference to the interests of the mineral tenant, and in such a way as to injure him. Prima facie this is a very unlikely obligation for a man to undertake. If the pursuers, in the full knowledge of the circumstances, intended to reserve a right of relief, it was their duty to insist upon an express obligation to this effect. There is no such express obligation, and nothing in the agreement from which I can infer any such obligation.

If it could be shewn that the defender was directly liable to the mineral tenant that might create a right of relief ex lege in favour of the pursuers, for they would then be in the position of having stood between the defender and a claim which was primarily exigible from him. But can it be maintained by the mineral tenant that Mr Bell has done anything in violation of his rights? He simply gave permission to another to take the stone; he did not prescribe any mode of working. That throws us back on the supposed obligation of warrandice or relief in the agreement of December 1868.

For these reasons I entirely agree with your Lordships, and with the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Michie's Trustees v. Grant and Others.

Statute—Police Commissioners—Property—Improvement of Street—Solum of Street.—The Aberdeen Police and Water-Works Act, 1862, authorised the commissioners under it to "allow, upon such terms as they think fit, any building within the limits of this Act to be set forward for improving the line of the street in which such building or any building adjacent thereto is situated." Held, in a question between two neighbouring proprietors in a street, that this clause authorised the police commissioners, within reasonable limits, to allow proprietors to build beyond the limits of their property upon the solum of the street.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Gifford. M.

THE trustees of the late George Michie were proprietors of a large tenement situated opposite the head of the Flourmill Brae in Aberdeen. Flourmill Brae is a street running east from St Nicholas Street, an important business thoroughfare in Aberdeen.

Mr D. R. L. Grant was proprietor of certain subjects lying on the north side of Flourmill Brae, which were described in the disposition to him as "bounded on the south-east and south by the street or road called Flourmill Brae."

In February 1871 Mr Grant was about to build a new block of buildings upon his ground, and he submitted to the commissioners of police a plan shewing how he proposed to straighten and improve Flourmill Brae. The line was to be set forward at the south-eastern corner, and set back at other places. The building plan was finally approved by the commissioners of police on 17th April 1871. Thereafter the buildings were proceeded with, and in December 1871 were ready to be roofed in.

Michie's trustees brought this action in January 1872, concluding for declarator that the said D. R. Lyall Grant had no right or title to encroach on the solum of Flourmill Brae Street, or to erect buildings thereon, or to exclude the pursuers from the full use and enjoyment thereof, which they had enjoyed as an access to their premises. There were also conclusions for interdict and for removal of the erections.

The pursuers averred that the effect of the encroachment was materially to injure and impair the access to their property, and otherwise injuriously to affect and diminish the value of their property.

They pleaded;—(1) The defender, David Rait Lyall Grant, having unwarrantably encroached upon the solum of the public street, to the great prejudice of the pursuers, they are entitled to decree against him in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defender Grant pleaded;—(4) The action cannot be maintained, in respect that the defender's buildings have been constructed upon the lines and in accordance with the plans approved of by the commissioners acting under the Aberdeen Police and Water Act, 1862, as above mentioned.* (5) The defender is entitled to absolvitor, in respect that the erection of his buildings upon the said lines, and in accordance with the said plans, has not been, and will not be, productive of any loss or damage to the pursuers or their property, but has been and will be a great public improvement. (6) At all events, the action cannot be maintained, in respect that the defender's operations are innocuæ utilitatis."

The nature of the pursuers' objection to the proposed encroachment

* The sections of the Act founded on are quoted in the opinion of the Lord President upon the street appears from the evidence of an architect examined as one of their witnesses:—"I think the pursuers' property has been injuriously affected by Mr Grant's erection outside of the old building line. The chief ground on which I base that opinion is that the shop at the north end of the house is entirely obscured from St Nicholas Street, from which it was previously seen, and that the entrance to Barnett's Close is very much narrowed by the erection. The bell-mouth which the access had before gave a much more open appearance to the front of Mr Michie's property than it now has. St Nicholas Street is one of the principal thoroughfares in Aberdeen. The signboard of the northmost of Mr Michie's shops was formerly quite visible from St Nicholas Street, and that board had evidently been put over the door for the purpose of being seen from that street. I don't think that part of the property is now of any value as a shop in consequence of losing its view of St Nicholas Street."

The Lord Ordinary, on 29th March 1872, pronounced an interlocutor finding "that the defender, David Rait Lyall Grant, had and has no right or title to encroach or build upon any part of the solum of the street called Flourmill Brae Street of Aberdeen, or to erect any buildings on the said solum, or to exclude the pursuers from the full use and enjoyment thereof; and to this effect finds and declares in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the libel, and decerns: Finds that the defender, the said David Rait Lyall Grant, by the buildings recently erected by him, and which were in the course of erection when the present action was raised, has encroached upon the solum of the said street called Flourmill Brae Street of Aberdeen; and finds that the said encroachment is injurious to the property of the pursuers, situated in or at the end of the said street; and before farther answer, and with reference to the views stated in the annexed note, appoints the case to be enrolled, that the decree of declarator and findings now pronounced may be applied, and the case exhausted; reserving meantime all questions of expenses."*

* "NOTE.—It is not without great reluctance, and after a good deal of difficulty and hesitation, that the Lord Ordinary has found himself obliged to pronounce the decree of declarator and the findings contained in the preceding interlocutor.

"The questions of law involved in the declarator are attended with considerable difficulty, and there will be great hardship if the defender should be compelled to take down the projecting angle of his building which is complained of as an encroachment. On the other hand, however, the pursuers are entitled to vindicate their absolute rights, and the defender has really himself to blame for the embarrassment and probable expense to which he may be exposed.

"The grounds of the Lord Ordinary's judgment are, shortly, the following:—

"(1) The Lord Ordinary holds it to be completely proved that from time immemorial the line of Flourmill Brae Street of Aberdeen, at and opposite the pursuers' property, ran in the curved line represented by the blue tint on the plan No. 6 of process. It is not disputed that from time immemorial the whole space outside that curve was part of the public street, and was causewayed and used as such. This was not seriously contested by the defenders.

"The effect of this curve was to form opposite the pursuers' property a wide or bell-mouthed entry leading from Flourmill Brae into Barnett's Close, and to give to the pursuers' property more light and space than it would enjoy if the curve had been converted into a projecting angle narrowing the street at the place. Among other advantages which the pursuers' property derived from the curve was, that a part of the pursuers' westmost shop was seen by persons passing along St Nicholas Street and looking up Flourmill Brae; and as St Nicholas Street is one of the chief business streets of Aberdeen, it is said to be of great advantage that the pursuers' shop could be seen therefrom.

"It seems to follow that the pursuers have right and interest to maintain the

lefender reclaimed, and argued that the 338th section of the statute rly intended to enable the commissioners to give proprietors, in Flourmill Brae, and to prevent any encroachment thereon unless the king such encroachment can instruct a good and sufficient right to

The defender purchased his property in 1867 from the Lord Provost, tes, and Town-Council of Aberdeen. He purchased it conform to a lan, No. 11 of process, which shews precisely the curve in question as of Flourmill Brae Street; and in the disposition the defender's subjects ibed as bounded on the south-east and south 'by the street or road ourmill Brae.' Still farther, the defender's subjects are described in the on as tinted red in the signed plan, and the red tint terminates with the question. It is plain, therefore, that the defender, by his title, got no ncroach or to build upon any portion of Flourmill Brae. The whole the street, that is, all outside the curve, is, both by description and by luded from the defender's title. All this is quite clear.

defender's case was, to a large extent, rested upon the authority which ained he had derived from the police commissioners, acting under 'The n Police and Water-Works Act, 1862;' and there is certainly a great lifficulty in interpreting some of the clauses of that statute. The pro- of the police commissioners are not very regular, and their minutes are l respects inaccurately expressed. It appeared in evidence that at least the commissioners were not fully aware of the circumstances, and the ngs were in absence, the pursuers of the present action not being heard. question, however, is, whether the commissioners under their statute er to make over to the defender, for the purpose of his building thereon, n of the solum of Flourmill Brae, without the consent of the pursuers, or f the proprietors of that street.

Lord Ordinary thinks the police commissioners had no such power. not vested, either by the statute or otherwise, with the solum of the The vesting clause merely includes paving materials, lamps, &c. They remove obstructions, that is, enlarge the solum of the street, by paying ation; and although it is difficult to construe the 338th section, the dinary thinks that a power to allow buildings to be set forward does not ower to alienate any part of the solum to the prejudice of those who merly enjoyed it. It would be difficult to say where such a power would d if under the 338th section the commissioners could substitute for the ve which the pursuers beneficially enjoyed a projecting angle, to a con- extent obscuring and shutting up the pursuers' property, they might ow the whole street, no matter by what title the proprietors held it. tle apology that by way of compensation for the encroachment upon l Brae the defender gave as much or more ground at the foot of Barnett's This is virtually improving the close at the expense of the street, and the linary cannot find warrant for this in any part of the statute. On a con- of the statute, therefore, the Lord Ordinary feels himself compelled to t the commissioners of police could not make over to the defender a por- he solum of Flourmill Brae, and could not give the defender right to thereon.

It is clearly proved, and indeed is not disputed, that the defender has ed upon the solum of Flourmill Brae Street by his buildings, erected in l 1872. There is some difference as to the exact extent of the en- nt, arising, it appears, from some variation between the building as and the original plan, but the discrepancy is immaterial. The Lord r is also of opinion that the encroachment is to some extent injurious to ers, although probably the pursuers and their witnesses have exaggerated lting injury.

Argued for the pursuers;—Such an interference with the rights of p prietors could only be conferred by very clear and express words, wh were not to be found in the Act.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The parties in this case are proprietors of ground adja to the Flourmill Brae in Aberdeen. It does not appear when Mr Michie, pursuers' author, acquired his property, and it is not of importance in the pre question. Mr Grant acquired his property in 1867 from the Magistrate Aberdeen. It consists of an irregular piece of ground of considerable ext situated on the north or north-west side of Flourmill Brae, which was occu when Mr Grant acquired it by a mill and granary. These buildings at one p abutted on Flourmill Brae in an inconvenient manner, and it was part of arrangement between the Magistrates and Mr Grant that this portion should removed within five years after his entry. The effect of this was to make breadth of Flourmill Brae not less than 25 feet at any part. Mr Grant desi to make a certain further alteration in the line between his property and street, represented by a red line in the plan. This could not be done with authority from those in whom the administration of the public streets is vest The question is whether he has obtained such authority, and, if so, whether th who gave him such authority had power to give it. This depends on the c struction of the "Aberdeen Police and Water-Works Act, 1862." It is said the pursuers that if the line sanctioned by the police commissioners is carri out, and if the buildings on Mr Grant's property are advanced to that line, a extends along Flourmill Brae and a street without a name which turns from at right angles towards the left in going from St Nicholas Street, the effect w be to injure their property on the other side of that unnamed street, by preve ing people going along St Nicholas Street from seeing the property at a distan That is a curious kind of injury, and one which seems a little fanciful. I do n think the disadvantage can be very great. Looking at the proposed alteratio of Mr Grant, with reference not only to his own property and the street, but the property of the pursuers, it appears that Mr Grant's proposal, as sanctione is a great improvement on the locality. However, this does not enter ve deeply into the question. If it could be shewn that the change sanctioned the police commissioners was injurious to the public or a disadvantage to t street, or even if it could be shewn that great injury arose to one or more p prietors, there would be room for interfering, but on other grounds than th stated by the pursuers.

The main question is, had the police commissioners power to sanction t proposal of Mr Grant. That proposal is to advance the buildings in Flourm Brae at one place, but, in compensation, to throw into the street at another pl a considerable portion of what had been Mr Grant's property.

It is said that the proceedings of the police commissioners, even supposi them to have power under their statute, were not regularly carried through. do not attach any importance to that objection. By their minute the poli

Lastly, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuers are not barred anything which they have done or abstained from doing, or by anything whi has taken place, from insisting in the present action. . . . .

"Logically, perhaps, the Lord Ordinary should have ordained the projecti corner to be taken down and set back. He has a strong impression, howev that it would be more equitable and more for the interest of both parties th the defender, instead of taking down the projecting corner, should make pecunia compensation to the pursuers for any injury their property has sustaine Having in view a possible amicable adjustment on this footing, the Lord Or nary, while pronouncing the decree of declarator and the findings contained i the preceding interlocutor, has, quoad ultra, continued the cause. If the views the Lord Ordinary are well founded the pursuers are entitled to expenses."

commissioners very distinctly signify their approval of the proposed plans, and that is all that is necessary.

The question then is, have they power to allow a proprietor in Mr Grant's position to occupy a portion of the solum of the street in one place, and to require him at the same time to set back his buildings at another place for the purpose of improving the street?

There are two portions of the statute which run a good deal into one another. The 24th part, beginning with section 277, relates to the construction and maintenance of sewers. In section 296 it is required that "before beginning to build any new house or building, or to rebuild any existing house or building within the limits of this Act, the person intending to build or rebuild such house or building shall give to the commissioners notice thereof," accompanied with a plan shewing the level at which the foundation is proposed to be laid, "by reference to some level ascertained under the direction of the commissioners, and also shewing the line of the proposed new house or building in reference to the line of the front of the adjoining buildings on both sides." This part of the statute goes on to provide what the commissioners are to do with regard to the levels, having in view the drainage of the house in relation to the drainage of the entire street. But the notice, besides shewing the level, is also to shew "the line of the proposed new house or building in reference to the line of front of the adjoining buildings on both sides." That part of the notice is of no use in reference to the levels or drainage, and is introduced plainly with reference to the next part of the statute, the 25th, which begins with section 307, and relates to the paving, maintaining, forming, naming, and improving streets. That part is subdivided into smaller divisions, with various headings. One of these is "improving the lines of streets, and removing obstructions." It is under this last set of clauses that the question before us immediately occurs. In some of these clauses reference is made back to the notice required by section 296. Section 333 empowers the commissioners from time to time to cause any of the streets to be enlarged, widened, or otherwise improved, "and any new streets to be opened up and formed, and for that purpose they may agree with the owners of any lands within the limits of this Act for the purchase thereof, and they shall resell any parts of the lands so purchased which shall not be wanted for such purpose." Section 334 empowers them to "fix and lay down the line of any house or building to be erected or re-erected in any territory within the limits of this Act, after the date at which this Act shall come into operation within such territory, and may require such house or building to be set back, or the corner thereof, where such house or building is at the corner of a street, to be rounded off to the height of the first storey or floor at least, and in such manner as the commissioners shall direct, for the purpose of widening or otherwise improving any street, provided that the commissioners shall make full compensation . . . in the manner provided by the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts." Here, then, the commissioners are empowered to interfere with the property of an owner for the purpose of widening or improving the street. The commissioners may require him to "set back" his building, which plainly means to build within the outside line of his property. Very properly, compensation is required to be given in such cases. By section 335 the commissioners may signify the line fixed by them within fourteen days after receiving notice. Section 336 gives a very important power to the commissioners. No building can take place without notice to them, and if anything is done without that notice it may be undone. Section 337 allows the owner to proceed if the commissioners fail to signify within fourteen days after the notice of a line different from the line shewn in the plan submitted to them. Then comes section 338, which is the one of greatest importance in the present question. It is in these words: "The commissioners may allow, upon such terms as they think fit, any building within the limits of this Act to be set forward for improving the line of the street in which such building or any building adjacent thereto is situated." It appears to me that this clause is the counterpart of section 334. In section 334 the commissioners are empowered to require an owner to set back, and in section 338 they are entitled to allow him to set forward his house. What is the meaning in these two sections of "set back" and "set forward"?

No. 13.

Nov. 8, 1872.
Michie's Trustees v. Grant and Others.

The natural meaning is to construe them with reference to the line of boundary between the private property and the street. It can hardly be the meaning of section 334 that they can require an owner to set back his building only within the limits of the street so as to bring it within his own boundary. There would be no need for an enactment to this effect, and certainly no need of compensation to the owner. The commissioners would merely be checking an encroachment. Certainly, therefore, section 334 must be intended to give a power to make the owner retire within the boundary of his property.

Again: does "set forward" mean that an owner, who has not built up to the extreme verge of his property may be allowed to come up to the verge on such terms as the commissioners may think fit? Every owner is entitled to come up to his own boundary, and surely it would be most unreasonable that a man should not be allowed to do this except on such terms as the commissioners may think fit. The clause is susceptible of only one other meaning. If "set forward" does not mean to set forward up to the limits of the owner's property, it must mean to set forward beyond the limits of the owner's property. That is the construction contended for by Mr Grant; and not only do I think that it is the necessary meaning of the words, but that the power conferred, although it is one of an important kind, and requiring to be exercised with great discretion, is not unreasonable. This very case, as we see from the pictures in process, suggests a singularly good occasion for the exercise of the power. Why should not the irregularities in a line of street be corrected by putting back the property of one, and putting forward the property of another? Keeping in view the object of the clause—the improving of the street—this necessarily imports that in the one case the street must be encroached on, and in the other private property invaded. Mr Grant says—"Allow me to encroach upon the street at the corner where Flourmill Brae turns to the left. I shall leave, notwithstanding the encroachment, a broad and handsome street, and further on to the north I shall surrender you a piece of ground which will enable you to widen and improve the street there." This is very like the case contemplated by section 338. I am therefore unable to concur with the Lord Ordinary. I think that the proceedings were quite within the statutory powers of the commissioners.

It is said that if this is allowed it would be difficult to say where the power is to end. It is said that the whole buildings along a line of street might be advanced several feet into the street; and various other suppositions are made. The answer is, that commissioners acting under a statute are not likely so to exercise their powers. Such proceedings would be a flagrant abuse of their powers. But if they did act thus, they are liable to be restrained by this Court. They would not be exercising statutory powers for statutory purposes, viz. the forming and improving of the street. Where it is shewn that the power is being exercised for a different purpose, or to the effect of doing something which is the reverse of improving the street, the commissioners may be restrained. And I am not prepared to say that there might not be a case of individual hardship, especially where no power of compensation existed, in which the commissioners might not be restrained. I do not think that a street could be so altered as to do material or irreparable damage to an owner. If any such case arises it will be dealt with according to the well established principles of equity. Here I see no grounds for interfering with the discretion of the commissioners.

Lord Deas.—The statute 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 203, confers on the police commissioners of Aberdeen a variety of powers over streets and buildings with a view to the improvement of the town. In 1867 the Magistrates and Council of Aberdeen sold to Mr Grant the site of an old flourmill situated at the corner of a street called Flourmill Brae, taking him bound to remove an angle which projected into that street so that it should be at no part less than twenty-five feet broad. Mr Grant got a plan prepared by Mr Soutar, architect, according to which it was proposed, besides removing the angle, to improve the street still further by keeping the rounded corner of the new building further back than formerly from the pursuers' property on one side, and bringing that corner further forward than formerly upon Flourmill Brae—the result being to throw into the street on one side considerably more ground than was taken from it on the other. This plan was sanctioned by the police commissioners, and is obviously enough a public improvement, but it is objected to by an adjacent proprietor, Mr Michie, as injurious to his property, and not falling within the powers of the police commissioners.

The statute in question contains a variety of provisions tending to shew that it was thought expedient by those who framed it to put into the hands of the commissioners large powers, with a view to enable them to improve the town. In particular, the 338th section entitles the commissioners to require any house or building "to be set back" "for the purpose of widening or otherwise improving any street"—(full compensation being to be made to the owner); and the 338th section empowers the commissioners to "allow, upon such terms as they think fit, any building within the limits of this Act to be set forward for improving the line of the street."

Now, I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the words "set back" and "set forward" obviously mean to set back from the street or forward upon the street, from which it necessarily follows that the commissioners may in some cases allow a proprietor to appropriate a portion of the solum of the street if that is to be a means of improving the street.

But it has been argued to us, and the Lord Ordinary has held, that the commissioners cannot require a building to be set back without giving compensation in money, and that setting forward upon the street cannot be allowed at all, because that would be an alienation by the commissioners of public property. His Lordship says that a power to allow buildings to be set forward does not infer a power to alienate any part of the solum to the prejudice of those who have formerly enjoyed it. Here and in some other passages of his note the Lord Ordinary inadvertently mixes up two different things,—viz. (1st) the alienation of part of the solum of the street, and (2d) prejudice to those who formerly enjoyed the use of what is so alienated.

The alienation, however, as has just been observed, is a necessary result of the setting forward. The prejudice is a different matter, which may or may not follow; for surely it is at least possible to alienate part of the solum of the street without injuring anybody. The gain may exceed the loss; particularly if as here there is more to be added to the solum of the street than to be taken from it.

If the commissioners are entitled to set back a building on paying compensation in money, can they not do the same thing on giving some other equivalent? The 338th section bears that the commissioners may allow a building to be set forward "upon such terms as they think fit." Can they not, then, allow a building to be set forward in one part upon condition that it shall be set back in another part? To ignore an arrangement of that kind would be to defeat the obvious purpose for which both powers were conferred on them. If the commissioners were to abuse their powers this Court might and would interfere to restrain them; for it by no means follows that because they can lawfully do a reasonable thing they could lawfully do an unreasonable thing.

If, for instance, a particular individual could shew that a proposed operation would cause substantial injury to his property, I by no means say that it would be a sufficient answer to say that, although injurious to him, it would be advantageous to the public. Here I find no trace of anything of that kind. There is no substantial injury inflicted. On the contrary, the localities of both properties will be improved. It is true that in coming up Flourmill Brae, from St Nicholas Street, one of Mr Michie's three shop windows will not come quite so soon into view as it did before. But, on the other hand, the street or lane in front of that window, and which leads round the other side of his property, will be widened and improved. What the architects examined differ about is not matter of fact but matter of opinion, and that difference is really not in skilled opinion, but in matters which anybody who looks at the plans can judge of just as well as they can do. I am satisfied that the pursuers' objections are much too shadowy to entitle them to succeed in this declarator, and I agree with your Lordship that there ought to be decree of absolvitor.

Michie's Trustees v. Grant and Others.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I entirely concur with your Lordships. I remark, first, t if the police commissioners had the power to sanction the alteration they certai exercised that power. Then, had they the power? This is a very fair quest to try. I think they had. They administer for the public good, and we h no suggestion that in the acts complained of here they had any other end object. In the administration of the powers vested in them it cannot be den that in setting back a house they are really taking from an owner either the p perty or the beneficial enjoyment of a part of his property. If they do this t have power to compensate. On the other hand, if they permit a house to be forward, they are necessarily permitting the occupation of a portion of the st with the property put forward. This they are entitled to do on conditions. these are extravagant or corrupt they will be restrained. But if nothing what is reasonable and fair appears, then they have the power. We are not presume an abuse of power. If any of the things suggested as unjust, or oppr sive, or corrupt, were done, nay more, if the rights of one individual were so juriously affected as to be beyond the limits of compensation competent to t commissioners, it would be for this Court to interfere. In this instance, such question can be raised, and I have no doubt that the commissioners act fairly and judiciously.

Landlord and Tenant—Subject of Lease—Rent—Retention.—A gas compa let to a tenant a piece of ground adjoining their works, with right to the wh ammoniacal liquor and tar produced at their gas-work, at a rent of £130. He that an averment by the tenant that the company had not implemented t contract by supplying the whole tar, &c. was a relevant defence in a petition f sequestration for the stipulated rent.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Ayrshire.
I.

THIS was an appeal from the Sheriff-court of Ayrshire at Kilmarno in a petition for sequestration for rent brought by the Kilmarnock G Light Company against their tenant, Robert Fraser Smith, the appellar

By the lease the Kilmarnock Gas-Light Company set to Mr Smith small piece of ground adjoining their works, "with right to the wh of the ammoniacal liquor and the tar which shall flow into the tenar cistern produced and arising from the company's works in their operatic of making gas, and that for the period of ten years, subject to the br after-mentioned, from the term of Whitsunday of this year, it being he by stipulated that the tar, after being distilled by the tenant, shall returned by him to the company, as was done by the former tenant, a that the tenant shall thereafter receive back again what the company not require for the heating of their retorts, or otherways connected with works: For which causes, and on the other part, the said Robert Sm and with and for him the said William Smith as his cautioner and j obligant, bind and oblige themselves, conjunctly and severally, their h and successors, to make payment to the said first party of the ann fixed rent of £130 sterling, and that by equal portions, at two terms the year, Martinmas and Whitsunday, beginning the first term's paym thereof at Martinmas 1860.

Kilmarnock Gas-Light Co. v. Smith.

The stipulated rent of £130 was regularly paid up to Whitsunday 1868. The half year's rent due at Martinmas 1868 was unpaid, and the petition for sequestration was presented on 19th January 1869. It prayed the Sheriff, in ordinary form, to sequestrate the appellant's effects on the premises subject to the petitioners' hypothec, "in security and for payment of the rent of said subjects, being £130 for the current year ending at Whitsunday 1869, due at Martinmas 1868 and Whitsunday 1869, by equal portions, with interest and expenses; and to grant warrant for selling the said effects liable to the petitioners' hypothec as aforesaid, or as much thereof as will satisfy and pay the said rent, interest, and expenses, the term of payment being always first come and bygone as regards the second half or moiety thereof to become due at Whitsunday 1869."

The defence stated was a denial of resting owing any portion of the sum sued for; and it was explained that the appellant, in terms of the lease founded on, and which was itself referred to for its terms, in respect of a fixed yearly rent of £130, was entitled to the whole of the ammoniacal liquor and tar produced and arising from the company's works in their operations of making gas, but that he had not received the subject leased, in respect the petitioners claimed the right, and had exercised it, of diverting, for purposes of their own, large quantities of the tar and ammoniacal liquor to which the respondent was entitled, and that by means of underground pipes or concealed communications, whereby the tar or liquor was diverted from the respondent.

No objection was raised in the Sheriff-court to the competency of sequestration under a contract of lease of the nature of that founded on.

The gas company, petitioners in the inferior Court, pleaded;—(1) The defender had neither set forth any sufficient or relevant ground, nor did any sufficient or relevant ground exist, for his refusing to pay the rent claimed. (4) The defender was not entitled to refuse payment of his liquid and unambiguous obligation to pay the rent claimed from him on any of the grounds stated in defence, even though an action had been raised by him for the purpose of constituting his alleged counter claim.

The appellant pleaded;—The defender, not having received the ammoniacal liquor and the tar to which he was entitled under the lease, was not bound to pay the rent sued for, and should be assoilzied, with costs, reserving all his claims against the pursuers.

On 3d November 1869 the Sheriff-substitute (Mure) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Repels the pursuers' first additional plea in law, in so far as it denies the relevancy of the defender's allegations to infer the right of withholding payment of any term's rent, pro tanto of the value of the amount of crude products stipulated under the lease to be furnished during the term in question but withheld: Reserves said plea to all other effects: Allows, before answer, a proof to the parties of their several averments as to the alleged undue withholding or abstraction, and as to the arrangement of the gas company's works, their communication with the 'tenant's cistern,' and the position of the latter, all in their relation to one another, and as parts of a going concern at the time the contract was made, and to both parties a conjunct proof."

The Sheriff (Campbell), on appeal, recalled this interlocutor, and opened up the record, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute.

The appellant thereafter was allowed to amend his record, and to extend his averments of abstraction to the whole of the years from Whitsunday 1867 to Whitsunday 1869, being the year for which sequestration was craved and the year preceding.

On 22d June 1870 the Sheriff-substitute (Anderson) sustained the defences, to the effect of allowing the defender a proof, before answer, of his averments that since Whitsunday 1867 the pursuers had clandestinely withheld large quantities of the ammoniacal liquor and tar which they were bound to send him, and that the quality of the diminished supply had been wilfully deteriorated.

After proof had been led at great length, the Sheriff-substitute, on 4th January 1872, found that the respondent had failed to prove that the petitioners, since 1867, had clandestinely withheld large quantities of tar and ammoniacal liquor which they were bound to send him, and that the quality of the diminished supply had been wilfully deteriorated. He therefore decerned against the respondent in terms of the prayer of the petition, authorised the petitioners to uplift the consigned money, and allowed them to give in an account of expenses, &c.

The Sheriff adhered on appeal. The respondent, Mr Smith, appealed to the Court of Session.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—If this contract was a lease, then retention was not competent by reason of an illiquid claim of damages. If it was not a lease, but a contract of sale, then there could be no hypothec and sequestration was incompetent.[2] But no objection was made to the relevancy of the process. It must therefore be taken on the footing of lease. If, then, the proper subject of the lease was not given, the tenant might throw up his lease and claim damages.[3] He was not entitled to continue in possession under his lease and yet withhold the rent. The defence, therefore, was irrelevant, and a proof should have been refused.[4]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case presents itself to us under a somewhat novel aspect. The original petition is one for sequestration in security, and for payment of rent for the year ending Whitsunday 1869, and, so far as I can see, nothing was done in the course of the proceedings to extend its application. We have therefore no question before us excepting this, whether the prayer of the petition ought to have been granted.

The lease is in itself a somewhat peculiar one. It is a lease of a certain piece of ground adjoining the Kilmarnock Gas-Works. The subject is a heritable subject, but it is let with the right to the whole ammoniacal liquor and tar "which should flow into the tenant's cistern, produced and arising from the company's work in their operations of making gas." The tenant, on the other hand, undertakes to pay the annual fixed rent of £130, and to return the distilled or boiled material to the petitioners' works. Now, it should be remarked, in the first place, that the rent is to be uniform and constant; and it certainly occurs to me that in the expectation of parties the supply was also to be uniform. There is, however, no guarantee that there should be any specific amount supplied, but only that that amount which was produced should be conveyed to the respondent's tank. There is no restriction on the mode of working the process of gas making or on the machinery to be used; but the landlord was not entitled capriciously or fraudulently to diminish the amount of refuse produced. The gas company could not utilise these secondary products themselves under their company contract, while, on the other hand, the tenant found considerable advantage in getting the use of them, as is proved by his demand in this case. In fact the lease was a favourable contract for both parties.

The lease was entered into at Whitsunday 1860, and was to continue for ten years. In 1867 a quarrel seems to have arisen between Mr Walker, the peti-

's manager, and the respondent. The subject of that quarrel is unimport- nt it had two results. First, Mr Smith began to complain of not getting oper amount of tar and ammoniacal liquor, and, in the second place, Mr ar began to complain that the boiled tar was not returned in terms of the ct. The boiled tar ceased to be regularly returned, and there is a sus-, but it hardly goes beyond suspicion, that the stoppage of it was not ntal. But, on the other hand, the tenant says that there was a design of epting his supply and obstructing his working systematically carried on. bjected, on the part of the landlord, that that allegation is not relevant to e the tenant from the claim of rent made in this sequestration process. I t think that, after the parties have joined issue and gone to proof on the s of the case, we can now go back on such a point. But I do not think his question, had it arisen as the main question for judgment, would have ttended with difficulty. The landlord is as much bound to put and con- the tenant in possession, as far at least as his own action is concerned, as nant is to pay his rent. It does not follow that every alleged deviation incidental stipulations in the contract will entitle a tenant to resist the d of the landlord for the liquidated rent; and questions have often rd in regard to caution or consignation as the condition of allowing the t to defend or suspend the demand on such grounds. But by a series of ons it is well fixed that if the lessor by his own act withhold from the t the whole, or any material part of the subject of the lease, the tenant resist payment to the extent at least of what he has suffered. The case of on v. Suttie, reported in the 4th vol. of Murray, p. 86, is a good example is, in which a tenant of a water power was allowed to plead, in a suspension harge for rent, that he had been deprived of the water power for a portion s lease. Mr Hunter in his last edition so states the law, and supports it ny authorities. The continuance of the tenant in possession may prevent from rescinding the contract, but will not deprive him of his defence to ndlord's demand. When, however, the defence is pleaded, it must be y proved. An opportunity was allowed the tenant to establish his allega- but we are of opinion, on a careful consideration of the evidence, that he iled in doing so. I think, therefore, that the result of the whole case is, while the defence is quite relevant it has not been proved in such a way as pport it against the landlord's claim.

RD COWAN.—Though this appeared at first sight a somewhat perplexing the elements of fact on which our judgment may proceed have been clearly ed in the course of the argument. The contention of the gas company, as d by Mr Watson, was that this defence ought not to have been sustained l; that it is an irrelevant defence to a petition for sequestration for rent, that therefore the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 3d November 1869, ted on 22d June 1870, was erroneous. That interlocutor, however, of the ff-substitute which embraced a consideration of all the tenant's allegations t the withholding of the tar and ammoniacal liquor was not carried to w, but was virtually, as I think, acquiesced in by the parties, and made ubject of a long and expensive proof by both parties extending over the e period from 1867 till the end of the lease in 1870. No doubt it is true the landlord's claim for rent cannot be met by an illiquid claim of damages. I do not hold this defence to be a claim of damages at all. The defence is the whole subject has not been given, and to that defence I see no good d for the objection of irrelevancy. If the tenant has not got the whole cts of his lease, he cannot be required to pay his full rent. The proof has d been allowed to extend beyond the years for which rent is sought to be ed, and unless the interlocutor of June 1870 had been acquiesced in, as I t it was, and the parties had joined issue and gone to proof, there might been some difficulty in extricating the case and disposing of it on proper iples; but as the case stands it appears to me that the rights of parties be judged of on the proof, and as to its effect I concur in the opinion de- d by your Lordship.

2D DIVISION. Lord Gifford. I.

THE late Adam Wilson of Auchengownie, in Perthshire, and Tannerhal in Kinross, died on 25th June 1871, unmarried, and considerably over eight years of age. He left a disposition and settlement, dated 25th Decemb 1865, which lay in the hands of his law-agents, Messrs J. and J. Miller Perth. By it he disponed to Robert Arnott, farmer at Hatchbank, by Ki ross, his estate of Auchengownie, worth about £5500, under real burden an annuity of £40 to the testator's sister, Helen Wilson, to David Dry dale, draper, Milnathort, his estate of the sixteenth part of Middletown Cullenoquhies, otherwise called Tannerhall, worth about £1000, and a pointed John Arnott, farmer, Bowhouse, and the said David Drysdale, l sole executors, directing them to divide the free residue of his moveal estate (which turned out to amount to about £500), among such of t said John Arnott's children as should survive him, other than the sa Robert. By codicil, dated 7th October 1870, annexed to the said sett ment, he confirmed the same with the exception of the provision as to l moveable estate, which he now directed his executors to pay over James Hutton, overseer at Hallgreig, near Kinross.

On the 4th of August 1871, more than a month after Adam Wilso death, the defender, Catherine Burt, daughter of David Burt, farmer

Deuglie, in Perthshire, produced an ex facie probative deed, signed "Adam Wilson," and bearing in the testing-clause to have been subscribed by Adam Wilson of Auchengownie, at Deuglie, on 9th February 1871, before the said David Burt and his son David Abercromby Burt, physician at Aberdour, in Fife. By it Wilson disponed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to the defender, Miss Burt, and appointed her his sole executrix and universal legatary. No provision, like that in the prior deed, was made in favour of his sister.

The present action was brought by the said John Arnott and David Drysdale, the accepting and acting executors under the settlement of 1865, and by the said Robert Arnott, David Drysdale, and James Hutton, disponees under the same, for the purpose of reducing the said pretended settlement in favour of the defender, on the ground of forgery.

After the record was closed, a proof was allowed by the Lord Ordinary under the "Evidence (Scotland) Act, 1866;" on the second day of which, and near the close of the pursuers' evidence, their counsel applied to be allowed to amend the record to the effect of adding an additional statement and plea in law thereto in the following terms, viz.:—(Cond. 9). "Assuming the signatures to the disposition and settlement, dated 9th February 1871, to be the signatures of Adam Wilson, which is denied, the said disposition and settlement is null and void, not having been tested or executed according to law, or with the requisite solemnities. In particular, neither the said David Burt nor David Abercromby Burt, whose names appear on the said disposition and settlement as witnesses to Mr Wilson's signature, subscribed it in the capacity of witnesses to Mr Wilson's signature. They were neither called to act, nor did they act as witnesses to Mr Wilson's alleged signature, nor were they intended by the said Adam Wilson to be witnesses to such signature. They did not sign their names to the disposition and settlement till a considerable time after Mr Wilson's death, and when they so signed their names neither the said David Burt nor David Abercromby Burt knew or had the means of knowing that the document signed by them was the document alleged to have been signed by the said Adam Wilson at Deuglie on 9th February 1871." (Additional plea in law). "The pretended disposition and settlement of 9th February 1871 is ineffectual, and ought to be reduced, in respect it was not executed in conformity with the solemnities required by law."

The Lord Ordinary, on 2d March 1872, issued the following interlocutor:—"Having heard parties procurators on the pursuers' minute of amendment, No. 147 of process, lodged this day, opens up the record, and allows the pursuers to add to their condescendence and pleas in law the additional statement and additional plea in law contained in said minute, and to this effect sustains the said amendment: Allows the defender to answer the said statement, and to make any addition to the record and plea in law which she may consider necessary, and that by Tuesday next, and appoints the case to be enrolled for that day to close the record of new, and adjourns the proof till Tuesday, the 12th current, at half-past ten o'clock forenoon; reserving in the meantime all questions of expenses occasioned by the said amendment, and by the adjournment of the proof."

The defender, in answer to the foregoing additional statement, admitted that the said David Burt and David Abercromby Burt did not sign their names to the said disposition and settlement till after Mr Wilson's death, and quoad ultra denied the statement. On 12th March the defender led other evidence, and on the same day the proof was closed.

In the course of the proof the defender was examined with reference to what took place at the time when Mr Wilson signed the settlement in h favour, and she deponed that on the 9th of February 1871 her father a brother came into the room in Deuglie farm-house, where the deceas was sitting with her: that then "my brother objected to signing it, a thought it better to have strangers; but Mr Wilson said, 'Dawvid, y are quite good enough.' (Q.) What was said after that? (A.) There w something said about witnesses, and my father suggested that if we we requiring witnesses we could get them at Damhead—and he propos William Laing and James Taylor, who lived at Damhead. Mr Wils said no, and that my father and brother were good enough: but he said my brother had any objection, he (Mr Wilson) was going to Aberdo when he would do away with that objection, and would acknowledge h signature there to two who were no relations. (Q.) Your brother declin to sign? (A.) Yes, he declined. (Q.) And the intention was that M Wilson should come some day to Aberdour to acknowledge his signatu before two other persons? (A.) He said so, to obviate any objection h had. My father did not sign; he was not asked to do so. Nobody w asked to sign except my brother David, and he declined." In thi account the defender was substantially corroborated by her father an brother. It was further proved that Mr Wilson never went to Aberdou as proposed; and that on his deathbed he was under the belief that h had provided for his sister and Mr Hutton, who had both been favoure in the settlement of 1865. It appeared, also, that no attempt was mad by the defender to have the deed completed by the addition of the signa ture of witnesses till the end of July or beginning of August 1871, mor than a month after Mr Wilson's death, when, on receiving the intelligenc that relatives were competent to act as instrumentary witnesses, she ob tained the attestation of her father and brother.

The Lord Ordinary, on 27th March 1872, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators, and having considered the closed record as amended, proof adduced, and whole process, Find that the pursuers have failed to prove that the deed under reduction, No 19 of process, is false or forged, and assoilzies the defender from the con clusions of the action so far as laid on the ground of forgery; but finds that the said deed, No. 19 of process, was never completed by the deceased Adam Wilson, and was never intended by him to receive effect as his final and completed settlement: Therefore reduces, retreats, rescinds, and annuls the said deed, No. 19 of process, and decerns and declares the same to have been from the beginning, to be now, and in all time coming void and null, and of no avail, force, strength, or effect in judgment or outwith the same in all time coming, and decerns in the reduction accordingly: Finds no expenses due to or by either party, and decerns." *

* "NOTE.—The two great questions raised in this action are (first) Whether the deed of settlement founded on by the defender bears the genuine subscription of the testator, or whether it is not a forged and fabricated deed? and (second) Whether, assuming the signature to be genuine, the deed is properly and legally tested, or rather, whether the deed was signed by the testator as his completed deed?

"But before approaching either of these two questions it is impossible to avoid remarking that the deed in question, assuming the subscription to be genuine, is exposed to the strongest possible suspicion, and the circumstances in which it was prepared and executed cannot be left out of view in considering and determining the two questions which are submitted for the decision of the Court. The testator was, at the date of the deed in question (1871), a very old man, apparently nearly ninety years of age. The solicitor who prepared the deed never saw the testator, and never received any instructions from him, either oral or written. No draft of the settlement was ever communicated to the testator, or approved by him. The testator's ordinary agents were not consulted on the subject. The instructions to prepare the settlement were given, as from the testator, by Miss Burt, the defender, the sole beneficiary under the deed. To no human being, excepting the defender, were the testator's intentions ever communicated. The deed was not read over aloud to the testator; and, although he had an opportunity of reading it himself, it is not shewn that he understood its nature and import. The instrumentary witnesses to the deed were the defender's father and brother, but even they had no conversation with the testator on the subject-matter of the deed; and, lastly, after the deed was signed, the testator acted in a manner inconsistent with the deed, and on his deathbed referred his friends to previous settlements in the hands of his agents, Messrs Miller, as the final and subsisting testamentary settlements of his affairs. The details connected with all these circumstances are fully brought out in the proof, and even if there had been no question of forgery, and no question regarding the testing or completion of the deed, the Lord Ordinary cannot help entertaining the gravest doubts whether such a settlement could receive effect.

"There is a most salutary jurisdiction in Courts of equity to set aside, on grounds of general or public policy, deeds obtained gratuitously by a donee standing in relations of confidence towards the testator or donor, in circumstances which create a presumption that undue influence had been exercised. The principle is of the widest application. It extends to all the relations of life, but each case necessarily depends on its own peculiar circumstances. (See a great variety of such cases collected in 'Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity,' vol. ii., p. 528, in a note to Huguenin v. Basely). A familiar illustration of the application of the principle occurs when a law-agent takes a settlement from his client in favour of himself; and in such cases it has been held that there is a presumption against the deed, which the grantee must overcome by evidence, otherwise the deed will be set aside. (See the recent case of Grieve v. Cunningham, 17th December 1869, 8 Macph. 317.) In this case, Lord Barcaple observed, and his observation was approved by the Court, that 'in many, perhaps in most cases, the presumption against the deed, created by the mere circumstance that the party favoured is the law-agent who prepared it, will supply the want of all other elements of fraudulent impetration. It never can be a proper course, in any ordinary circumstances, for a law-agent so to act, and the Lord Ordinary conceives it will always lie upon him to shew that the making of the settlement in his favour was the free and uninfluenced act of the testatrix, deliberately entertained, and carried through with an entire knowledge of its effect.' The case of a beneficiary who prepares a deed in his own favour may be more favourable, but still it is analogous; and the circumstances of the present case seem to make Miss Burt's position almost as unfavourable as if she herself had written out the deed. The employment of Mr Blair goes for nothing. He was merely the defender's hand, and had nothing whatever to do with the testator, and it is in evidence that the defender had an influence over the aged testator which might very easily be improperly used. In the present case, however, the deed is not challenged on the ground of undue influence, and it is unnecessary further to consider this aspect of the case. The Lord Ordinary has only referred to it because, in his view, it has a bearing, and perhaps not an unimportant bearing, on the two questions on which the parties have joined issue. To these questions the Lord Ordinary will now shortly advert.

"On the whole, therefore, and on the question of forgery, the Lord Ordinary finds for the defender; but

"2. Is the deed duly tested? or, rather, was it signed by the testator as a completed deed, and with the intention that, without any further act on his part, it should receive effect as his settlement? This is a most important and a most delicate question, and one on which, perhaps, there is no direct prece-

Court of Session Act, 1868" did not permit a party at the close of his case to introduce an entirely new element of controversy.[1] The case

dent. It was not raised on the record as originally closed, but only came out in the course of the proof, and led to the amendment which, after full discussion, was allowed by the Lord Ordinary by interlocutor of 2d current. The Lord Ordinary thought it right to allow the amendment, because, in conformity with the recent statute, all questions really arising between the parties, and within the conclusions, should be determined in the present action, instead of remitting the parties to a new suit. He reserved the question of expenses, and to this reservation he has given effect in the present judgment. In considering the question raised by the pursuers' amendment and additional plea the Lord Ordinary assumes the entire truth and accuracy of the depositions of the defender, her father, and brother. His judgment proceeds upon the facts as stated by the defender's own witnesses, corroborated by the conduct of the testator, and by the real evidence in the case. According to the evidence of the defender, her brother, and father, it appears that Dr Burt objected to signing as instrumentary witness, on the ground of relationship to the defender, an objection in the circumstances most natural and proper. The objection, though not stated by or for the father, was equally applicable to him, and he was never asked to sign as witness. The testator yielded to Dr Burt's objection; and although he signed the deed, he did so on the footing that neither Dr Burt nor the father were to be the instrumentary witnesses, but that he, the testator, should come to Aberdour some other day, and there acknowledge his subscription before two witnesses who were 'no relations.' It was upon this footing that the signed deed was retained by the defender and taken to Aberdour. It is impossible to dispute upon the evidence that this was the arrangement upon which the deed was signed and left with Miss Burt. Dr Burt and his father were not to be witnesses, but the testator was to come to Aberdour and acknowledge his subscription before two independent witnesses there. No doubt this arrangement was made to obviate Dr Burt's objection; but the important fact is, that the objection was assented to by all the parties, particularly by the testator, who left upon the understanding, indeed upon the express agreement, that Dr Burt and his father were not to be witnesses at all. Now, the testator never went to Aberdour, he never acknowledged his subscription before two independent witnesses, or before any witnesses at all, and the question is, was he not entitled to conclude that the deed was an incompleted deed, and to act accordingly? Or, to put the question in another way, were Dr Burt and the father, after declining to be witnesses, after having their declinature admitted by the testator, and after allowing the testator to leave the deed on the footing that other witnesses were required, entitled at their own hands, ex intervallo, and after the testator's death, to change their mind, and to complete the deed which the testator thought could not be completed without an acknowledgment to be made by the testator himself?

"The question thus arising on the evidence of the defender's own witnesses is extremely important, and it must be kept in view that that evidence is entirely and very strongly corroborated by the conduct of the testator himself, as well as by the conduct of the defender and her brother. The testator, as is proved by Mr Menzies and others, evidently thought that he had completed no new settlement inconsistent with that of 1865, in the hands of Messrs Miller, and the defender and her brother admittedly thought that the deed of 1871 was worthless, the same never having been completed, and they acted upon this footing for a considerable time.

"There seems no direct authority applicable to circumstances like the present. The recorded case most nearly in point is that of Home v. Dickson, June 1730 (Mor. 16,898), where a mutual contract was left in the hands of one of the parties incomplete and unsigned by witnesses. At the instigation of the revealed upon the closed record was one of forgery only. If the amendment was allowed it should only be on condition of the pursuers paying expenses.[1]

On the merits,—(1) It was not a sufficient objection to an "ex facie" probative deed that the attestations were added not unico contextu with the principal signature, but ex intervallo. This appeared from a survey of the statutes and cases from 1540, c. 117, down to the present time, and especially the case of Frank,[2] and the text-books on conveyancing and eviparty in whose hands the deed was left, the witnesses afterwards signed, but it was found that the imperfect deed could not be thus completed without the consent of both the contracting parties. The true ground of judgment, as explained by Professor Menzies (Conveyancing, p. 119), and by Professor M. Bell (i. 49), was that the parties had not completed the deed when they broke up, and that it could not be in the power of witnesses to complete a contract which the parties themselves had left imperfect. If the deed itself was really completed it is no objection that the witnesses sign ex intervallo. This is of everyday occurrence, and is established by many cases. Nor does the Lord Ordinary think there is any reasonable doubt as to the identity of the deed signed by the witnesses in August with that which the testator signed in February preceding. The true, and in the Lord Ordinary's view, the only point is, that the testator did not sign the deed, and did not leave it with Miss Burt as his final and completed will. In point of principle it seems clear that, if the testator did not intend to complete the will, any two persons who happen to see him sign could not, in spite of his intention, make it complete. Most of our writers lay it down that instrumentary witnesses must be called as such, either expressly or by implication. It is not a mere accidental sight of the signing that will make an instrumentary witness. Suppose the testator had expressly prohibited Dr Burt and his father from signing or from acting as witnesses, could they, in spite of his prohibition, act and sign as such, especially after the testator's death? Or, suppose that the testator, knowing that instrumentary witnesses were necessary (the deed not being holograph), should sign in the privacy of his own room, could two persons, who had stealthily or accidentally seen him sign, by looking in at his window, complete and validate the deed without his knowledge? It is thought not; and the Lord Ordinary, while admitting the novelty, and, in many respects, the delicacy of the question, has really little hesitation in holding that, if it be once proved in point of fact that the testator did not really mean to complete his deed by signing it, then it can never be completed by the mere act of the witnesses.

"The result is that while, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, the deed is not reducible on the ground of forgery, it must be set aside as never having been completed by the testator. As the pursuers have failed in the whole original grounds of action, and have only succeeded on the new grounds introduced on amendment, the Lord Ordinary has found neither party entitled to expenses. He has hesitated whether some expense should not be awarded to the defender, who has been successful in repelling the accusation of forgery. But the defender was so much to blame in the manner in which the deed was got up that substantial justice is done by allowing each party to pay their own expenses."

dence.[1] It was common in practice for the same clerks, by one subscription, to attest the signatures of railway directors who had signed the same deed on different days. (2) The objection that a witness might thus have the option of making a man testate or intestate might be got over by the Court compelling an unwilling witness to subscribe, or holding his attestation unnecessary. (3) Attestation was only a mode of proof, indispensable in certain cases; it did not complete the deed; for if it did, the date would be that of the attestation, not of the principal signature. (4) As to the effect of the testator dying before the witnesses had added their signatures, if attestation was only a mode of proof such an event could make no difference, as the deed had been already made. (5) The question whether Mr Wilson understood the settlement to be a completed deed was nowhere raised either in the original record or in the amendment. But he was himself quite satisfied with the Burts as witnesses, and he delivered up the deed into the hands of the defender.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The amendment of the record was rendered necessary by the reticence of the defender's father and brother, who did not reveal, till cross-examined for the defender, the fact that their signatures as witnesses were added ex intervallo. (2) The Burts were not intended eventually by the testator to act as witnesses.[2] (3) There was no case in which such a long interval of time, as here alleged, had elapsed between the signatures of the principal and of the witnesses. Nor was there any case in which a deed signed by the witnesses after the death of the granter had been sustained as well executed. (4) There was no sufficient proof that the Burts could identify the deed which they signed as the same which they had seen signed by Wilson. (5) Wilson never understood that the alleged settlement was a completed deed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case has been ably and fully argued before us. Originally the action was a reduction on the ground of forgery, but at the close of their proof the pursuers proposed to add another ground of action expressed in a minute of amendment, which in substance amounts to this, that even if the deed had been signed by the testator it was not tested or executed according to law, and in particular the witnesses were not called as witnesses—they did not subscribe their names at the time of the testator's subscription, but only after his death, and when they signed they had not the means of identifying the deed. The Lord Ordinary admitted that amendment, and he was entitled under the terms of the Act of 1868 to add it to the record. In the case of Forbes v. Watt, cited by the defender, an amendment was tendered after the case had been decided on the ground on which the parties had come into Court. As the case had been decided we refused to allow the amendment, and a similar case we should decide in a similar way. The case of Stewart v. Gelot is similar to the present. There, even after a verdict had been returned, a new ground of defence was allowed to be added to the record. I do not think we can exclude this amendment. There is no object to serve in doing so, for as the pursuers could have raised another action on the second ground of reduction the matter resolves itself into a question of expenses.

Now, there are two grounds of reduction. The first ground, that of forgery, is a very serious matter. The counsel for the defender gave us a most able and masterly argument on that question, and I must own that it is difficult to come to a positive decision one way or the other. I am not prepared to say that the charge is proved. It depends entirely on the comparison of handwriting. There is nothing else in the case which tends to prove or even imply forgery. No doubt there are circumstances that make it improbable that the testator should have signed the deed, but there are also circumstances which make it possible or even probable that he did sign it. With regard to the surrounding circumstances of the case they are quite as consistent with the deed having been signed as with the deed not having been signed. It is clearly proved that the defender and her brother made an expedition to old Mr Burt's, that Mr Wilson met them, and that they had the deed with them. Certainly Mr Blair did prepare the deed, on the employment of Miss Burt, and obviously it was prepared with a view of being signed. I cannot agree with the Solicitor-General that the whole story of that visit is a myth, spoken to as it is by five witnesses. For, besides the defender and her father and brother, we have also Margaret Burt and the boy who speak to it. On the question of the fact of the visit the evidence is conclusive that it took place. The real question is whether it is proved that on that occasion Wilson did not sign the deed. Now, the main evidence on that point is from the comparison of handwriting. So far as that evidence goes it may shew that the signature of Wilson to the alleged forged deed is not Wilson's ordinary signature. But comparatio literarum can go no further. I should hesitate to go simply on a comparison of handwriting,—a kind of evidence which often leads to fallacious results. During the debate something was said about experts. I think that a person acquainted with the particular handwriting of the party, or even an ordinary person unacquainted with it, is as likely to ascertain the truth of the matter as those witnesses who, looking at it from a scientific point of view, are apt frequently to exaggerate small distinctions. Such witnesses are in a different position from men of skill in such matters as chemical and mechanical facts, which are not known to ordinary observers. In a question of the mere identity of handwriting I think we ourselves are quite able to judge. If I had been required to decide on a comparatio literarum I should have said that it did not appear to me that the signatures were written by the same person. As, however, I have only a comparison of handwriting to go upon I find the charge of forgery not proved.

Arnott and Others v. Burt.

There remains behind what gives this case a very great deal of importance. Supposing the question of forgery to be resolved not absolutely in favour of the position that Mr Wilson did sign the deed, but that it is not proved that he did not sign it, the question remains whether this deed can be sustained as a probative deed. It is challenged on the ground that the witnesses signed after an interval of six months, and after the death of the testator; and it is further said that under the circumstances the testator was in the belief or might reasonably have been in the belief that his deed was imperfect, and in point of fact it was incomplete during the whole of his life. Now, the question is whether that is a relevant ground for setting aside a deed having otherwise the statutory solemnities; and secondly, whether it has been proved. We are not called upon here to say whether it be a relevant ground in all cases to set aside a deed that the instrumentary witnesses did not sign at the time the subscription was appended by the testator, or that they signed after an interval, whatever the length of that interval might be, or that they did not sign till after his death. My impression is, as far as authorities were quoted to us, that it would not be easy to come to an abstract conclusion upon that matter. It seems to have been fixed that it is not necessary that the witnesses should sign in presence of the granter of the deed, and that they may sign at an interval after the deed has been signed by the granter and they themselves have witnessed the signature. That was clearly decided in the case of Frank, but there is no case that has been quoted to us where there was anything like a considerable interval between the signature of the granter and that of the instrumentary witnesses. Lord President Campbell, in the full report which we have of that case of Frank in Mr Bell's book on Testing of Deeds, which is well worthy of study on this matter, simply lays it down that if an interval is allowed to elapse, and other circumstances concur, the deed may be set aside. And so the law stands. For my own part I should not be prepared to say absolutely that the mere fact of the instrumentary witnesses signing after an interval was of itself a sufficient ground for setting aside a probative deed. My impression is the other way, but only with this proviso, that there appear in the circumstances leading to the delay reasonable cause, and an absence of elements of suspicion. If witnesses follow so loose a course as to delay their subscription for a considerable period it lies with the person who brings forward the deed to explain the circumstances in which the delay took place, and to shew that these circumstances raise no suspicion as to the good faith of the deed itself. As to the question whether witnesses can subscribe after the death of the granter I do not think it necessary to come to an absolute conclusion on that matter. On the one hand, it may be said that as the witnesses only attest the fact of subscription by their signatures, it does not matter when they do so, for the fact remains the same. Death cannot alter the fact of the subscribing. But, on the other hand, the concurring facts of the lapse of an interval and of the death of the testator are material elements.

Applying that test to the present case, how does it stand. I must own it stands in a very unsatisfactory and suspicious position. It is said on the part of the defender that the delay occurred in this way—that Catherine Burt, the defender, gave the instructions for this deed to Mr Blair, who is not the agent of Mr Wilson,—an unusual proceeding and one which I think Mr Blair ought not to have countenanced without some communication with the man whose settlement he was proposing to draft. We start with that. I do not say that Wilson did not give authority to Burt to do this. He certainly did once give her a bill as a gift. I think it is plain enough on the evidence that she had some influence over him; that he gave the bill one day and asked for it back the next; that he was infirm of purpose, as an old gentlemen of his years might be expected to be, and did not remain of the same mind. Then it is said that this deed having been extended was sent to Miss Burt, no draft having been sent to Mr Wilson; that Mr Wilson appointed to meet the Burts; did meet them; read the deed over, and then signed it in their presence, and Mr Burt and the brother afterwards declined to sign it, because they were relatives of the beneficiary. Accordingly the following arrangement was made,—that Miss Burt, the beneficiary, should take the deed unexecuted as it was, and it should remain with her till Mr Wilson could go to Aberdour to acknowledge the deed before neutral witnesses, as he did not wish his neighbours to know about the matter. Now, that is not a story in itself free of suspicion. It is not intelligible why those persons who went there should have objected to become instrumentary witnesses. It is very odd that the difficulty had not occurred to them before going. But be that as it may, the deed is taken back; it is kept for six months; there is no communication with Mr Wilson on the subject at all; there is no proposal to get other instrumentary witnesses; in short, Miss Burt, I think, plainly gave up the hope of having that deed executed; and then there is the clearest evidence that on his deathbed Mr Wilson regarded the settlement of 1865, with the codicil which he had executed in 1870, as the settlement which would operate on his death. I am therefore of opinion that taking all these circumstances together this deed is not the last will and settlement of Mr Wilson. I think that even if the whole of that account is true—and I am far from saying that it has impressed me with its truth—there was something remaining to be done and understood to remain to be done by both parties. The granter was entitled to hold that the document was incomplete, and could not be made complete without his doing that which it was understood he was to do; and I am clearly of opinion that until that was done, or until further communication with the testator, the instrumentary witnesses were not entitled to adhibit their names to that deed. On the whole matter, without saying anything on the other questions, which remain in the position I have explained, I think that second ground is quite sufficient for the ends of justice, and the application of the law to this case. It really resolves itself into this, that, even if the defenders' statement be true, this deed was never completed or intended to be completed, and the instrumentary witnesses by their signatures could not give tality to that which was not a completed deed, nor intended to be a completed ed by the granter.

Arnott and Others v. Burt.

LORD COWAN.—The first matter which your Lordship has touched upon is a ry important question of procedure and practice in the Court, and it regards e state of the record as it is now presented to us, with the addition of the nendment and plea to which your Lordship thinks that we ought to give fect. Was it competent or not for the Lord Ordinary to admit that amendent at the stage of the case at which it was proposed? I feel the force of the bservation made by Mr Crichton, in reference to the position in which the case ight have stood if it had been a verdict of a jury, under an issue which simply ised the question of forgery—yea or nay; but there was even in that case a emedy open to the party, who had another ground of reduction than that raised n the original record. Such was the precise question that came before us in he case of Gelot. There was a verdict by the jury on the matters in issue in the original record, and the case came before us on a motion for a new trial, in which there were brought forward, as a reason why the new trial should be granted, various views, particularly arising out of some letters which the party admitted, but which were not embraced in the case anterior to that stage of the procedure; and it was then proposed that we should, under the Act of 1868, sec. 29, admit the amendment on the record to the effect of bringing in those other views, upon which it was said the case truly depended. And accordingly we had no difficulty in holding that the Act of 1868 did admit of the Court giving the remedy asked, viz., to open up the record with a view to different issues being presented to the jury on a second trial. We did so under the condition that the expenses of the first trial, except so far as they might be available on the second trial, should be paid by the party. Whether we are to adhere to that rule or not may be for after consideration. But as regards the question of competency, that is a direct authority that even after the verdict of a jury the Court have power to open up the record, so as to have new issues presented to the jury raising the real question between the parties. Now, no doubt it seems to be an anomalous kind of proceeding—that a general proof is to be taken before the Lord Ordinary, simply on the original ground of reduction, and after the pursuer's case is closed that he should come forward and say—"There is another ground which I see was the more proper ground on which to attempt to reduce the deed, and I ask to be allowed to amend the record, and put in the pleas necessary for the purpose of having that other ground disposed of." But the change which has taken place in the procedure as to taking proofs does not affect the question. Trial before a judge has just been substituted for trial before a jury. That being so, the case comes back to us with the verdict, and it seems to me that, subject to such conditions as we should consider necessary with regard to expenses, we should hold that the Lord Ordinary was quite right in admitting this amendment. And having procured that amendment, the pursuers might then, if they thought fit, have asked for an additional proof in support of it. They were entitled to say, "We have some additional proof to lead as regards this new matter which we have now brought into the record." But it appears that the pursuers did not consider that that was necessary.

The next is a very important question, viz., the questionof forgery. I think the evidence upon that point is very much as your Lordship has stated. It appears to me that unless we were prepared, had we been sitting in the Court of Justiciary, to hold that the jury were right in returning a verdict of guilty on a charge of forgery, we cannot sustain the charge of forgery here made. Certainly had I been called on to address a jury or to conduct a case in a criminal Court, on a charge of forgery, I could not but have said to the jury that it would be unsafe for them to pronounce a verdict of guilty on such evidence as we have here. Such being the case, I forbear from saying that we have evidence enough to convict these parties of forgery. But I am not prepared to say there was no forgery, and probably the assoilzieing of the defender upon that ground by the Lord Ordinary was unnecessary.

With regard to the second ground of action, it is contended that after the death of the testator two witnesses who were present at the time when he [illegible] the deed, or within a short interval of time, [illegible] My impression [illegible] such as were referred [illegible] probative deed [illegible] is incompetent and [illegible] My original impression on looking [illegible] by Mr Crichton has [illegible] upon a consideration of the whole matter that a [illegible] were to arise for the [illegible] to that view; but in any case I think it [illegible] by the authorities on the subject I think it would be a very [illegible] agent to leave the [illegible] till after the death of the testator. The only question is whether the interval which here occurred was sufficient to prevent the deed from being completed. The only extent to which any deed has been completed by subscribing witnesses [illegible] is where the subscription was within the same day [illegible] I do not think there is any case going beyond that, and I appreciate very much the observations of Mr Duff (who is a most [illegible] when he says that the subscription of the witnesses and of the granter of the deed should be uno actu, and that is the case [illegible] and others. There a short interval took place, and the signature was completed in an adjoining room, that must be held as a continuation of the same transaction. But it is said that if the interval is six weeks, that the death of the testator the thing being done in good faith, it must be held that there is [illegible] to the validity of the subscription. All I can say is that I have great difficulty in entertaining that argument as sound. It seems to me that the true ground on which this case is to be determined is whether the deed was left under the conviction that he had executed a settlement or that which was in the hands of Mr Miller. I cannot come to an affirmative conclusion on that matter. The father and the [illegible] think that they did not subscribe the deed at the time, because they did not consider themselves competent witnesses. The deceased considered that they were competent witnesses, but they did not subscribe, and the meeting broke up because they would not consent to be subscribing witnesses. The testator was stated to be under the impression at the time the meeting broke up, that there was an valid deed of settlement executed by him in favour of Miss Dott. He put his name to a deed, but the witnesses refused to subscribe as witnesses; and he made an arrangement to go to Aberlour with the view of subscribing his subscription afterwards, before other witnesses, against whom no exception could be taken. But he never went to Aberlour, and therefore the inference is that in the circumstances he did not believe he had executed any other settlement than that which he had executed in 1865 and 1870. Any doubt of the propriety of that inference from the facts to which I have adverted is entirely removed by the evidence of Mr Menzies, which to my mind is conclusive upon this part of the case. He is a perfectly disinterested man. He was acquainted with Mr Wilson, and visited him on his deathbed, getting his instructions as to what was to be done after his death. He was told to send to Mr Miller; and when he was asked whether he had provided for his sister, he said "Yes, Mr Miller has taken care of that." And so he had, because in the settlement of 1865 an annuity of £40 or £50 was provided for the support of his sister. Again, on the day before Mr Wilson's death, Mr Hutton, who was married, I think, to a cousin, was very anxious to know whether he had remembered him in his settlement, and the old man said, "Yes, Mr Miller has taken care of that." And accordingly, in the codicil of October 1870, there is a provision made for the Hutton family in substitution of another family, who were benefited as regards the moveable estate by the settlement of 1865. But neither of these matters is provided for in this new deed. And how are we to regard these statements of Mr Wilson on his deathbed? They are consistent with only ne view, viz.,—that the settlement which he had executed in 1865, and affirmed in 1870, was in his view the only settlement he had made regarding his affairs, ading to the necessary implication that the writing in 1871, upon which the efender here founds, was in his estimation one that had never received his final nd completed assent. Upon that part of the case I have no difficulty in holding hat the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be affirmed.

LORD BENHOLME.—The question of forgery is one upon which, in the circumtances of this case, I do not mean to give an opinion, and that for two reasons. My first reason does not depend upon the idea that mere comparison of handwriting would be the only evidence in favour of the forgery, but I think there are many other circumstances which might be taken into view. My reason for thinking that we ought not to express any opinion on that point is that a most material part of the evidence, viz., the production of that envelope addressed by Miss Burt was not stated till the very end of the argument. Now, conceiving that that was a most important piece of evidence brought forward at a very late period, I think it would not be fair to the party against whom that evidence was adduced that I should state any view on that question; and I could not do so fairly without adverting very strongly to that part of the case which has not been answered and met by the defender. But I have another reason, viz., that I think it unnecessary. Whenever there is an objection to a deed sufficient to set it aside it is a rule of law that that should be brought forward and discussed before taking up the question of forgery; and as there is in this case to my mind a most satisfactory ground for setting aside this deed I refrain from saying one word more upon the question of forgery. It is my opinion that, taking the evidence as unexceptionable so far as it goes, Mr Wilson departed this life in the conviction and belief that he had executed no complete settlement on that occasion. The deed, supposing it was signed by himself and in presence of persons who might have been witnesses, was not subscribed by them, and he was left in the belief that until he took an ulterior step it would remain unexecuted. That step he was to take at Aberdour, by getting other witnesses to hear his subscription acknowledged; but that important step was not taken, and he died in the belief that he had executed no completed deed. He had not done that which he supposed it was necessary he should do in order to the completion of the deed. I may have my own suspicion what his reason was, but certain it is that he never did take that step, and consequently I think it is very plain that he understood that he died with the settlement executed in 1865 as his last will and testament. He said so to Mr Menzies, and I cannot doubt that that was his impression. Now, waiving the point whether it was competent for instrumentary witnesses to subscribe after the testator's death, as a question that might admit of some doubt, I look upon it that in view of the important circumstance which I have now stated, the subscribing of these witnesses after his death was neither more nor less than an attempt to make a will for him. Now, the law does not allow of any attempt to make a will for a man, whether during his life or after his death, but especially after his death. I do not know that there are any cases in which after a man's death instrumentary witnesses have been allowed to subscribe so as to validate a deed made at an interval of time. But that general question does not arise for decision, for we have here the important fact that it is clear on the statement of these members of the family that this man did not believe that he had executed a complete settlement, but on the contrary believed that he had an important step to take before doing so. Can I doubt, then, that his intention, if he ever had one, in favour of Miss Burt, had been changed? It had dropped out of his mind, and accordingly when he said to Mr Menzies that he died leaving that settlement of 1865, I have no doubt that that is quite sufficient for the decision of this case. I agree in thinking that we should adhere substantially to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, although it may be necessary to make some alteration upon it.

LORD NEAVES.—I substantially agree in all that has been said by all your Lordships. With reference to the point of form, I have no doubt it is quite competent to look at the amendment. In the course of the discussion I adverted to a peculiarity in actions of this kind, like what occurs in a suspension. The pursuer of a reduction is an inverted defender, for he is bringing an action that is to defend him against the validity of the document which he assails. The style of the summons has from time immemorial been that the action is brought and the conclusions maintained not only for the reasons set forth, but for other reasons that may be proponed in the course of the action. That is not the usual style of a petitory summons, but it is the style of suspensions and reductions. Accordingly it was always competent to add to these reasons, just as it was competent to add to defences without reference to the particular ground that might be put forward; and very often in reductions, until the deed was produced and the subject investigated, it was not easy to tell what was the true reason of reduction. A document of that kind is not in the hands of the pursuer; it is in the hands of his adversary. His first step is to call for it, and to compel its production, and if he then discovers defects in it, or if, in the course of the investigation of the document, which is not his according to his view, he find out other grounds, it has always been competent, and it was certainly competent before the Judicature Acts, to add these. After the Judicature Acts it was competent to add reasons of reduction before the record was closed, and the change made by the existing Act is that it is competent to do after closing the record what it was formerly competent to do before closing the record. The objection is that the deed is not authenticated by persons who were entitled to authenticate it, and that it is an improbative deed, all that going to defend the pursuers against the validity of the deed. I cannot doubt that it was competent and proper to allow that to be added to the record, in order that the question at issue, which I take to be the validity of the deed and the liability of the pursuers to be affected by it, and the right of the defenders to enforce it, might be disposed of as within the compass of this action. Upon the question of forgery I do not mean to give any opinion upon the merits, very much for the reasons assigned by some of your Lordships. I am very averse to enter upon that inquiry, because it is not necessary. It is a very serious charge to bring against any one; and while it is a special charge against Miss Burt as the principal party, I cannot help thinking that it is a charge of art and part in forgery both against her father and brother; for if she forges, and they come forward to attest that as the signature of one who never signed, and in that way give it currency, they seem to be art and part in aiding and abetting the putting into effect of a forged deed. That being so, I would require very strong evidence in support of such a charge, and I am by no means satisfied with the way in which that last adminicle has been brought forward. I think it should have been done at first, and in a much stronger way, and I am averse to let my judgment be influenced by that element. Further, when once you come to the charge of crime in the way that is done here, I am not at all satisfied that you must not prove that charge with as complete and convincing evidence in the civil Court as in the criminal Court. That has often been held in cases where crime has come into consideration as a defence,—for instance, in regard to policies of insurance for fire; if the defence is wilful fire-raising, I think it must be proved by as good evidence as would be required to support a criminal charge. That has been repeatedly laid down. So in regard to scuttling ships,—that must be proved in the same way as it would require to be in the criminal Court. I do not know that it is different in the case of forgery. The important question is, whether this is a probative deed, and if it is not, it does not very much signify whose signature is at it. That is wholly immaterial practically; and on that matter of its being not a probative deed I think the case is clear. I think it plain that what took place at the signing of the deed proved entirely abortive, because the witnesses refused to sign as witnesses, and an ulterior proceeding was contemplated by the testator in order to give effect to the deed. That was not even to be done on that day, but on some subsequent day, and it was something that could not be done without his personal presence on a future occasion; for it could only be accomplished by his either signing the deed of new, or by his acknowledging in the personal presence of new witnesses that he had signed that subscription on ɔrmer occasion. The parties broke up on the footing that they would not ɪ unless their scruples were removed, and he undertook to remove their ɪples by going with or without them on a future occasion, and engaging in ɪther act of execution of the deed. Then only was the deed to take effect, it could not take effect earlier. It was not in the power of these parties to ; themselves forward as witnesses behind his back when alive, still less after death to retract their refusal to sign, and to make that a will by him which ɪy had refused to authenticate by a final declaration of their purpose on the ɪasion of his calling upon them to do so. It is not as if he had left them to liberate or to make up their minds, and then to sign if they liked. There nothing of that kind here. He said he thought they were good witnesses, t they said they were not, and would not sign. The remedy which he ɒposed was a totally different one,—an ulterior thing, which, in their estiɪtion or in his estimation, and by mutual arrangement, was to become a ɪmonial necessary for the completion of the deed. Now, the animus of ɪtators in this matter is of the very greatest consequence. There is no stronger ɪtance of that than the case of Nasmyth v. Hare,[1] where a Scotchman, Mr Hare f Calderhall, had signed a Scotch deed, and put a seal to it as well as his signaɪre. The seal was wholly unnecessary, but the House of Lords found that, as ɪ seemed to consider it necessary, his taking it away was good evidence that he ɪd recalled the deed, though the deed was otherwise good by the law of Scotɪnd, because it was well tested, and executed by him in a manner which was ɪdmitted to be unexceptionable, if he had not recorded his animus that the ɪaling was a necessary part of the intended expression of opinion. In the same ɪay here, if the testator proceeded on the express footing and understanding ɪat something more was to be done before he held this his delivered and final ɪeed, and if that was not done, whether he changed his mind or only delayed to ɒ it,—if that were understood to be an ulterior intention, the deed was wholly ɪbortive, and consequently cannot receive effect. I do not think it necessary to ɔ into the more abstract points. It is better to let them stand. They will ɪake a very good field-day for some future occasion, and we shall be happy to ɪear the argument upon them; but I am sure we shall not readily hear an abler ɪgument than we had to-day from Mr Crichton. What I have said is corroɒorated in the most remarkable manner by the evidence of Mr Menzies, which ɪas been already adverted to, and which shews that whether the testator ever ɪntended to make this his will or not he considered it had gone out of the way, ɪnd that his affairs were to be regulated by the previous settlement and codicil f 1865 and 1870. On these grounds I am for sustaining the new reason of ɐduction. Whether we shall assoilzie from the conclusion of forgery I am not ɒ clear, but I think it is not necessary to go into that.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—It seems to me that it would hardly be fair to the parties not to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor as regards the question of forgery, because if the case is not made out the defender is entitled to absolɪitor, and we have not given an opinion on that matter. Therefore we shall ɪimply adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor as regards the merits.

Counsel having been heard on the question of expenses,

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and refuse the desire of the reclaiming note, except as to expenses: Find the defender entitled to the whole expenses up to the date of the minute, No. 147 of process: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses since the date of the said minute, and remit," &c.

No. 16. WILLIAM PATERSON, Petitioner and Complainer.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Scott.
GEORGE ROBSON, Respondent.—Watson.—Asher.

Nov. 16, 1872.
Paterson v. Robson.

Bankruptcy—Trustee—Petition and Complaint—Competency—Lord Advocate—Statute 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, secs. 84 and 86.—A petition and complaint presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills by a creditor on a sequestrated estate set forth that the trustee was employing the trust-funds in an improper way, and had not complied with the provisions of sec. 84 of the above Act as to the sederunt-book to be kept by the trustee. The petitioner craved to have the trustee ordained to cease from using his powers and the funds of the sequestrated estate in the way complained of. There was further a prayer for censure of the trustee.

The Lord Ordinary having dismissed the petition as incompetent, the petitioner reclaimed, and moved the Court to allow him to amend the petition by striking out the prayer for censure. Held (1) that the amendment could not be allowed; (2) that the petition was not authorised by the Bankruptcy Act; (3) that it was not competent at common law, in respect (1) the Bill-Chamber had no jurisdiction, and (2) that, being of a penal character, it had not the concurrence of the Lord-Advocate.

Bill-Chamber. 1st DIVISION. Ld. Mackenzie. M.

WILLIAM PATERSON, one of the creditors on the estate of George Lambie, presented a petition and complaint to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills against George Robson, accountant, Glasgow, the trustee on the sequestrated estate.

The petition stated,—"In or about June 1871 the said respondent professed to require, for the purposes of the sequestration, to examine certain parties in London, and, in particular, Edward Gellatly, James Park, John Morrison, Peter Hamilton junior, and David Hepburn Johnston, relative to the affairs of the bankrupt; and for this purpose he presented a petition to the Sheriff praying for a commission to the London Bankruptcy Court to examine the said parties; and on or about the 10th June 1871 the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, under said petition, ordered the examination of these gentlemen on the affairs of the bankrupt. It was not necessary, or expedient, or beneficial to examine said parties, or any of them, for any purpose of the sequestration, and the object of the respondent in desiring to examine them was not for the benefit of the sequestrated estate, or for any purpose connected therewith, but for a different purpose hereinafter mentioned, in which the said estate had no interest, or by which it will be prejudiced or subjected to loss and expenses. . . . In contravention of section 84 of the Bankruptcy Act, and in breach of his duty as trustee, the respondent has not recorded or caused to be recorded in the sederunt-book any of these examinations, and has not proved them to be signed by the judge and witness in the sederunt-book, according to the invariable usage in Scotch sequestrations. They were all taken on paper apart, and no copy of them or any of them has been made in the sederunt-book. . . . The said examinations were taken not for the benefit or for any legitimate purpose of the sequestrated estate, but for the benefit and purpose of John Smith, trading as Smith, Pender, and Co., and other parties in London, and with the object of enabling the said parties to make out claims against the said Edward Gellatly. The petitioner objects to the funds of the sequestrated estate being expended or risked for such purpose. . . . Farther, the respondent is to get commission from Smith and the other contractors on what is recovered from Gellatly, so that, individually, he has an interest in assisting them though the estate has none."

The prayer of the petition was to "appoint the respondent to appear at a specified diet within four days after service, or within such other period as your Lordship may consider reasonable, and thereafter, after hearing vith or without a record, as your Lordship shall consider best, to he respondent to insert copies of said examinations into the -book, and to make said sederunt-book, containing said copies,) the petitioner, or at least to make said examinations or copies patent to the petitioner; as also to ordain the respondent to d cease from using his powers as trustee foresaid, or employing the said sequestrated estate in assisting or furthering the claims of John Smith and the other contractors before mentioned; farther, e said respondent in the premises in such way and manner as to dship may seem meet, and to prohibit him charging the expenses resaid examinations, or any expenses connected with or arising e same, against the said sequestrated estate, and find the respond- e in expenses."

spondent, George Robson, lodged answers, in which he objected mpetency of the complaint. He also stated explanations as to the i in England, and added,—"After the said suit at Mr Smith's in- as raised Gellatly applied to the respondent for a copy of the ns emitted by him when examined as above mentioned before the Court of Bankruptcy. His object in making this application was e him when examined under Mr Smith's suit to depone to the ect as he had previously done. The respondent refused this on. Mr Gellatly thereupon applied to the petitioner, who has an for about £15 for furnishings to the 'Ferdinand de Lesseps,' to in getting a copy of his said deposition."

ord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Dismisses the peti- nds the petitioner liable to the respondent in expenses, of which n account to be given in; and remits," &c.*

TE.—The petitioner, as a creditor in the sequestration of George Lambie, s that the respondent, who is trustee in the sequestration, has improperly ie funds of the estate in examining certain persons in England; that ination was made not in the interests of the creditors, but for the pur- abling certain creditors residing in London to make out claims against Gellatly, a shipbroker in London; that the sequestrated estate has no n these claims being established, as, if Mr Gellatly were found liable, would be that he would be entitled to rank upon the estate in the for the debts of these London creditors. The petitioner further com- t the respondent has, in breach of his duty as trustee, and of the pro- the 84th section of the Bankrupt Act, failed to record in the sederunt- he sequestration the examinations in London of the foresaid persons, efused to make the same patent to him as a creditor in the sequestra- l he prays that the respondent should be ordained to insert copies of examinations in the sederunt-book, and to make the same patent to t he should be ordained to desist and cease from using his powers as r the funds of the estate, in furthering the claims of the said creditors; he should be censured, and also prohibited from charging the expenses xaminations against the sequestrated estate.

Lord Ordinary is of opinion that such an application to the Lord Ordi- he Bills is not competent under the Bankrupt Act, and that the proper rocedure is that prescribed by the 159th section of that statute. By on it is provided that the Accountant in Bankruptcy shall take cognis- e conduct of the trustee and commissioners; and 'in the event of their ully performing their duties, and duly observing all rules and regula- osed on them by statute, Act of Sederunt, or otherwise, relative to the nce of those duties, or in the event of any complaint being made to ny creditor in regard thereto, he shall inquire into the same, and, if not with the explanation given,' he shall report to the Lord Ordinary in

No. 16.

Nov. 16, 1872. Paterson v. Robson.

The petitioner reclaimed. He proposed to amend the prayer of the petition by striking out the words "to censure said respondent in the premises in such way and manner as to your Lordship may seem meet." In support of the proposed amendment it was argued, that the application had two separate purposes—(1) to enforce against the trustee a statutory duty, and to obtain for the petitioner a statutory right; and (2) for censure of the trustee. The first of these two purposes was the principal one, and quite distinct from the conclusion for censure, and it was only this latter conclusion which contained anything of a penal nature, and therefore by withdrawing it the respondent's objection would be entirely removed. The fact that the petitioner had concluded for punishment would not prevent him obtaining his civil remedy. Although the petitioner might not be entitled to succeed in his prayer for censure he was entitled to have the respondent restrained from applying the funds in an improper way.

The respondent argued;—The whole of the application was of a penal nature founded on the delinquency of the trustee, and it was not competent to change a penal complaint into a civil action by striking out the penalty.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no doubt that to strike out the prayer for censure would be to alter the whole character of the proceedings. It is impossible to read the petition without seeing that the charges against the trustee are of the most serious description. He is charged with improperly applying the funds of the sequestrated estate, not for the benefit of the estate, but for private purposes. No grosser offence could be charged against a trustee, and it is aggravated by the allegation of a bribe in the shape of a commission. If the petition had not contained a prayer for censure it would have been a singular inconsistency. The prayer for censure is of the essence of this petition, not only in form, but in substance. I am of opinion that the amendment should not be allowed.

LORD DEAS.—The ground of this complaint is the alleged misconduct of the trustee. It is said that the "examinations were taken not for the benefit or for time of vacation, or to either Division of the Court in time of session, who, after hearing 'and investigating the whole matter, shall decide, and shall have power to censure such trustees or commissioners, or remove them from their office, or otherwise to deal with them as the justice of the case may require.' It seems to the Lord Ordinary that the petitioner's complaint (which is not presented at common law with the concurrence of the Lord Advocate, but under the statute) is one of those which by the statute falls in the first instance within the cognisance of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, and that the Court in time of session, or the Lord Ordinary in time of vacation, is not entitled to decide, and cannot decide thereon, unless the Accountant shall not be satisfied with the explanations of the respondent as trustee, and shall report the matter for decision.

"The grounds of the petitioner's complaint, and the answers of the respondent thereto, are well suited for the investigation and consideration of the Accountant in Bankruptcy. These answers are that the trustee, in examining the persons in London, acted in the discharge of his duty, and for behoof of the creditors in the sequestration; that the present application is made for the purpose of Mr Gellatly, by the petitioner, who only claims as a creditor for £15; and that, in withholding the examinations in question from the petitioner, he is acting in the interest of the creditors, and by their express instructions, given at a meeting called for the purpose of taking these instructions.

"The petition is not, the Lord Ordinary thinks, warranted by the 86th section of the statute, because the respondent as trustee is not called upon to account for his 'intromissions and management,' which is all that is authorised by that section—(See Bell v. Gow, 28th November 1862, 1 Macph. 84)."

legitimate purpose of the sequestrated estate, but for the benefit and purpose ohn Smith, trading as Smith, Pender, and Company, and other parties in don, and with the object of enabling the said parties to make out claims nst the said Edward Gellatly." "The respondent was nominated and elected tee by them, and he is now lending his name, and the powers and privileges is office, to assist them in establishing their claims." The motive is thus d :—"Further, the respondent is to get commission from Smith, and the r contractors, on what is recovered from Gellatly, so that individually he an interest in assisting them though the estate has none." The prayer is ; the respondent should be ordered to appear at a specified diet; and the er further proceeds :—"As also to ordain the respondent to desist and cease using his powers as trustee foresaid, or employing the funds of the said estrated estate in assisting or furthering the claims of the said John Smith, the other contractors before mentioned." Then come the conclusions for ure which are proposed to be struck out. Now, this is a penal complaint, ch cannot be presented without the concurrence of the Lord Advocate unless e authorised by statute. It must therefore be construed with the strictness n indictment. What the petitioner now proposes to do is to stamp the trus- as a criminal, and to strike out of the complaint the conclusions for the alty of his crime. I consider that this is as incompetent as it would be to ke the words "wickedly and feloniously" out of an indictment, and to allow o proceed as a civil summons. I, therefore, am of opinion that the proposed endment should be refused.

The Court refused to allow the amendment, and counsel were then ard as to the competency of the petition.

The petitioner argued;—Sec. 86 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, provides at "the trustee shall be amenable to the Lord Ordinary and to the heriff, at the instance of any party interested, to account for intromis- ons and management, by petition served on him." The statute here rovides a remedy by petition, and it follows from that that such a peti- ion is competent. The trustee is bound to do certain things for the reditors, and the creditors have the right to compel him to do these ings. A petition is the most simple form in which this can be done, nd is the way contemplated by the statute, as is apparent from the pro- isions of sec. 86.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—It cannot be maintained that this application as a petition nd complaint is warranted by any section of the statute. It is not competent nder section 74, for, in the first place, there is not the requisite number of credi- rs, and secondly, it is not in the requisite form, the only remedy therein pro- ided being the removal of the trustee.

As a petition and complaint at common law it is plainly incompetent, first, in eing presented to a Court which has no jurisdiction, the Bill-Chamber; and econdly, inasmuch as it is presented without concurrence of the Lord Advocate.

LORD DEAS and LORD ARDMILLAN concurred.

THE COURT adhered, with additional expenses.

CATHARINE HENRIETTA ADAMINA DUNCAN MORISON AND HER CURATORS, Compearers.—M'Laren.

Church—Glebe—Glebe Lands (Scotland) Act, 1866, 29 and 30 Vict. c. 71. —In an application for authority to feu under the Glebe Lands Act, held (1) that in fixing the minimum feu-duty the building value and not the agricultural value of the land fell to be taken; and (2) that the price to be paid by a conterminous heritor for lands taken under sec. 17 was twenty-five times the amount of the minimum feu-duty.

TEIND COURT. Lord Gifford. Teind Clerk.

AN application having been made by the Rev. James Campbell, minister of the parish of Balmerino, under the Glebe Lands (Scotland) Act, 1866, for authority to feu part of the glebe of the said parish, a remit was made by the Lord Ordinary on Teinds (Gifford) to David Rhind, architect, Edinburgh, to inquire and report.

The minister stated that the glebe extended to 21·419 acres, partly arable and partly pasture, and he proposed to feu two separate portions lying detached from the manse and from the rest of the glebe, and also from one another. The first portion proposed to be feued extended to 2·194 acres, entirely pasture and incapable of cultivation, and surrounded on three sides by the lands of Stuart of Balmerino and Miss Duncan Morison of Naughton. The other portion consisted of 11·877 acres of arable land, entirely surrounded by the lands of Miss Duncan Morison of Naughton, and was traversed by the high road from Balmerino to Newport. It was added that Miss Duncan Morison would in all probability take a feu of the whole of the second portion.

Mr Rhind reported in favour of the application to feu. He farther stated that the average value of the first portion as an agricultural subject might be taken at £2, 10s. per acre, and of the second portion at £5, 5s. per acre, and that in his opinion these should be taken as the value to the present incumbent of these portions of the glebe respectively. On the basis of these present agricultural values he suggested £4 and £7, 10s. respectively as the minimum feu-duties which should be allowed to be taken. At the same time he expressed his opinion that as a building subject the actual feuing value, or the expected rate of feu-duty at the present time, might be taken at £6, 6s. for the first part, and £10, 10s. to £12, 12s., according to the site, for the second.

The Lord Ordinary reported the case, adding a note in which he approved of granting the application to feu, but disapproved of Mr Rhind's report in so far as it took the agricultural value and not the building value as the datum or means of fixing the minimum feuing value. He intimated his opinion that the minimum value to be fixed should be £5, 5s. for the first portion and £9, 9s. and £11, 11s. according to site, for the second, these rates being somewhat under the building value suggested by Mr Rhind.

When the case came before the Court the minister, in respect of the right of pre-emption in favour of conterminous heritors contained in section 17 of the Act, moved the Court to fix the minimum feu-duty at the building value approved by the Lord Ordinary. He contended that though in the Blair-Athole case[1] the agricultural value had been taken as the datum for fixing the minimum feu-duty, this had been distinctly on the ground that there were specialties in the case. Here there were none, and therefore the Lord Ordinary was right in taking the building value as the datum for ascertaining the minimum feu-duty.

The Court held that the building value should be taken as the basis for fixing the minimum feu-duties, and fixed them respectively at the rates proposed by the Lord Ordinary.

Thereafter one of the conterminous proprietors, Miss Duncan Morison of Naughton and her curators, in terms of section 17 of the Glebe Lands (Scotland) Act, 1866, intimated her desire to purchase the portions of the glebe proposed to be feued, and offered twenty-two years' purchase of the minimum feu-duties fixed by the Court.

At advising—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court are of opinion that the price should be twenty-five years' purchase of the feu-duties, at the minimum rate already fixed by the Court, on the ground that this price invested at 4 per cent will give the minister the same return as he would have obtained from the feu-duties. It will also enable him, if he likes, to have the same security, for the price is sufficient to enable him to buy feu-duties of the best sort, giving him as good a return as the feu-duties which he would otherwise have received from the lands.

The other Judges concurred.

THE COURT accordingly fixed the price at twenty-five years' purchase.

Bankrupt—Preference—Illegal Agreement for the purpose of obtaining the Bankrupt's Discharge—Statutory Penalty—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 150.—A, one of the creditors on a sequestrated estate, who claimed to have a security for his debt over certain machinery, entered into an arrangement with B, a friend of the bankrupt, without the knowledge of the trustee or of the other creditors, by which he was to receive £500 from B, and to rank on the sequestrated estate for the full amount of his claim, as a condition of his agreeing to a proposed composition-contract. Held that the penalty under the above section had been incurred by A, although he had believed that B was acting for the trustee and creditors, and although B had successfully resisted A's claim for payment of the £500.

M.

In 1867 the estates of R. S. Smith, manufacturer, Walkerton Mills, Fifeshire, were sequestrated, and Mr Findlater was appointed trustee. James Thomas of Transay was ranked as a creditor for £2797, 17s. 6d. and Sandeman and Company for £712, 6s. 2d.

Sandeman and Company raised an action of multiplepoinding in name of Mr Thomas as pursuer, concluding for declarator that Mr Thomas was liable in only once and single payment of £2797, 17s. 6d., being the amount of the debt due by the bankrupt to Mr Thomas, and also of £1000, or such other sum as might be ascertained to be double the value of the preference, gratuity, payment, or other consideration, given, made, or promised to Mr Thomas for concurring in or facilitating the discharge of the bankrupt under 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, section 150, which enacts that "All preferences, gratuities, securities, payments, or other considerations not sanctioned by this Act, granted, made, or promised, and all secret or collusive agreements and transactions for concurring in, facilitating, or obtaining the bankrupt's discharge, either on or without an offer of composition, and whether the offer be accepted or not, or the discharge granted or not, shall be null and void; and if during the sequestration any creditor shall have obtained any such preference, gratuity, security, payment, or other consideration or promise thereof, or entered into such secret or collusive consideration, or agreement, or transaction, the trustee shall be entitled to retain his dividend, and he, or any creditor ranked on the estate, may present a petition to the Lord Ordinary or to the Sheriff praying that such creditor shall be found to have forfeited his debt, and be ordained to pay to the trustee double the amount of the preference, gratuity, security, payment, or other consideration given, made, or promised, and if no cause be shewn to the contrary decree shall be pronounced accordingly, and the sums which in such cases may be recovered shall, under deduction of the expense of recovering the same, be distributed by the trustee among the other creditors under the sequestration; and if the sequestration shall have been closed, it shall be competent to any creditor who shall not have received full payment of his debt to raise a multiplepoinding in name of the person who has obtained such preference, gratuity, security, payment, or other consideration or promise as aforesaid, and on the value of the preference, gratuity, or security, or amount of the sum paid, or consideration obtained, being ascertained, double such value or amount, together with the amount of the debt of the colluding creditor, shall be ordered to be consigned by him, and shall be divided among the creditors who were ranked or were entitled to be ranked in the sequestration, and have not received full payment of their debts, and who shall lodge claims in such multiplepoinding according to their respective rights and interests, and such multiplepoinding shall be executed in terms of law against the colluding creditor, and notice thereof at the same time be inserted in the Gazette; and in the event of there being any surplus after paying the full debts of the creditors, and defraying the expenses of the sequestration or other proceeding, the same shall be paid into the account of unclaimed dividends, as hereinafter provided."

The real raisers averred;—

(Cond. 4.) "In June 1867 the bankrupt made overtures to his creditors with the view of obtaining his discharge under his sequestration on payment of a composition; and as the nominal pursuer's claim was a large one, and his consent was necessary, James Waddell, on behalf of the bankrupt, had meetings and entered into a correspondence with the nominal pursuer for the purpose of obtaining his consent and concurrence thereto. A secret and collusive arrangement was at length concluded between the said James Waddell on behalf of the bankrupt, which was embodied in a letter or obligation granted to the nominal pursuer by the said James Waddell, of the date and in the terms following:—'175 Buchanan Street, Glasgow, 9th September 1867.—James Thomas, Esq., Forthar. Sir,—In consideration of your taking the same dividend as the rest of the creditors will be offered and paid by the bankrupt, on the sequestrated estate of Mr Robert S. Smith, spinner and manufacturer, Walkerton Mills, Leslie, Fifeshire, and giving me your mandate to act on your entire claim of £2797 or thereby at all meetings in connection with offer and acceptance of offer on said bankrupt estate, I agree to see you paid or to pay you the sum of £500 sterling, payable as follows, namely, —£300 within two months of the date of Mr Rob. S. Smith's discharge, £100 in eight months from date of R. S. Smith's discharge, and £100 in twelve months from the date of R. S. Smith's discharge, which £500 is over and above the composition upon your entire claim of £2797 or thereby, and all without prejudice or recourse.—I am, &c., JAMES WADDELL.'"

(Cond. 5.) "The nominal pursuer accepted of this offer, and acted upon it. In implement of his part of said arrangement, and in pursuance thereof, he granted a mandate to James Waddell to act and vote for him at all meetings of the creditors connected with the offer and acceptance of the offer of said composition, and to agree thereto for him as a creditor of the bankrupt." The answer to this article was—"Admitted that the objector accepted the said letter, and granted in favour of Mr Waddell a mandate, which is referred to."

The following facts were stated and not disputed:—

A general meeting of the creditors of Mr Smith was called, and was held on the 23d day of September 1867. At that meeting the bankrupt made offer of a composition of 6s. 6d. per pound to his creditors on all debts due by him at the date of his sequestration, and agreed to take the entire responsibility of the claims made by the pursuer against the estate. The meeting unanimously resolved that this offer of composition should be entertained for consideration. In terms of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, this resolution was advertised in the Edinburgh Gazette, and intimated by circular to the creditors, and another meeting of the creditors was held on 18th October 1867, for the purpose of deciding on the offer of composition. At this meeting it was unanimously resolved to accept of the offer of composition and of the cautioners proposed. The pursuer was represented at both of these meetings by James Waddell, who voted in favour of the acceptance of the offer of composition on the pursuer's entire claims in the sequestration. Messrs Sandeman, who were creditors of the bankrupt, accepted of the bankrupt's composition without being acquainted with the preference and security or obligation which the nominal pursuer had obtained as a consideration for his concurring in and facilitating the said bankrupt's discharge, or with the agreement and transaction entered into by him with the said James Waddell on behalf of the bankrupt for that purpose. The proceedings having been reported to the Sheriff, and a bond of caution for the composition granted by the bankrupt and his cautioners, the bankrupt obtained his discharge under his sequestration, by deliverance of the Sheriff of Fife, dated on or about the 21st day of November 1867, which deliverance also declared the sequestration at an end. The first instalment of the composition due under the said composition-contract and bond was paid to and received by Mr Thomas. The sum of £300 under the composition-contract became payable to Mr Thomas under the said agreement and obligation of 9th September 1867 on the 21st day of January 1868, and the further sum of £100 became payable on 21st July 1868, and the last instalment of £100 on 21st November 1868. Mr Thomas, on the first and second of these instalments becoming payable, raised an action against James Waddell, founding on his obligation, and concluded for payment of £300 and £100. This action was defended by James Waddell, on the ground that the obligation was null and void under and by virtue of the provision in the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, section 150. The Court gave effect to this defence, and found that the obligation was null and void under the statute, and assoilzied James Waddell. (Ante, vol. vii. p. 558, 23d February 1869).

Mr Thomas lodged objections to the present action thus brought in his name, in which he stated that £1795, 1s. 4d., part of his debt, was contained in a promissory-note by the bankrupt. (Stat. 2.) "The objector duly lodged with the trustee in the said sequestration claims for the sums due to him. In particular, he lodged a claim for the sum of £1795, 1s. 4d., and in the said claim he stated that he held no security for the said debt, except a policy of assurance effected on the life of the said R. S. Smith, in name of the objector, with the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company, for £1000, and dated 9th September 1859, and also except 'certain machinery and effects situated in and at the said Walkerton Mills, belonging to the deponent, and specified in an inventory thereof appended to a disposition by the said Robert Suttie Smith in the deponent's favour, dated 22d March 1864, and tack thereof between the deponent and the said R. S. Smith, dated 28th March and 3d April 1865, which machinery and others the said R. S. Smith had a right to purchase from the said deponent on certain conditions, specified in a letter by the deponent to him, dated 22d March 1864,' and the objector declared and protested that, in respect certain questions had arisen or were likely to arise regarding the rights of parties with respect to the said machinery, his rights and interests should not be prejudiced by anything stated in relation thereto in the said oath and claim." (Stat. 3.) "The said machinery and others held by the objector in security as aforesaid were of very considerably greater value than the amount of the said promissory-note, and the security held by the objector was more than sufficient to afford him full payment of his debt." (Stat. 4.) "In the summer of 1867, James Waddell, accountant in Glasgow, acting on behalf of the creditors of the said Robert Suttie Smith other than the objector, and with the full knowledge and sanction of them, and of the trustee and commissioners on the sequestrated estate, had meetings, and entered into a correspondence with the objector, with a view to a compromise or adjustment of his rights to the said machinery and others, and his preferable claims in respect thereof." Mr Thomas further stated that Mr Waddell was acting on behalf of the creditors and the trustee in the sequestration as well as the bankrupt when they entered into the arrangement. (Stat. 5.) "Immediately upon receipt of the said letter the objector addressed to the trustee on the said sequestrated estates a letter in the following terms:—'At Lady Bank Station, September 9, 1867. Dear Sir,—In reply to my telegram, I am now in receipt of a letter of agreement from Mr James Waddell, 175 Buchanan Street, Glasgow, wherein I have agreed to renounce my claim (preferable) on the machinery at Walkerton, possessed by R. S. Smith, and now only rank on the full amount of my three bills and interest thereon, and accept of the composition on said bills same as the other creditors. Therefore trust the commissioners will withdraw the sale of the property.—I am, &c. (Signed) JAMES THOMAS.' The conclusion of the arrangement relative to the said machinery was also made known to and approved of by the commissioners and creditors." (Stat. 6.) "The objector has not received or obtained any money or other consideration under or in respect of the letter of 9th September 1867.

Messrs Sandeman pleaded;—(1) The arrangement made by and with the nominal pursuer, in reference to Robert Suttie Smith's offer of composition and discharge, as above set forth, was a secret and collusive arrangement, and the letter of obligation by James Waddell, of date 9th September 1867, and the sum of £500 thereby stipulated and agreed to be paid to him, constituted a preference, gratuity, security, or other consideration for concurring in, facilitating, or obtaining the said bankrupt's discharge, struck at by the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, and the pursuer is liable in the penalties provided by the said statute, and by section 150 thereof.

Mr Thomas pleaded;—(1) The real raiser's statements are not relevant and sufficient to sustain the conclusions of the summons. (2) The action is incompetent, and ought to be dismissed, in respect that the objector has not been guilty of any contravention of the Bankrupt Statute, and that he has not incurred liability for any of the penalties thereby made exigible.

(3) Assuming the acceptance of the letter of 9th September 1867, condescended on, to have inferred a contravention of the said statute, the action cannot be maintained, in respect that the said letter never was, and is not now, of any value.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first plea in law stated for the nominal pursuer and objector, Mr James Thomas, and, before farther answer, allows to both parties a proof of their respective averments, the real raiser to lead in the proof." *

A proof was taken before the Lord Ordinary.

Mr Thomas deponed,—"I remember Mr Waddell waiting on me about June 1867, with the intention of purchasing my legal claim to that machinery. It was expressed on every occasion that I met him. There was no other object expressed; at first I refused to entertain any proposition, but the last time he came he said the trustee, commissioners, and every creditor was anxious that I should sell my right in order to allow a settlement by composition. I said it would not be for my interest to do so, as the sum he offered was not at all adequate to retaining my

* "NOTE.—The counsel for the nominal raiser supported his first plea in law by a very ingenious argument, founded on a critical construction of the 150th section of the Bankrupt Statute. He contended that, where the sequestration has been wound up, as in the present case, no penalty can be made good even where an illegal preference has been stipulated for or promised—where, in point of fact, nothing has been recovered or realised under the stipulation or promise. He urged that what was to be ascertained was only the value illegally obtained, that is, realised, not merely promised, the word promise being carefully omitted in the ascertainment clause, that is, the clause under which the fund in medio in an action like the present is fixed.

"The Lord Ordinary, admitting the ingenuity of the argument, cannot give effect to it. He thinks that the clause must receive a fair and equitable, and not a judaical or malignant interpretation. Although of a penal nature, it is intended to repress mischievous, if not fraudulent practices, and its true meaning must be sought from the words used. See the opinions of the Judges, particularly in the House of Lords, in Carter v. M'Laren, 26th October 1869, 8 Macph. 64; H. of L., 9th May 1871, 9 Macph. 49. See also Murdoch v. Clydesdale Bank, 29th January 1864, 2 Macph. 515.

"As this was the only objection on relevancy, the Lord Ordinary repels the first plea.

"But the objector pleads that, in point of fact, there was no contravention of the Bankrupt Statute; that no preference was given, stipulated, or promised; but that the real transaction was a compromise between the objector, on the one hand, and the whole body of creditors, on the other, by which, for the sum stipulated, the objector gave up a security which he claimed over part of the bankrupt estate.

"This was not pleaded in the direct action at the objector's instance to make good the alleged illegal preference—see Thomas v. Waddell, 23d February 1869, 7 Macph. 558. Probably in that action it was competent and omitted, and such plea is now excluded in any question as to making good the obligation against Waddell. But Thomas v. Waddell does not constitute res judicata in the present action, and Mr Thomas's counsel explained that additional inquiry and information has shewn that the transaction was not of the nature at first supposed. The Lord Ordinary thinks it is not too late for the defender and objector to shew, if he can, in the present process, that the transaction was not a contravention of the statute. He has therefore allowed a proof before answer. It seems expedient to get in the correspondence and documents, which, though used in Thomas v. Waddell, were not formally proved in that process. All ulterior questions as to the amount of the penalty or debt forfeited, or the value of the security, will also arise better upon a completed proof."

No. 18. Nov. 22, 1872. Thomas v. Sandeman.

right to the machinery. I told him that £500 was not adequate to retaining my right. Ultimately I did agree, but I told him it was solely on account of all parties being anxious that I should sell my claim, and allow a settlement by composition. I got from him the letter of 9th September 1867—(quoted supra). (Q.) Had you done anything else except settle your preferable claim? (A.) Nothing whatever—it was an open and honest transaction on my part; and I had no object to serve, for I considered I was renouncing my worldly interest in accepting that compromise. (Q.) Did you think you were accepting a bonus by consenting to the composition? (A.) No. I was losing by it. When I entered into the arrangement with Mr Waddell I understood he was making it on behalf of the trustee and all the creditors."

This interlocutor was then pronounced:—"Finds that the action has been competently and properly brought: Finds the nominal raiser liable in only once and single payment of the fund in medio, and, with a view to the ascertainment of the amount of the fund in medio, appoints the nominal raiser to lodge a condescendence of the fund in medio by the second box-day in the present vacation, and appoints all concerned to lodge claims by the first sederunt day in May next: Finds the nominal raiser liable in expenses to the real raisers from the date of lodging defences or objections down to this date, and remits," &c. *

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is well assured that when the nominal raiser, Mr Thomas, in September 1867, made the arrangement which he did with Mr Waddell on behalf of the bankrupt, he was not aware that he was doing anything wrong, or that he was committing a violation of the Bankrupt Act. The Lord Ordinary thinks it certain that at that date the nominal raiser, Mr Thomas, had never read, and probably had never heard, of the 150th section of the Bankrupt Statute; and even Mr Waddell, who is an accountant in Glasgow, seems to have been quite unaware of the effect and scope of that section.

"But the ignorance or the bona fides of the nominal raiser will not save him from the statutory consequences if he has really contravened the statute. In the recent case of Carter v. M'Laren and Company it was ultimately held by the House of Lords, 9th May 1871 (9 Macph. 49), that the entire bona fides of Messrs M'Laren, even when coupled with the instant repayment of the illegal preference, did not save them from the statutory penalty, and that the Court had no discretion in the matter, but were bound to decern for the full amount thereof.

"The only question in the present case, therefore, is, was there or was there not on the part of Mr Thomas a violation of the 150th section of the Bankrupt Statute. If there was, then the present action of multiplepoinding has been well brought, in virtue of the express provision of the enactment in question. What the amount of the penalty or forfeiture—that is, of the fund in medio—may be, is another question which has not been yet discussed. In particular, there is a very important question, whether the 'amount of the debt' means the gross sum ranked for, or only the dividend thereon; but this question only arises after the action is found competent.

"In the previous action at Mr Thomas's instance against Mr Waddell, in which Mr Thomas sued Mr Waddell for the £500 stipulated in the letter of 9th September 1867, the illegality of the transaction seems to have been held by the Court (see Thomas v. Waddell, 23d February 1869, 7 Macph. 558); but as it appeared that in that case Mr Thomas's pleas were of a limited nature, and as the judgment was not res judicata in the present action, the Lord Ordinary thought it right to allow the nominal raiser to shew, if he could, that the transaction was not a preference or an illegal agreement in the sense of the 150th section, but a proper compromise between Mr Thomas on the one hand, and the creditors on the other, whereby Mr Thomas, in consideration of the £500, renounced a security which he claimed over the estate of the bankrupt. It is certainly a little awkward for Mr Thomas that the judgment in Thomas v. Waddell stands, for the result would be, if he succeeded now, that the same agreement which in 1869 was held null and illegal under the 150th section, and enforcement of which was refused, should now, in 1872, be held legal, and not inferring statutory penalties.

"On considering the proof and correspondence the Lord Ordinary has come to be of opinion that the transaction in question, of September 1867, constituted in the sense of the statute a 'preference, gratuity, security, payment, or other consideration granted, made, or promised for concurring in, facilitating, or obtaining the bankrupt's discharge.' He thinks the transaction was struck at by the statute. It is not necessary to determine whether the transaction was secret or collusive or not, although, after the observations made in the House of Lords in Carter v. M'Laren, it would probably be held to be secret and collusive in the sense of the statute. It is enough for the purposes of the present action if there was a gratuity, payment, or consideration made or promised for concurring in, facilitating, or obtaining the bankrupt's discharge.

"The Lord Ordinary feels obliged to hold that there was this in the present case.

"(1) The transaction is really embodied in Mr Waddell's letter to Mr Thomas of 9th September 1867, for although there is no written acceptance of this letter addressed to Mr Waddell, it is proved—indeed, it is expressly admitted—that the letter was accepted by Mr Thomas, and that its conditions were implemented by him by taking the composition the same as the other creditors, and by granting the mandate to act and vote on his entire claim. Now, it is impossible to read the letter without seeing that it is an agreement for facilitating or concurring in the bankrupt's discharge on composition. This is the only consideration expressed in respect of which the £500 is promised. Without Mr Thomas's concurrence the composition-contract could not be carried through, and, so far as the letter of 9th September 1867 goes, it is simply a purchase of that concurrence for £500. As such, the transaction is obviously illegal.

"(2) But Mr Thomas contended that the letter of 9th September 1867 does not disclose the real transaction, which was a compromise of a security which he claimed over a part of the bankrupt's machinery; and he referred to his letter to the trustee of the same date, 9th September 1867, whereby he renounced his preferable claim. Now, it is quite true that Mr Thomas had stated a preferable claim or security over part of the bankrupt's machinery. His claim was reserved in the affidavit lodged by him in the sequestration, and it is proved by the correspondence that the preferential claim was stoutly insisted in in the sequestration. But neither the nominal raiser's letter of 9th September 1867, nor any of the other letters, prove that this preferable claim or security was the only consideration for the £500 for which the nominal raiser stipulated. The renunciation of the security was rather a consequence of the bargain by which Mr Thomas consented to the composition contract than the bargain itself.

"(3) Even if the security over the machinery entered to some extent into the bargain, this would not make the bargain legal, for it is beyond all doubt that at least part of the bargain was that Thomas should concur in the bankrupt's composition. If he had not agreed to do this, it is as clear as day that the £500 would never have been either promised or paid. In the most favourable view, therefore, the £500 was promised partly for a legal and partly for an illegal consideration, and this would be enough to infer contravention of the statute.

"(4) The evidence of Mr Waddell and that of Mr Thomas is in direct conflict, and the Lord Ordinary therefore is disposed to lay both out of view, and to proceed upon the evidence of the correspondence and writings passing at the time, and which seem to him to leave no doubt as to what was truly wanted by Mr Waddell and the bankrupt. The oral evidence of Mr Waddell is not very satisfactory, but he could scarcely be mistaken in supposing that he was stipu-and creditors were aware that Waddell was negotiating with Mr Thom The trustee was entitled to deal with the bankrupt estate as his ov and to compromise claims. He was entitled to make a bargain with creditor to induce him to concur in a composition contract. If this w done behind the backs of the creditors it might be against the 15(section, but it was done in this case with their concurrence. Mr Thon only intended to sell the preferential security, and did not think of s ing his concurrence in the composition. The 150th section of the stat is intended to provide against a creditor who is in the same position the other creditors receiving a bribe, not the case of a creditor who ho a security for his debt. If the creditor transacts with a person who believes acts for all the creditors he does not commit the offence. Wh ever the creditors consent there is no offence. They were aware of t arrangement between Mr Waddell and Mr Thomas. Mr Thomas nev received anything from Mr Waddell, and therefore, as no preference h actually been got, the statutory penalty had not been incurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a multiplepoinding brought by one of the credit in a sequestration which has been brought to a close. He has not received f payment of his debt, and the effect of the multiplepoinding, if sustained, and consignation be ordered to be made in terms of the statute, is certainly to infl a very heavy and severe penalty upon the party against whom it is directed nominal raiser. It appears to me that it is indispensable, in the first place, make quite sure of what it is that is advanced here as the statutory charge; I speak of the charge against Mr Thomas very much as if we were consider an indictment against him, the consequence of the charge being sustained relevant, and held to be proved, being so clearly penal.

The 150th section in its outset provides that "all preferences, gratuit securities, payments, or other considerations not sanctioned by this Act, grant made, or promised, and all secret or collusive agreements and transactions concurring in, facilitating, or obtaining the bankrupt's discharge, either on lating for a concurrence in the discharge, and was not merely buying a secur It seems plain enough that, whatever Mr Thomas thought, Mr Waddell ca simply and solely to purchase Mr Thomas's concurrence to the discharge.

"(5) If Mr Thomas's view was correct, that he was to get the £500 as price of the security, and nothing else, then this sum should have been deduc from his claim. He was not entitled to rank and vote on his full claim, realise the security besides. But it was expressly stipulated that the rank should be for the full claim, and this itself constitutes an illegality. In man contested vote a majority might be carried by means of the full claim, whe deduction of securities would throw the party into a minority.

"(6) It is clear, contrary to the averment on record, that the trustee general creditors were no parties whatever to the agreement with Mr Thor In this sense the agreement was collusive. Mr Thomas spoke of assigning security to Mr Waddell, but if he was to rank for his full claim this was im sible, for ranking is equivalent to payment, and the security cannot be separ from the debt.

"(7) It is scarcely an element in the present case, but, so far as the I Ordinary can judge, the security claimed by Mr Thomas was bad in law, an is hardly conceivable that the creditors, and much less Mr Waddell, viewe an independent third party, should give £500, or anything approaching sum, for an assignation or renunciation of the security. In the Lord Ordina view, however, this was not at all the nature of the transaction.

"It follows that the multiplepoinding has been completely brought under statute, and the Lord Ordinary has pronounced the usual order of once single payment, and ordered claims."

without an offer of composition, and whether the offer be accepted or not, or he discharge granted or not, shall be null and void." That is the leading provision, and it is very important to ascertain precisely what its meaning is. It may be a question whether preferences, gratuities, securities, payments, and other considerations are not intended to be something distinct from secret or collusive agreements and transactions for concurring in, facilitating, or obtaining the bankrupt's discharge; and in order to elucidate the meaning of the statute in this respect it is necessary to revert to two previous sections which deal with the same matter in another aspect. In the 140th section, which is one of a series of sections relating to discharge upon composition, it is provided that when a deliverance has been pronounced approving of the composition the bankrupt, or his successor, or other party offering the composition, shall make a declaration, or, if required by the trustee or any creditor, an oath before the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, that he has made a full and fair surrender of his estate, and has not granted or promised any preference or security, or made or promised any payment, or entered into any secret or collusive agreement or transaction to obtain the concurrence of any creditor to such offer and security. In like manner, in the 147th section, which applies to discharge without composition, the bankrupt is directed to make a declaration, or if required an oath, that he has made a full and fair surrender of his estate, and has not made or promised any preference or security, nor made or promised any payment, nor entered into any secret or collusive agreement or transaction to obtain the concurrence of any creditor to his discharge.

Now, reading the 150th section in the light of these previous sections, it seems to me that if there be any preference, gratuity, security, payment, or other consideration, made or promised for facilitating or obtaining the bankrupt's discharge, or, as a distinct thing, any secret or collusive agreement or transaction for that purpose, then the consequences of the statute are to follow. It is needless to pause upon the portion of the section which next follows, and which applies only to the case where the sequestration is in dependence. But I pass on to the second part of the section, which provides that "if the sequestration shall have been closed it shall be competent to any creditor who shall not have received full payment of his debt to raise a multiplepoinding in name of the person who has obtained such preference, gratuity, security, payment, or other consideration or promise as aforesaid, and on the value of the preference, gratuity or security, or amount of the sum paid, or consideration obtained being ascertained, double such value or amount, together with the amount of the debt of the colluding creditor, shall be ordered to be consigned by him," and so on. Now, an attempt was made to construe this portion of the statute as if it did not apply to a promise of a payment for the purpose of obtaining or facilitating the obtaining of a discharge of the bankrupt. But really it is needless to dwell upon that, because nothing but the most judaical and malignant interpretation could possibly reach that construction. It is quite plain that every illegal preference or payment, it does not matter of what kind, whether actually made and obtained, or promised, is to be followed by the penal consequences of this section. Now, having this construction of the statute in view, we must consider what is the nature of the charge actually made on this record against the nominal raiser, Mr Thomas. In the fourth article of the condescendence it is stated that in the month of June 1867 the bankrupt made overtures to his creditors with the view of obtaining his discharge under said sequestration on payment of a composition; and as the nominal pursuer's claim was a large one, and his consent was necessary, James Waddell, accountant, Glasgow, on behalf of the bankrupt, had meetings, and entered into a correspondence with the nominal pursuer, for the purpose of obtaining his consent and concurrence thereto. A secret and collusive arrangement was at length concluded between the said James Waddell, on behalf of the bankrupt, and the nominal pursuer, which was embodied in a letter or obligation granted to the nominal pursuer by the said James Waddell, and in the terms following, viz.:—"175 Buchanan Street, Glasgow, 9th Sept. 1867.—James Thomas, Esq., Forthar. Sir,—In consideration of your taking the same dividend as the rest of the creditors will be offered and paid by the bankrupt, on the sequestrated estate of Mr Robert S. Smith, spinner and manufacturer, Walkerton Mills, Leslie, Fifeshire, and giving me your mandate to act on your entire claim of £2797 or thereby at all meetings in connection with offer and acceptance of offer on said bankrupt estate, I agree to see you paid or to pay you the sum of £500 sterling, payable as follows, namely:—£300 within two months of the date of Mr Rob. S. Smith's discharge, £100 in eight months from date of R. S. Smith's discharge, and £100 in twelve months from the date of R. S. Smith's discharge, which £500 is over and above the composition upon your entire claim of £2797 or thereby, and all without prejudice or recourse.—I am yours respectfully, JAMES WADDELL." Now, the letter is not disputed to have passed, and, therefore, the first thing is to ascertain what is the meaning of it with reference to the 150th section of the statute. It was necessary,—that is so far admitted,—to carry through the composition arrangement that Mr Thomas should assent to it. The discharge of the bankrupt upon a composition could not be obtained without Mr Thomas's consent; and he is by this arrangement to obtain a composition at the same rate as the other creditors upon the entire amount of his debt, and he is to obtain over and above that a sum of £500 in consideration of his giving Mr Waddell, the writer of the letter, a mandate to enable him to vote for the composition-arrangement upon the entire amount of Mr Thomas's debt. The £500 is not to be immediately paid down. Not one shilling of it is to be paid if the bankrupt is not discharged, shewing plainly what the object of the arrangement was; for the instalments by which it is to be paid all bear reference in point of date to the date of the bankrupt's discharge. It is therefore, I apprehend, quite impossible to dispute that upon the face of it this is an arrangement between Mr Waddell on behalf of the bankrupt, if it be proved that he was dealing with Mr Thomas on behalf of the bankrupt, and Mr Thomas, to facilitate the carrying through of the composition arrangement, and the obtaining of the bankrupt's discharge, £500 being paid as a gratuity to Mr Thomas for giving his consent to that arrangement. The 5th article of the condescendence states that "the nominal pursuer accepted of this offer, and acted upon it. In implement of his part of said arrangement, and in pursuance thereof, he granted a mandate to the said James Waddell to act and vote for him at all meetings of the said Robert Suttie Smith's creditors, connected with the offer and acceptance of the offer of said composition, and to agree thereto for him as a creditor of the said bankrupt in said sum of £2797, 17s. 6d., and fulfilled the other conditions incumbent on him by said arrangement." The answer to that article is, "Admitted that the objector accepted the said letter, and granted in favour of Mr Waddell a mandate, which is referred to."

Now, so far the main facts of the case are pretty well ascertained by admission. I think it is also proved very distinctly that Mr Waddell, who wrote this letter, was, in doing so, acting on behalf of the bankrupt. Mr Thomas says that he was not aware that he was acting on behalf of the bankrupt—that his impression was that he was acting on behalf of the trustee and creditors; and he says in statement 4, "In the summer of 1867, James Waddell, accountant in Glasgow, acting on behalf of the creditors of the said Robert Suttie Smith other than the objector, and with the full knowledge and sanction of them, and of the trustee and commissioners on the sequestrated estate, had meetings, and entered into a correspondence with the objector, with a view to a compromise or adjustment of his rights to the said machinery and others, and his preferable claims in respect thereof," and he represents that throughout Mr Waddell was in fact acting on behalf of the creditors, and of the entire creditors, in making this arrangement. That is certainly not proved. On the contrary, it seems to me to be proved by the evidence not of Waddell only, but of the trustee also, and the written evidence in process, that Mr Waddell had no authority of any kind to represent or act for either the trustee or the creditors, or any of them. But Mr Thomas says notwithstanding that he believed that he was acting on behalf of the creditors. Now, this appears to me not to found a relevant defence against this action, and not to be a good objection to the multiplepoinding, because if Mr Waddell was not in fact representing and acting for the creditors, the creditors cannot be barred of their remedy under the 150th section of the statute,

, it be made out in point of fact that a preference or payment of the ntemplated by the 150th section has been in fact created or made in f Mr Thomas. Mr Thomas may be perfectly innocent of all improper nd there are many circumstances that indicate that he was so; but if red that he was transacting with a party representing the creditors one lament that he took that for granted instead of making sure that it was took it for granted upon the statement of this Mr Waddell, who, accord-Ir Thomas's own admission, was up to that time a perfect stranger to think there were three grounds chiefly insisted in on behalf of Mr as an answer to this action of multiplepoinding. The first was that the ion carried through between him and Mr Waddell was not in its nature ce against the 150th section of the statute. I have already indicated ion upon that subject, and I do not think it necessary to add more. It to me that the arrangement which was made comes precisely within the ion in the statute. No doubt it is maintained, with reference to this
, that the £500 which was promised to Mr Thomas was not a simple
, but that it was something given as in exchange for a security which mas said he had over a portion of the bankrupt estate. He maintained had a good security over the moveables in the bankrupt's mill; and h the trustees had obtained an opinion of counsel very clearly adverse to aim, still Mr Thomas had by no means abandoned his claim to that , but on the contrary was insisting that his claim was good in point of d alleged that he had been advised that it was so. Now, there could en nothing at all illegal in Mr Thomas's compromising his claim to this
. That would have been perfectly lawful. But so long as the sequestrabsisted, the only party with whom he could competently deal with refer-such a compromise was the trustee. The trustee, under the statute, has o compromise and settle claims against the estate, and claims by the estate other parties, and had he arranged with Mr Thomas, representing the s, and taking their special instructions upon the subject, it would have uite lawful for the trustee to pay a sum of £500 to buy off this claim of nce over the moveables in the mill. But the bankrupt, until he was dis-l, had nothing to do with that, and nobody was entitled to deal with him hat subject, for the estate was not his. He had no right to the estate, uld have none until he was retrocessed under the composition-contract.
herefore, to deal with anybody but the trustee was plainly to incur a very isk at least, if not to commit a direct illegality.

another defence has been urged, to the effect that Mr Thomas, in point , got nothing under the agreement. The obligation of Mr Waddell has out to be of no value; for when Mr Thomas raised an action against Mr ll for recovery of this £500, Mr Waddell, who seems to be a person of peculiar views of morality, defended himself upon the ground of the nul-such transactions under the 150th section, and that defence was sustained, could not be otherwise. And accordingly Mr Thomas found himself in ition of being none the better of the illegal transaction into which he had ingly entered, getting nothing for his illegal preference, and yet he is sub-to all the penal consequences of this section of the statute. That is very but I am afraid it is no answer to the demand of an unpaid creditor that l have the remedy prescribed by the section.

lastly, the defence most seriously and urgently maintained by Mr Thomas this charge is that in point of fact this arrangement, or an arrangement nature, was assented to by the trustee and the creditors, or at least by stee, and therefore that no demand can now be made by any of the credi-
: the infliction of the penalties of the 150th section. The first element defence is a clause in the offer of composition which is dated the 6th of ber 1867, and is addressed by the bankrupt to the trustee. He offers a ition at the rate of 6s. 6d. per pound, and likewise provides for the trus-muneration and expense attending the sequestration, paying the said com-n as follows—3s. per pound within two months, 1s. 9d. per pound within nonths, and 1s. 9d. per pound within twelve months respectively from the date of his discharge, and agrees to take the entire responsibility of the made by the nominal pursuer against the estate, and offers two caution payment of the same. Now, the meaning of this, so far as the caution concerned, is—and that is distinctly shewn by what followed upon it—th cautioners as well as the bankrupt himself were to take the entire respons of Mr Thomas's claim against the estate, whatever that may mean. It is sai this clause in the offer of composition ought to have aroused the attention trustee and of all the creditors to the fact that some arrangement was go with Mr Thomas, and necessarily an arrangement between Mr Thomas an bankrupt and his cautioners. Now, it does not appear to me necessarily implied from this clause that there was any arrangement going on, beca that it says is that the bankrupt and his cautioners are to take the respons of the claim of Mr Thomas, meaning plainly to take the risk of his claim (ference being good. I do not see that it can mean anything else than Now, there is nothing very anomalous or extraordinary in an offer of compc being made, coupled with such a condition. If Mr Thomas was satisfiec the estate, when reinvested in the bankrupt, coupled with the caution whi offered, gave him as good a security for his preference, if it should be establ as the sequestration itself, there was no reason in the world why Mr Tl should not assent to the composition arrangement, and take this in place (security which he thought he had under the sequestration. In short, i came to this: here is one creditor claiming a real security over a part (estate. It is disputed, and the trial of it may involve delay and expense may lead to a sale of the most valuable portion of the bankrupt estate, would take from the bankrupt the desire and the interest to get himself cessed; and therefore he and his cautioners say, "We will take this out (way, because let the composition-arrangement be accepted, and we will tal chance of Mr Thomas establishing his preference, and if he does establish will make it good." Now, in such an arrangement as that I apprehend th not the slightest illegality; and that is the nature of the undertaking wl think is shadowed forth in this clause of the offer of composition. It do appear to me, therefore, that either the trustee or any of the creditors cou expected to take alarm at this clause, or to imagine that under cover of it illegal preference was about to be established in favour of Mr Thomas at t pense of the estate, or for the purpose of facilitating the obtaining of the rupt's discharge by composition. There is a good deal of written evidenc nected with this, which it would be quite wearisome and useless to go th in detail. The most that can be said of it is, that before the compositio accepted, before the meeting at which the acceptance took place, the truste made aware that some arrangement had been made with Mr Waddell. Th nothing more proved, I think, by any of the documents than that, and e the trustee had had such communications made to him as ought to have ar his suspicion, I am afraid that would be of no relevancy as an objection Sandeman, the real raiser of this multiplepoinding, unless the knowledge be brought home to him, because the trustee's indiscretion or delict in s matter, I apprehend, would not be binding upon the creditors to the eff barring any of them from their remedy under the 150th section after the s tration was closed. It might be attended with very serious consequences as the trustee is concerned, and if the trustee, during the sequestration, w attempt to enforce the penalties of the 150th section, it might operate to pr him from doing so. But I cannot see how any amount of neglect, or even quency, on the part of the trustee, in reference to such an illegal transact this, could bar the remedy of an unpaid creditor under the second part (section, unless knowledge of these proceedings was brought home to that tor himself. But I am bound to say further, and to say for the trustee, I do not think any communication which was made to him was of such a n as to disclose the existence, or the intention to call into existence, any i transaction or preference. All that was disclosed to him was that an ar ment had been made with Mr Thomas. Mr Thomas himself intimates thi letter of the 9th December, in which he says that an arrangement has been under which he gives up his opposition, and in fact assents to the composition. The nature of the arrangement is not in any way explained. Now, if it could be said that no arrangement of any sort could be otherwise than illegal, and that this ought therefore to have aroused the trustee's suspicion, there might have been more in the argument; but I am afraid that is not so. The arrangement with Mr Thomas, that is to say, Mr Thomas's assent to what is proposed respecting him in the composition-contract, is not illegal. If Mr Thomas says, "I see what you propose in your composition-contract, and I do not object to let the composition-arrangement go through, and to vote for it, you and your cautioners undertaking, as I understand, that if I shall be able to establish my preference as good it shall be given effect to just the same as if the sequestration was still in existence," I have already said that I do not think that arrangement would be illegal, and therefore Mr Thomas's assent to that arrangement could not be illegal; and that anything more was done, I think, was not in any way communicated to the trustee. Upon the whole matter, I come to the conclusion, certainly with a feeling of great compassion for Mr Thomas, and with the natural reluctance which one must always feel to enforce a very severe penalty, but still I come to the conclusion, without much difficulty in point of law, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is perfectly well founded in so far as he sustains the multiplepoinding and appoints the nominal raiser to lodge a condescendence of the fund in medio. The case has not yet proceeded further than that. What the amount of that fund will be, and what is precisely the meaning of the words in the section, "the amount of the debt of the colluding creditor," I do not at present inquire.

Lord Deas.—Whatever conclusion may be come to in this particular case it is quite necessary, for the sake of the law, to distinguish more clearly than the Lord Ordinary does in his note between this case and the case of M'Laren. Nobody doubted Mr M'Laren's good faith, but still he was in the position merely of an ordinary creditor, who did not even himself suppose that he was entitled to any preference. That was not the position of Mr Thomas. Mr Thomas had obtained a security over the machinery of the mill, which he seems to have helped the bankrupt, out of his own pocket, to purchase, and he bona fide believed that to be a good security; and he was advised by intelligent members of the legal profession that it was so. That contention, so long as it continued to be actively asserted, necessarily prevented the creditors from being able to wind up the estate. They might have got the machinery sold along with the mill with Mr Thomas's consent, which he was not unwilling to give; but they could not have divided the money so long as Mr Thomas was insisting upon that claim of preference, which might have been decided in this Court, and might have been carried to the House of Lords, and the dependence of which law-suit would necessarily have prevented the creditors from realising anything for years, and very likely prevented the possibility of any such composition-contract as that which has been entered into being carried through, or even proposed by the bankrupt. There is no reason to think that if there had been a law-suit of that kind in dependence the bankrupt could have produced the money to pay 6s. in the pound, or that he could have got even Mr Waddell,—an adventurous enough individual,—to become one of his cautioners for the composition. I have no doubt, therefore, that the creditors had a substantial interest and saw that they had a substantial interest in obtaining an arrangement with Mr Thomas, even at the expense of paying a considerable sum of money,—perhaps as much as £500,—to enable them to get 6s. a pound on their debts, which they never would have got otherwise; and in that point of view I rather suppose that the transaction, in its result, was not hostile to the interests of the creditors, but for their benefit. Now, in that state of matters it might be difficult to say how far even the trustee could have gone, of his own accord, under the powers conferred on him by the statute to enter into compromises, but most assuredly I agree in what I understand to be the opinion of your Lordship that there would have been no illegality whatever in the trustee and the creditors together agreeing to such an arrangement by which Mr Thomas's preferable claim was to be bought off. Moreover, I am humbly of opinion that it would not have invalidated that arrangement, in the least degree, although it had been stipulated, at the same time, that Mr Thomas was to consent to the composition-contract. It would necessarily have been a part of it, because if he did not consent to the composition contract the arrangement would not have been perfected, and it would not have suited the purpose for which it was intended. It is no doubt a very awkward part of that arrangement, that, while Mr Thomas considered his preferable security was to be bought off for £500, he was still to rank for the whole amount of his debts. But even that, if the creditors had agreed to it, might have been defended, for it only amounts to giving him a somewhat larger sum in a different shape. The additional composition he would have got in that way would not have come out of the funds comprehended under the sequestration. If any friend of the bankrupt chose to advance £500 to buy off Mr Thomas's preferable right, that was a thing for the benefit of the creditors, and not to their disadvantage. So that even that perhaps would not have tainted it with illegality, if the creditors had agreed to it. But the whole difficulty is, as your Lordship has pointed out, that we have no evidence, or at least no sufficient evidence, that the creditors did agree to it. I have no doubt that every word of the statement given by Mr Thomas in his deposition is quite correct, and that he was led to believe that the creditors were all desirous for it. I think he was incautious in not making sure, by evidence, that they had consented, or were approving of it, in a form that would bind them. He was incautious in that respect, but I have no doubt he believed that the creditors were all in favour of it, and it is not difficult to suppose that he believed that, for it probably was for the interest of the creditors, and if it had been fairly brought before them it is quite possible, and even probable, that they might have agreed to it. On the other hand, it is plain enough that Mr Waddell, in his evidence, hedges very much, and does not give the same candid statement of what took place which is given by Mr Thomas. In short, it appears that Mr Thomas has been made the victim of Mr Waddell and the bankrupt together; and, if that be so, we cannot help it; still Mr Thomas is not without a plausible case, because there is room for saying that the creditors, or such of them as were taking an active part in the sequestration, must have had a pretty shrewd notion that Mr Thomas's preferable claim was being bought off, and had been bought off. The correspondence shews that there was no secret made about it, and even the offer of composition itself indicates something of that kind, because it bears on the face of it that the bankrupt was to take the entire responsibility of the claims made by Mr Thomas against the estate; and coupling that with the preceding correspondence, and with the letters from Mr Thomas himself, it could hardly be supposed that it meant anything else than that it was understood that a sum of money was to be paid to Mr Thomas in order to get him to give up that preference. It is plain enough that he never indicated that he would give it up for nothing. He was standing out for a sum of money; and the terms of the contract of composition certainly indicate, or might have indicated, to anybody who read it, that in all probability some arrangement of that kind had been come to between them. But I agree with your Lordship that that is not sufficiently explicit to entitle us to go upon it in a question of this kind. If the agreement itself between Mr Thomas and Mr Waddell, on the part of whoever Waddell was acting for, had been embodied in that offer of composition, and so had been put before the creditors, I should have hesitated very much in coming to the conclusion that Mr Thomas was liable in any penalties in this action, because the creditors present at the meeting when the offer of composition was considered certainly could not have made any objection if they had seen the thing embodied in the offer itself, and I am not prepared to say that creditors like Sandeman, even supposing he did not know it, would be entitled, in the first place, to put the composition of 6s. in the pound, which they could not have got otherwise, into their pockets, and then over and above to challenge the transaction in the way done here. There is a great deal to say for this, that supposing a creditor at the meeting for accepting the composition saw on the face of the agreement embodied in it a thing which he was going to

allenge, he ought to have challenged it before he took the composition; for was not fair to take advantage of the illegal contract, and then to come forard and claim this over and above. But, unfortunately for Mr Thomas, that not the state of the matter; because the bargain is not embodied in the offer composition; and it is not brought either before the trustee or before the editors in that distinct form which I think could alone have sanctioned an angement of this kind, but which I think, if that had been done, would have anctioned it. Therefore I am compelled, not very willingly, I confess, to come o the conclusion that the plea which is stated by Mr Thomas, and which has been argued before us, cannot be sustained. What the other creditors may say to this I do not know. I can only say for myself that if I were a creditor I should certainly not like any portion of that money to come into my pocket. It is an instance, and I am glad to say a very rare instance, in the administration of our law, where the law will give a party a title to money in a way which is dishonest; and I should hold it to be dishonest, if I were a creditor, to come forward and claim any advantage from the success of the plea which is here to be sustained. But that is a matter for the creditors themselves individually to consider. They may take a different view of it from what I do. But whatever view they may take of it, and whether they take advantage of it or not, I agree with your Lordship that we have no course open to us but to pronounce the judgment proposed.

Lord Ardmillan.—I must say that I do in this case regret being compelled to come to the conclusion that Mr Thomas has incurred the statutory penalties. But the decision here is unavoidable, for the decision in the House of Lords in the case of Carter v. M'Laren has taught us that, if the facts are proved, we have no discretion, but that the statute must be construed and applied with inflexible severity. So applying it, the result is here inevitable. I could have wished it otherwise. I cannot help saying that I think Mr Thomas was "more sinned against than sinning." I have great sympathy with him. But I have no alternative. The meaning of the letter of Mr Waddell of 9th September, written to Thomas by Waddell in concert with the bankrupt and Craig, as Waddell depones, is clear and beyond all doubt, and is an offer of a premium or bonus to secure accession to the bankrupt's discharge on composition. The offer was so understood, and was accepted and acted on according to its terms. Mr Thomas's accession was necessary to obtaining the discharge on composition, and that accession was obtained. The legal consequence under the statute of such an offer and such an acceptance is beyond question. It is almost impossible to suggest a reasonable doubt, and as was explained in the case of Carter v. M'Laren in the House of Lords, a Court of justice must assume knowledge of the law, and knowledge of the consequences of such a transaction. I do not see sufficient ground, or indeed any ground, for imputing to Mr Thomas fraud or corrupt intention, or even a desire to take an unfair advantage. But if the act complained of and proved is a violation of the statutory law, so as to incur the statutory penalty, we cannot avoid coming to that conclusion, and having reached it we cannot escape, and must not shrink, from imposing the penalty.

Mr Thomas held a security, and he honestly thought he had a preference. In this the case differs from the case of M'Laren. He stoutly maintained his preference, and seems to have been so advised. He agreed to surrender it for a consideration, and to accede to the composition. I give him credit for believing that he was doing no wrong. Had the transaction been made with the creditors, or sanctioned by the creditors, it would not have been illegal. Had the trustee been made aware of it, it would have been his duty to communicate it to the creditors, and I have no doubt he would have done so. But the serious point which I cannot get over is, that the creditors were not informed that this purchase was to be made, this bonus to be given, and that, in the letter of Mr Thomas to the trustee of 9th September 1867, just after the transaction and on the same day, he does not communicate to the trustee the terms or the particular nature of Waddell's letter and his own agreement, nor does he mention the promise of a sum of money payable on the discharge and contingent on the discharge of the bankrupt,—a sum promised and agreed to in order to facilitate the bankrupt's discharge.

I agree with your Lordship in holding that the reference to Thomas's claim in the offer of composition was not sufficient intimation to the creditors of this transaction. Nor is proof of any such intimation to be gathered from the subsequent correspondence. The fact that Mr Thomas did not send the letter to the trustee, or communicate to the trustee the promise, and the fact that, through Waddell as mandatary, and according to the agreement with Waddell, he voted on his whole claim without deducting the security, makes it too clear to need further remark that in regard to the trustee and creditors the agreement was "secret," and that between the bankrupt and Waddell and Mr Thomas it was collusive in relation to the creditors. That the bankrupt and Waddell meant, by the payment of £500, to secure the accession of Mr Thomas to the composition I have no doubt, and the transaction has been already found by the Court to be, as regards both parties, illegal.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking the testimony of Mr Waddell in this cause, and the conduct of Mr Waddell in the transaction, very unsatisfactory. But Mr Thomas was, to say the least, incautious and indiscreet, and the statutory penalty has been incurred.

A separate argument was ingeniously urged by Mr Asher, to the effect that since Waddell's promise to pay has been escaped from by him on the ground pleaded by himself that it was illegal and void, therefore it is not to be valued, and indeed has no appreciable value, as it was not fulfilled. This plea cannot possibly be sustained. The meaning of it is, that the more manifest the illegality of the proceedings the safer is the wrongdoer; that the transaction is so clearly illegal that the promise to pay is null and void, and therefore the penalty is escaped from. Not even the ability of my friend Mr Asher can make such an argument successful.

I am, though not without some regret, of the opinion expressed by your Lordship that we must apply the statute and enforce the penalty.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the said interlocutors, and refuse the reclaiming note, and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further as may be just, with power to his Lordship to decern for the expenses hereinafter found due, when ascertained: Find the nominal raiser liable in additional expenses to the real raisers: Allow an account," &c.

Western Bank v. Baird's Trustees.

Joint Stock Company—Reparation—Director.—By the contract of copartnery of a joint stock banking company it was declared that no shareholder could be legally a director who resided permanently more than ten miles distant from the head office, and that a director ceased to be one, if he had not attended a meeting of directors for six months. In an action by the bank and its liquidators against a shareholder who had been elected and occasionally acted as a director for loss said to have been caused by his gross negligence, held that the defender, having assumed the position of a director, and acted as such, could not plead these clauses of the contract in bar of the action.

Joint Stock Company—Director—Reparation—Negligence—Personal Bar—Process.—In an action brought by a joint stock banking company and its liquidators against a person who had been a director for payment of £299,736, 7s. 6d. as "the amount of loss and damage due by the defender to the bank" as at the date when he ceased to be a director (five years before the stoppage of the bank)— No. 19.

The pursuer alleged—that by the contract of copartnery it was the duty of the board of directors to superintend and control the manager in his management of the bank's affairs; that the defender had grossly neglected this duty—(1) during two years in which he attended the meetings of directors; and (2) during four years in which he did not attend them. Nov. 22, 1872. Western Bank v. Baird's Trustees.

That the defender—in the knowledge that the bank's affairs were in an embarrassed condition, owing to improper advances having been made by the manager, and in the knowledge that the manager was in the practice of making large advances from the bank's funds, in contravention of the provisions of the contract of copartnery, on open accounts, without security—had grossly neglected his duty along with his co-directors (1) In having allowed the manager, without control, to make such advances to certain persons, as shewn in the books of the bank, which were referred to brevitatis causa; (2) in having allowed the manager to make large advances by way of discount on bills to five firms whose circumstances were not such as to warrant their getting credit without security; (3) in allowing the bank's funds to be expended in payment of premiums on policies of insurances effected on the lives of certain debtors of the bank which had been sold by the liquidators at a loss to the bank.

That the whole of these advances were at the date when the defender ceased to be a director irrecoverable to the extent of the sum sued for, but the books of the bank referred to as shewing the advances on accounts-current during the defender's tenure of office shewed further that the bank had subsequently made large additional advances on some of these accounts, and the pursuer admitted that he had stated the loss on these earlier advances at the percentage of loss which the bank had sustained upon the whole account. The books further shewed that the whole of the bills discounted for the five firms had been retired after the defender had left office, either by renewals or by cash payments.

Held (1) that the books of the bank referred to in the summons were to be regarded as part of the pursuer's statement; (2) that with regard to the alleged loss by advances on accounts-current which were closed at the time when the defender ceased to be a director the pursuer had set forth a case sufficiently relevant to be admitted to probation; (3) that the defender could not be made liable for loss on advances on accounts-current to those persons to whom the bank had continued to make advances after the defender had left office, and further, that the pursuer had not made a relevant averment of the loss on these earlier advances; (4) that any liability which the defender might have incurred in allowing the advances by way of discounts on bills had been extinguished by the subsequent actings of the bank in renewing the bills and in making new advances; (5) that any liability for loss by the insurance policies had been extinguished by the sale of the policies by the bank, without notice to the defender; (6) that as the summons, with the books referred to in it, disclosed facts which excluded the action quoad the last three items the proper form of interlocutor was one dismissing the action to that extent.

The late William Baird of Elie was a director of the Western Bank of Scotland, a joint stock banking company, from June 1846 to June 1852.

The bank stopped payment in 1857, and was wound up under the Winding-up Acts. In 1859 the liquidators brought an action against Mr Baird and his co-directors, founded on alternative allegations of joint fraud or joint negligence. Certain of the directors compromised this action and were assoilzied. The case was subsequently insisted in against Mr William Baird and his brother Mr James Baird, but was afterwards abandoned under the statute.

No. 19.

Nov. 22, 1872. Western Bank v. Baird's Trustees.

The present action was brought in 1863 in name of the bank and i liquidators, against Mr William Baird alone, a separate action bei brought against Mr James Baird.

The summons concluded for payment of "£299,736, 7s. 6d., or of suc other sum, more or less, as shall be found in the course of the process t follow hereon to be the amount of loss and damage due by the defend as at 23d June 1852 (the date at which Mr Baird cased to be a directo or from such other date as may be fixed in the course of the said proces The said sum consisted of (1) advances to customers on open accou £132,670, 3s. 2d.; (2) discounts on bills of exchange, £151,574, 11s. 8d and (3) payments for premiums on policies of insurance opened by th bank on the lives of certain of their debtors, £15,491, 12s. 8d.

The action was founded on the gross negligence of Mr Baird ind vidually, or the gross negligence of him and his co-directors.

The following pleas stated for the defenders were first dealt with:- 1. The pursuers have no title to sue. 2. Having regard to the charact and nature of the former action raised at the instance of the Weste Bank and the liquidators of the said bank, and the grounds thereof, th compromises or settlements, discharges, and decree of absolvitor refer to in the preceding statement amount in law to a compromise or settl ment and discharge of the whole claims made in the present action, a the same cannot now be insisted in or maintained to any extent or effe against the defenders. Separatim, The action cannot be maintained, b cause by the said compromises or settlements, discharges, and decree absolvitor the pursuers have extinguished or prejudiced the claims relief otherwise competent to the defender.

The Lord Ordinary (Kinloch) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repe the objection to the title to sue set forth in the first plea in defence stat in the closed record: Repels also the defence founded on the compromi and discharge engaged in with the other directors, set forth in the seco plea in defence: Finds the action relevantly laid, in so far as founded an allegation of gross neglect in duty on the part of the late Willi Baird, and the other directors of the Western Bank in office along wi him, and repels the objection to relevancy in so far as directed agai the case stated under the second plea in law for the pursuers set forth the closed record; but finds the action not relevantly laid, in so far founded on an allegation of individual negligence on Mr Baird's pa giving rise to the loss complained of, and sustains the objection to re vancy in so far as directed against the case stated under the first plea i the pursuers in the said closed record; and appoints the pursuers to lod within six days, the issue or issues which they propose for the trial of t case, as stated under the said second plea in law."

Both parties reclaimed, and on 10th July 1866 the Court pronounc this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the reclaimi notes for both parties against Lord Kinloch's interlocutor of 1st Decemb 1865, adhere to the said interlocutor in so far as it repels the objection the title to sue stated in the first plea for the defenders, and to th extent and effect refuse the prayer of the reclaiming note for the d fenders; quoad ultra recal in hoc statu the interlocutor reclaimed agains Find that the compromises, discharges, and decree of absolvitor refer to in the second plea for the defenders do not preclude the pursuers fro insisting in their claim against the defenders as stated in the summo and record: Therefore repel the said second plea for the defenders in bo its branches, in so far as it is stated in limine as a bar to the actio Before further answer as to the whole other pleas of the parties hinc in remit to Mr Charles Pearson, accountant in Edinburgh, to examine th books and relative documents of the Western Bank, and (1) To report the commencement, progress, and final termination of each of the accounts mentioned in the schedule A, appended to the record; what securities, if any, the bank held at any time for the advances made on the said accounts; what was the balance, if any, at the debit of each of said accounts, as at the 23d June 1852; what payments were after that date received to the credit of each of the said accounts, and (so far as the books shew), from what sources these payments were received by the bank, or made by the customers, debtors in the said accounts, or any persons on their behalf; and further, what was the lowest balance at the debit of each of the said accounts at any time after 23d June 1852, and whether after said date the balances were ever shifted, and to what extent, to the credit side of any of the said accounts: (2) To report what was the amount of bills which had been discounted to each of the firms mentioned in the 35th article of the condescendence, and were unretired at 24th June 1846; to prepare and report a descriptive list of the bills discounted to each of the said firms between 24th June 1846 and 23d June 1852, shewing whether, when, and how these bills were retired, at or after maturity; what bills discounted to each of the said firms were unretired at 23d June 1852, and whether, when, and how the said last-mentioned bills were retired: (3) To report what policies (if any) the bank held on the lives of debtors to the bank at or prior to 1846; what policies on lives of the bank's debtors were subsequently opened by the bank; what were the premiums payable and paid on each of said policies, and what was the ultimate result of each of such insurances: Further, authorise the accountant to report any other matter appearing in the books of the bank fairly falling within the general scope of this remit, which either party may request him to report."

This judgment was appealed, without leave of the Court of Session, to the House of Lords, but the appeal was dismissed.—(Ante, vol. v. H. L. p. 93.)

The case now came up on the accountant's report, and on the 2d and other pleas for the defenders;—2. (quoted above). 3. The late William Baird was never legally elected a director of the bank, nor entitled to hold office as such during any part of the period libelled, and his representatives are not responsible for any transactions, except those of which he was personally cognisant, and in which he took part. 4. The said William Baird was not responsible for any transactions which took place subsequently to May 1848, nor for any losses which arose on those transactions. 5. The claim made in the present action is excluded by the 31st section of the contract of copartnery, (which was as follows:—"The said ordinary board of directors shall not be liable for omissions, nor shall they, nor the manager, cashier, or other officer be liable for the responsibility of persons dealing with the company, nor for the sufficiency of the securities or properties in which the funds of the company may be invested as aforesaid; nor shall the said directors be liable for the acts and intromissions of the manager or other officers of the company appointed or to be appointed as aforesaid, or of any other person entrusted with the business of the company, nor shall they be liable in solidum, nor for the intromissions of each other, but each of them for his own actings and intromissions allenarly.")

Besides general pleas against the relevancy of the action, the defenders further pleaded;—6. The claims of the pursuers under the present action are excluded (1) by mora, and (2) by acquiescence and adoption. 9. The defenders are entitled to absolvitor, or the action should be dismissed, in respect, (1) that there is no specification of the advances through which loss is said to have been sustained; (2) that there is no allegation tha such advances were made by the late Mr Baird, or with his knowledge (3) that there is no specification, or at least no sufficient specification, o the alleged losses, or of the cause of these losses; (4) that there is n relevant allegation of any gross negligence on the part of the late M Baird; and (5) that there is no relevant allegation that the alleged losse were caused by any such negligence. 10. The defenders are entitled t absolvitor, or the action ought to be dismissed, in respect the loss an damage alleged were not occasioned, and are not by the pursuers rele vantly or sufficiently averred to have been occasioned, by the late M Baird, or by any person for whom he was in law responsible. 11. Th sums credited in the accounts of the respective persons or companies an firms mentioned in the condescendence and schedules fall to be imputed in extinction of sums debited therein in the order of their dates. 12 The averments of the pursuers being contradicted by the books of th bank, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The 3d and 4th pleas were rested upon averments that by the contrac of copartnery it was provided that no person was qualified to be electe or to serve as an ordinary director of the bank who should permanentl reside at a greater distance than ten miles from Glasgow; and that a soon as a director should become disqualified in this or any other wa his appointment was ipso facto to cease, and his place to becom vacant. Also that by the contract it was provided that a director shoul be disqualified by refusing or neglecting to attend the meetings of the boar for six months without sufficient cause assigned to the satisfaction of hi co-directors; that Mr William Baird had permanently resided during th whole period of his alleged tenure of office at Rosemount, Ayrshire, abou forty miles distant from Glasgow; and farther—(Stat. 10) "Between Jun 1846 and May 1848 Mr Baird attended meetings of the directors of th bank as regularly as his engagements and the distance of his residen from Glasgow would permit. The last meeting of the board attended b Mr Baird was on the 31st day of May 1848. Thereafter he never attend any meeting, or took part in any of the proceedings of the board of dire tors, or acted in any way in the affairs of the bank. On 30th Novemb 1848 the space of six successive calendar months elapsed during whi Mr Baird did not attend any meeting of the board of directors, and th without any cause for this being assigned to his co-directors, and at th time, under the contract, his place became vacant, and he ceased to be director, if he ever was one. Further, on or about the said 31st day May 1848 Mr Baird informed Mr Smith, the company's manager, th he (Mr Baird) was no longer to attend any meetings of the board, or take any part in its proceedings, and thereafter no notices of any mee ings were sent to him. It was not usual to send to the directors noti of the ordinary weekly meetings, but notice of all special meetings w sent to the directors. During the period between June 1848 and Jun 1852 many special meetings of directors were held, but no notice of an of these was given to Mr Baird."

The pursuers stated;—(Cond. 8) "The committee of management, ordinary board of directors appointed by the contract, and those to b appointed thereafter in terms thereof, were thereby 'authorised and em powered to superintend, direct, manage, and transact the whole busine and concerns of the company, and to carry on the business of banking fo behoof of the company, in all its branches, as above specified.'" (Con 10) "The ordinary board of directors was by the contract authorised t give credit on cash accounts to the partners of the company, to the exte or amount of one-half of their advanced stock, and to such further exte as the circumstances of the company and the current value of the stock might seem to warrant, without any further or collateral security but that arising from the right of retention competent to the company, and assignation in security thereinafter contained, and the contract prescribed the form of application to be made by partners of the company for credit on said cash accounts. It was further by the contract declared that it should not be in the power of the directors to grant a cash-credit or account to any other person or persons than a partner of the company, unless on bond with security, real or personal, to their satisfaction; that if such credits were granted on personal bond there should be at least two securities or cautioners besides the principal party, who should all be taken bound, conjunctly and severally, as co-principals, for the amount to be drawn in virtue of such cash-credit, ... "

They further stated that Mr Baird was an ordinary director from June 1839 to June 1845, and from June 1846 to June 1852. (Cond. 29) "Notwithstanding the said William Baird's knowledge of the embarrassed position and circumstances of the bank, and of the necessity for diligent superintendence of its affairs, and a careful control of the advances of its funds, he, during the period between 24th June 1846 and 23d June 1852, when he held the office of a member of the ordinary board of directors and committee of management as aforesaid, grossly neglected his duties. He failed, during that period, to superintend and control the bank's business and affairs, and particularly the advances of the bank's funds. Ordinary meetings of the board were held at the bank's office in Glasgow once weekly or thereby, in nominal compliance with the provisions of the contract; and during the two years from June 1846 to June 1848 the said William Baird attended a number of these meetings. At these meetings, however, he failed to perform the duties of superintendence and management which he had undertaken. At such meetings there was no inquiry or investigation made, or information required and obtained, in reference to the advances of the bank's funds which were from time to time applied for, and were in course of being made at the head office and at the branches, or in reference to the circumstances and credit of persons applying for and obtaining advances, and the security to be obtained therefor. With the knowledge of the said William Baird, Mr Donald Smith, the manager of the bank, was allowed, without control, systematically to make advances at his own discretion, and that without security, or upon such security as he thought fit. Subsequently to June 1848 the said William Baird attended no meeting of the board, and during the whole period from June 1846 to June 1852 he did not attend any meeting of any committee of the directors." (Cond. 30) "The other members of the board in office with the said William Baird also grossly neglected their duties during the said period, and failed to superintend and control the bank's business and affairs, and particularly the advances of the bank's funds. The ordinary weekly meetings of the board of directors were held at the head office of the bank in Glasgow on Tuesdays at three o'clock, and were of short duration. The various members of the ordinary board of directors in office with the said William Baird attended, with more or less frequency, a number of these weekly meetings, held during the said period. Meetings of committees were also held during the same period at irregular and distant intervals, and were attended by certain of the directors other than the said William Baird. The ordinary directors, however, including the said William Baird, did not at the weekly meetings of the board, or at the committee meetings so held, superintend, direct, or control the bank's business and affairs or the advances of the bank's funds. They did not consider or judge of the applications made for advances of the bank's funds; they did not examine or judge of the bills given in for discount; they did not make inquiry as to the character, or credit, or commercial standing of persons receiving advances from the bank or of the obligants on bills discounted by the bank, and they did not see that such inquiry was made by others, nor had they information before them in regard thereto. With the knowledge of all the members of the ordinary board of directors, including the said William Baird, the manager of the bank was allowed systematically, without control, and without previous communication with the directors, or with any committee of their number, to employ the bank's funds at his own discretion, in making advances of such amounts, and on such security, or without security, as he thought fit. In like manner there was no superintendence or control by the directors of advances made at the bank's branches such as the contract required, although information as to the advances then made, and in the course of being made, was from time to time communicated by the bank's agents to the manager. This information was not communicated to the directors, who did not require such information to be laid before them, and did not investigate, check, or control these advances. The manager was left to act according to his own will and pleasure with regard to the advances made at the branches and the instructions given to the agents at the branches; and he made, or allowed advances there, with or without security, as he thought fit. Under this general system, and in this way, the advances after-mentioned in articles 32 to 39 inclusive were made." (Cond. 31) "The members of the said ordinary board during the said period did not, at said weekly meetings or otherwise, require from the manager information as to the persons to whom, or the security upon which, the bank's funds had been advanced by him. Of the advances made on current accounts, amounting at the head office alone to about £1,500,000, they had no statement or account laid before them. Of the bills under discount at the head office amounting at June 1852 to above £2,400,000, they had no statement or account submitted to them shewing the amount under discount to different customers of the bank, nor had they before them the information necessary to enable them to judge of the propriety of making further and continued discounts to customers to whom they were already largely in advance on bills discounted. The books of the bank were readily accessible, and would have shewn to whom the bank's funds had been advanced, and the amounts advanced to each customer, and the security, if any, taken therefor, and the members of the board knew this. But they, including the said William Baird, grossly and culpably neglected to examine these books, or to require that abstracts thereof, containing the information necessary to enable them to judge of the propriety of the actings of the manager in making advances at the head office, or in making or allowing advances at the branches, should be furnished to them. They, including the said William Baird, through gross neglect, remained in culpable ignorance of the actings of the manager of the bank in reference to the advances of the bank's funds; and notwithstanding their being aware that advances of the bank's funds were being constantly applied for and made to a very large amount, they suffered the advances to be given at the will and pleasure of the manager, for whose guidance no rules or limits of advances were prescribed, and who was left uncontrolled in all his operations. The said William Baird was aware that during the said period the business of the bank was carried on on the system above set forth, and that the advances of the bank's funds were made systematically without superintendence or control by the directors."

Advances on Current Accounts.—(Cond. 32) "During the period from th June 1846 to 23d June 1852 advances of the bank's funds were made, der the system above explained, to a number of persons and companies, the head office and at the branches, without supervision and control on e part of the said William Baird and the other directors, and with a gross d reckless disregard of ordinary prudence, and of the ordinary rules and actice of banking; and the bank has thereby sustained serious loss. ch advances were made simply on cheques or drafts on the bank by the rties receiving the money. (1) A number of these parties, not partners the bank, without having provided any security other than their own rsonal obligations for repayment of the advances obtained (constituted y their cheques or drafts), were allowed to operate on current accounts hich were opened in their names in the books of the bank, in which ccounts were entered to their debit the amount of the advances made on their drafts, and to their credit any payments which they made from time to time. These accounts, in most instances, contained a large number of operations, but in all shewed balances due to the bank varying in amount. In many instances the accounts commenced with an entry to the debit of the party on an opening advance made by the bank, and thereafter further increasing advances, without security, were from time to time given. In others, the party originally deposited funds on an open account, and for a time the balance remained due by the bank; but these parties, after drawing out the amount of their deposits, were allowed, without security, to draw sums from the bank, and the advances thus made in many instances gradually increased to a large amount. (2) In the same way parties who were partners of the bank, and whose shares were regarded as security for advances, or who had provided other securities also, were allowed, under the system pursued, to draw large additional sums on their cheques or drafts after the utmost market value of their stock, and of any such securities, had been exhausted by prior advances, and that without providing any security for such sums. (3) And, in like manner, parties who were not partners of the bank, and who had originally provided securities of a value which was plainly exhausted by the advances made to them, were thereafter allowed to draw large sums on their own cheques or drafts, and on similar current accounts, without providing any security for such sums. The advances made as aforesaid in each of the three cases above mentioned were not of the nature of casual or temporary over-drafts made for a limited time and for some special purpose, but were made as a system, on operative cash accounts, with balances fluctuating in amount, but uniformly and for years exhibiting large and increasing sums due to the bank. Although, in most instances, no prescribed amount was named up to which it was agreed the party might draw, as in an ordinary cash-credit account, yet practically the persons and companies in whose names current accounts were opened and kept as above mentioned passed cheques and drafts, and operated on these accounts as if cash-credit accounts had been granted in terms of the contract of copartnery, without a prescribed limit having been fixed. The provisions of the contract of copartnery with reference to cash-credits or accounts were systematically disregarded."

(Cond. 33) "During the said period, and under the system above set orth, advances, without security for repayment thereof, were made to the ersons and companies mentioned in the schedule A hereunto annexed, nd that of the amounts, or not less than the amounts, respectively therein et forth.* The particulars of these advances, with the dates of advance, are contained in the current accounts, of the nature above referred to kept in the names of these parties in the books of the bank for said period, and to which, brevitatis causa, reference is here made. In said schedule the three different classes of cases above mentioned are separated and distinguished, and such of the persons obtaining these advances as were partners of the bank, or had given any securities to the bank, are therein specified." (Cond. 34) "The advances mentioned in the preceding article have in great part proved irrecoverable, and have been lost to the bank. The portions of said advances which have proved irrecoverable and have been lost are also set forth in the said schedule A. At the close of the said period, ending at 23d June 1852, the said advances, to the extent set forth in said schedule, were irrecoverable."

* Schedule A set forth the names of thirty debtors of the bank, giving, with

[With reference to the averments in the last two articles, the defenders stated—(Stat. 21) "The manner in which the pursuers bring out an estimate of the loss alleged by them to have arisen during the years from 24th June 1848 to 23d June 1852, upon the accounts of the persons or firms mentioned in schedule A, is as follows:—The loss ultimately arising upon each of these accounts at the stoppage of the bank is distributed out of the period during which the corresponding account was in operation, according to the number of years and in proportion to the respective amounts alleged to have been advanced in each year. The proportions of ultimate loss so calculated are alleged to be the loss incurred on advances to the said persons or firms during the several years respectively. The schedule A annexed to the revised condescendence is framed on this principle. If the pursuers do not admit this, they are called upon to specify the modes by which the accounts of the said losses have been brought out and estimated." And the pursuers answered,—(Ans. 21) "Admitted only that the recoveries on account of the debts due by the different debtors mentioned in schedule A are placed generally to the credit of the accounts of these debtors, so as to extinguish to the extent of such recoveries the total amount of these debts. The unrecovered balances have been lost to the bank, and the sums under the head 'irrecoverable' in said schedule are the portions of the advances mentioned in said schedule made between 24th June 1846 and 23d June 1852, which remain due after crediting so much of the total recoveries as effeirs to the advances. Thus, for instance if unsecured advances, say of £20,000, were made before 24th June 1846 and between 24th June 1846 and 23d June 1852, farther and additional unsecured and illegal advances were made to the extent of £20,000, and a still farther unsecured additional advance of the same amount was made subsequently, and before the stoppage of the bank, so that at that date a total debt of £60,000 was due; the recoveries, so far as not derived from securities, are applied to reduce the total debts,—that is, equally distributed over the whole advances, so that, in the case supposed, one-third of the total recoveries is credited to the advance of £20,000 made during the period between 1846 and 1852, and the irrecoverable and unrecovered counts of Bills.—(Cond. 35) "Under the system of management e bank pursued as above explained, the manager of the bank was red, without control, to judge as to the propriety of making advances ay of discount of bills presented to the bank, and advances were e by him in this way with great recklessness and gross imprudence; the result was, that serious loss and damage was sustained by the t. In particular, during the period between 24th June 1846 and 23d e 1852 such advances of very large amount were made, to the loss damage of the bank, to five firms carrying on business in Glasgow, ely, D. and J. Macdonald and Co., &c. The amount under discount hese five firms respectively, at 24th June 1846 and at 23d June 1852 pectively, was as follows:—

& J. Macdonald & Co.,	£19,866 9 6	£110,216 17 2	£90,350 7 8
. . . . .	. . . . .	. . . . .	. . . . .

ring the said period, between 24th June 1846 and 23d June 1852, en the said William Baird held office, fresh advances by way of disnts were thus made to these five firms, to the extent of £294,009, . 11d. The same system continued down to the period when the bank pped payment. The amount of discounts having been still further reased, it was found in November 1857, when the discounts ceased, t the bank was under advance to these five firms to the extent of ,476,891, 16s. 11d., or thereby, which nearly equalled the whole adnced capital stock of the bank. Of that amount there was lost to the nk not less than £805,096, 2s. 2d. Although, after June 1852, the counts were continued, and new bills were discounted to replace the ls falling due from time to time, the total amount of discounts was ver diminished, but, on the contrary, was largely increased. The total vance made prior to 23d June 1852 was thus not really repaid. A ge portion of the bills discounted to Macdonald and Co., J. and W. allace, and William Smith and Co. was retired with money provided by ese firms, who obtained the funds from the bank by discounting new ls, which were accommodation bills, not representing real transactions, d were drawn for the purpose of meeting and replacing the old bills, d farther additional advances were made down to the stoppage of the nk. The amount advanced during the said period, by way of discount, the said five firms was, at the close of the said period, irrecoverable to extent of not less than the ultimate loss after mentioned; and, had bank then ceased its advances the said firms must have thereupon pped payment. As soon as the bank intimated that these discounts st cease these five firms stopped payment, and announced themselves be bankrupt. Of the foresaid increased advance on discounts, amount- to £294,009, 13s. 11d., there has been lost to the bank, after crediting recoveries which the liquidators have been able, or expect to make, a of not less than £151,574, 11s. 8d. These five firms became bankt in the end of 1857."

With reference to the bills the defenders averred,—(Stat. 23) "It ears from the books and papers of the bank now in possession of the suers that the whole of the said bills were retired." (Stat. 24) "The le of the said bills are entered in the said books and papers as paid. counter statement is denied." (Ans. 23 and 24) "The books and ers of the bank are referred to. And it is admitted that the books contain credit entries of apparent payments of, or on account of, the great proportion of the said bills; but this admission is made subject to the statement and qualification that the sums credited in these entries were not truly repayments to the bank by the debtors of the sums which had been advanced by the bank on the discount of the said bills, but were merely the proceeds of new bills discounted by the bank to the said firms for the purpose of replacing the bills falling due. From time to time, as the bills referred to in the condescendence to which these firms were parties fell due, they provided themselves with the means of meeting these bills by bringing new bills to the bank for discount and discounting the same; or if the bank had not discounted these new bills, and so themselves furnished the means of retiring the bills of these firms falling due, the bills so falling due would have been dishonoured, and loss thereon to the amount of not less than the sum sued for on this account would certainly have been sustained. Quoad ultra denied." (Stat 25) "The whole of the said bills were given up by the said bank, and were given up as the same were respectively retired. At the time when the bank stopped payment they held no bill to which the said firms or any of them were parties, which was discounted between 24th June 1846 and 23d June 1852." (Ans. 25) "Admitted that the bills here referred to were given up on being replaced by other bills, under the system explained in the condescendence. Quoad ultra denied."]

Policies of Insurance. — (Cond. 38) "During the said period, between 24th June 1846 and 23d June 1852, under the system of management of the bank's business above explained, illegal and unauthorised advances of the bank's funds were made in the payment of premiums of insurance, and considerable loss and damage was thereby caused to the bank. . . ." (Cond. 40) "These policies were opened by the manager of the bank in the knowledge that none of the parties whose lives were insured were able or liable to pay the premiums of insurance. The bank undertook the payment thereof, and that without obtaining any security, or any obligation either expressed or implied by any person whatever, for repayment thereof. The insurances were simply a speculation on the lives of Scarth, Scott, and Cranstoun. Such transactions on the part of the bank, in the absence of security of any kind, real or personal, for repayment of the premiums, were illegal, reckless, grossly imprudent, and contrary to any known rules or practice of bankers. During the period down to June 1852 advances of the bank's funds, by annual payments of premiums on the said policies, were made to the amount of £23,854, 1s. 8d. The policies were kept up until the stoppage of the bank without the knowledge of the shareholders, and were surrendered by the liquidators of the bank, who found, after inquiry, that to keep them up longer would only have occasioned farther loss. The amounts advanced, as above mentioned, during the period between 24th June 1846 and 23d June 1852, and the losses sustained by the bank in consequence thereof, are as follows," &c. "This loss of £15,491, 12s. 8d. was truly incurred at 23d June 1852, and would have been ascertained had the policies been then realised, either by sale or surrender."

er share, payable by two equal instalments on 1st March and 1st June 858. On the 4th October 1858 they made a further call of £100 per hare, payable on 1st November 1858. The said calls have been paid to e extent of £1,989,707, 6s. 2d."

The pursuers argued;—Directors of a bank were liable for loss caused y gross negligence.[1] No part of the case could be disposed of on the parial investigation made by the accountant. The pursuers were entitled to ound on the accounts as they stood at 1852, when Mr Baird ceased to be a director. It was for the defenders to shew that the loss then occasioned by his negligence had been wiped off. The bank, however, undertook to prove that nothing further could have been recovered in 1852 than was subsequently recovered and credited. The case of Devayne[2] did not apply —(1) because the monies paid in to the credit of the accounts were specially appropriated, being paid to meet obligations becoming due a day or two after the payments; and (2) because they were not the monies of the debtor, but of the bank, obtained through discounting bills which ought not to have been discounted. If the principle of Devayne was held to apply, it would simply come to this, that a director was safe, however reckless or negligent, if he only saw that an equally reckless and negligent director succeeded him. It was not for the pursuers to state the mode of fixing the damage. It was for the Court to direct the jury on that point.[3] All that the pursuers required to state they had done. The defender was grossly negligent. By his negligence the monies of the bank were spent when they ought not, and loss ensued.

The defenders argued;—The Court must deal with the action as if the bank was the sole pursuer. The liquidators had no right which the bank would not have had.[4] From 1852 no higher liability could attach to Mr Baird than that of a cautioner for the persons to whom the advances were made, and his case was that the principal debtors were freed by payment. The balances were brought out daily, and at a certain date were wiped off. Again, the directors were simple mandataries, and there was no higher obligation on mandataries who were socii than on those who were not. The action was for breach of the contract of mandate, not of societas. The change of the debt or the debtor therefore operated as a discharge, and the discharge to the other directors discharged Mr Baird. That point was not previously decided. It was specially reserved. In cases of negligence there was relief between co-defenders, and Mr Baird's relief having been taken away, he was free. Mr Baird was disqualified from being a director by the terms of the contract. He was never legally a director, having always resided more than ten miles from Glasgow. He could not therefore be sued as a director,—at all events, not subsequently to 1848, having then ceased to be legally a director by not having attended a meeting of directors for six months. The pursuers' statements were irrelevant on all the three branches sued on. They said it was enough for them to state that loss had been sustained in 1852; it was for Mr Baird to shew that this loss was subsequently paid up. That was not so. It was for them to state and prove the loss at the date of the action. At farthest, Mr Baird could only be liable for one-sixth of the loss, the bank having discharged five out of six directors. If the bank now obtained decree in terms of the conclusions of the present summons they would make a profit, having already obtained payment of so much of the loss from the other directors. Advances on current accounts.—There was one of these features in each of the accounts—(1) The conversion of a debit balance of 1852 into a credit, though again turned to a debit before the stoppage of the bank; (2) The reduction of the debit balance of 1852, though again increased before the stoppage of the bank; or, (3) The increase of the debit balance of 1852, without its ever having been brought below that balance, but larger payments in whole having been made than the sum due in 1852. In any of these circumstances Mr Baird was free.[1] Discounts of bills.—The accountant had not implemented the remit as to these. He had not brought out that the bills due at the stoppage of the bank were renewals of those in 1852. At all events there was novation. Policies of insurance.—The only averment was, that Mr Baird allowed the manager to do what he pleased. It was not averred that the bank or the manager was speculating in life policies. The policies having been surrendered by the liquidators without communicating with Mr Baird, he was relieved from any claim for loss alleged to have been incurred through them.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I shall preface my remarks on this anxious and important case by a short summary of the previous procedure.

The Western Bank stopped payment in 1857, and has since been registered and wound up under the Winding-up Acts. All its debts have been paid, although at great loss to the shareholders; and the present action is the second which has been raised at the instance of the liquidators against persons who had held the office of directors of the bank to make good the losses, or part of them, which the bank sustained.

The proceedings against William Baird, whose representatives are now the defenders in this suit, commenced by an action raised in 1859 by the liquidators of the bank against him and other parties who had been directors of the bank, founded on charges rested on alternative allegations of joint fraud and joint negligence on the part of these directors in the conduct of the affairs of the bank, and concluding against them for sums said to have been lost through their delinquency, to a very large amount. In the progress of that action, after some important legal questions had been the subject of decision or observation by the Court, certain of the defenders compromised the action by payment of a considerable sum, and they were assoilzied. When the case came to be pressed against the only two defenders who remained in the process—viz. William Baird and his brother James Baird—after opinions on the relevancy of the action had been delivered by your Lordships of the Second Division, the case was abandoned under the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and the present action was brought against William Baird, who had been a director from June 1846 to June 1852, and a separate action against James Baird, who was a director from 1852 to 1856. Although these proceedings terminated in no practical result, and although the legal questions involved in the present case are presented in a form in some respects materially different from that which they assumed in the former action, the views elicited from the bench in that case are in many respects exceedingly important in the judgment we are now to pronounce, and may save me the necessity of lengthened exposition.

The present action is directed against William Baird alone. Its object is to recover from him certain sums of money, very distinctly specified, which are

o have been improperly advanced from the bank's funds during the period June 1846 to June 1852. The allegations of fraud have been abandoned, he present suit is laid entirely on the alternative allegation that these sums lost either through the gross negligence of William Baird himself individ-y, or through the gross negligence of himself and of his other co-directors, discharge of the duties of the office.

e sums which are concluded for are classed under three branches:—Sums ced to customers on open account; sums advanced by way of discount on of exchange; and sums expended in the payment of premiums on policies surance, opened by the bank on the lives of certain of their debtors. The nt concluded for under the first head is £132,670, 3s. 2d.; under the d head £151,574, 11s. 8d.; and under the third head £15,491, 12s. 8d. needless to say that, whether as regards the importance of the legal princi-involved, or the pecuniary interests at stake, the case is of the deepest im-nce, and deserves, as it has received, most anxious consideration.

his action was raised in 1863. The first occasion on which it came before Division of the Court was on a question relative to the obligation of the suers to produce the books of the company, which contained the accounts on ch the pursuers founded. The Lord Ordinary found that they were not ed to produce them; but the Court altered his judgment, and the books e ordered to be produced. Your Lordships, and the Lord Justice-General o then presided in this Division, held that the books were founded on in the rd "as absolutely essential to the pursuers' case." The books, accordingly, e produced, and the case having been sent back to the Lord Ordinary, he, on 1st of December 1865, pronounced an interlocutor, in which he sustained title to sue, repelled a defence founded on the compromise and discharge h the other directors, found the action relevant in so far as regarded the alle-ion of gross neglect of duty on the part of William Baird, along with similar ligence on the part of the other directors, but assoilzied him as regarded the gations founded on his own individual negligence.

This interlocutor came by reclaiming note before this Division of the Court, l the judgment then pronounced must be carefully attended to. In the first ce, the Court sustained the title of the pursuers, adhering to the judgment of Lord Ordinary in that respect. It is not unimportant to observe the views law on which the title was thus sustained. A similar question had arisen in former action. It was maintained on the part of the defenders in that case t the claim was not a company debt, and therefore could not be insisted in the liquidators, but was one which individual shareholders alone could sue

This contention was founded on the judgment of the Court in the case Tulloch and Davidson of the Aberdeen Bank (June 3, 1858, 20 D. 1045). the Court held that the claim was in its nature and substance simply a debt to the company, and that the liquidators accordingly, as representing and ing in place of the going concern, were entitled to recover it. The Lord linary decided the question of title in the present action on the authority of decision, and the Court adhered to his judgment in that respect.

It is therefore fixed in this case, and is a material element as regards some portant points involved in it, that the title on which the summons is rested hat of the company itself, and that the debt sued for is a debt due to the ik.

The second point decided by the interlocutor in question related to the second a in law stated for the defenders upon the record. This plea was founded on compromise entered into with the other directors, and the discharge granted them by the liquidator. The defenders pleaded that they were liberated by se proceedings. The same plea had been raised and repelled under the former ion, but the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in hoc statu, ex-ining that in the subsequent progress of the case circumstances might emerge ich might entitle the defenders to raise the question again. Their judgment ordingly was, "Find that the compromises, discharges, and decreet of absol-r referred to in the second plea in law for the defenders do not preclude the suers from insisting in their claim against the defenders, as stated in the summons and record; therefore repel the second plea for the defenders in b its branches, in so far as it is stated in limine as a bar to the action." So argument was addressed to us on the merits of this plea, on which I do n propose to express any opinion, but this,—that no circumstances have occurr in the process since that judgment was pronounced which can affect the groun on which it proceeded. I am therefore precluded by the previous judgm from considering its merits.

After thus disposing of these two pleas which were stated in bar of the acti the Court remitted to Mr Charles Pearson in terms of the judgment under whi the report now before us was prepared. The judgment was one before answ The Court was desirous, before farther considering the relevancy of the actio of seeing the accounts referred to, and learning how far they squared with t allegations contained in the record. But in the opinions which the Cou delivered in pronouncing the judgment two very important matters were su stantially settled. In the first place, the Court differed from the Lord Ordinar judgment as to the distinction which he drew between the individual negligen of William Baird and his joint negligence along with the other directors, a indicated an opinion that they were not prepared at that time to hold any pa of the record as irrelevant. I shall have occasion to advert to this when de ing more specially with the question of relevancy. The Court farther intimat that they did not consider this as an action of damages, but as a suit brought recover specific sums of money alleged to have been improperly advanced by th manager, and to have been lost to the bank by the delinquency of the director and it was mainly in that view they made the remit to the accountant to repo upon the particulars specified in their judgment.

This judgment was appealed to the House of Lords, but after full argume the appeal was dismissed as incompetent, and we have now the report of th accountant prepared in terms of the remit. It is only right to say that it is very careful, elaborate, and able report, and the materials with which th accountant has furnished us, voluminous as they are, have proved of the utmo assistance in our consideration of the case. We are therefore now to consid what course we are to follow in disposing of the action,—whether we are to se it to proof on all the three branches of the claim, or whether in all or any them the action is irrelevant.

Before proceeding to deliver my opinion on these points I may as well dispo of some other pleas which have been stated on the record as exclusive of t action. The third is to the following effect:—"The late William Baird w never legally elected a director of the bank, nor entitled to hold office as su during any part of the period libelled, and his representatives are not respo sible for any transactions except those of which he was personally cognisant, a in which he took part;" and the fourth plea is—"The said William Baird w not responsible for any transactions which took place subsequently to May 184 nor for any losses which arose on those transactions."

In so far as these pleas are founded on the proposition that William Bai could only be liable for transactions in which he took part, I do not deal wi them at this stage. But it was explained to us at the debate that the defend maintained that William Baird never was entitled to act as a director, becau he had his permanent residence more than ten miles from Glasgow, and w therefore disqualified from holding office by the express provisions of the co tract of copartnery. It was also maintained that as he had absolutely ceased act in any respect from the month of June 1848 he had forfeited his seat at t board of direction from the lapse of six months from that date, and that t directors were entitled to have declared his seat vacant, and to have elect another in his room.

The contract contains such provisions, but I am of opinion that the defend can take no benefit by them. If William Baird accepted office, and undertoo to discharge its duties, whether he was qualified or not, he was bound to di charge the duty which he undertook. If he found that he could not discharg these duties he had it in his power to retire. But he was not entitled to hol himself out to the shareholders as willing to fulfil the functions of the offic and as undertaking their discharge, and thereby give the weight of his credit and authority to the bank, and at the same time entirely refrain from acting, and shelter himself under his own disqualification. Whatever effect that plea might have had if maintained by the bank against him, it could not be available when pleaded by himself. I am prepared therefore to repel the third and fourth pleas in so far as founded on the alleged disqualification of William Baird. The fifth plea also founded on the 31st section of the company's contract will fall to be repelled, seeing that the provisions of that section can form no defence against gross negligence in the performance of duty.

Having thus cleared the way for the material questions which we have to decide I now proceed to consider these important claims.

I. The alleged advances to customers on open account.

These alleged advances are collected under schedule A, appended to the summons. The schedule contains no detail or specification beyond the names of the customers, the amount due by them in 1846, the amount advanced between 1846 and 1852, the amount due in June 1852, and the amount which is said to have proved ultimately irrecoverable. Although these accounts are massed together under schedule A, they consist of two classes, which are materially distinct from each other. The first class consists of accounts in which the debtors had become insolvent, and in which the loss was ascertained prior to the termination of William Baird's period of direction. The second class consists of accounts which were carried on by the bank after 1852, and on which the balance was only ascertained to be irrecoverable at or about the period when the bank stopped payment in 1857. I shall consider these two classes of accounts separately.

As to the first class. It is necessary, in the first instance, to consider what the allegations are which the record contains in regard to the gross negligence of William Baird, and to what extent these allegations, if true, will infer liability for the sums in question.

It is impossible to over-estimate the importance of the question thus raised. Considering the condition of the persons who generally occupy such positions in joint stock companies, and the immense value of the interests entrusted to them, no question could enter more deeply into the ordinary conduct of commercial affairs. It arises here substantially for the first time under circumstances which admit of a direct decision on the principle. It was very largely discussed under the prior action which was abandoned, and the views of the Court in the last advising of that action are exceedingly valuable and instructive. But they are complicated by the fact that they related to a record originally framed mainly to raise a question of fraud. Similar questions have been made the subject of some important observations in the English Courts, as in the case of Turquand, in the 4th vol. of the Law Reports, Equity series, and the case of Brown in the 8th vol. of the Law Reports, as well as in the very recent case of Overend, Gurney, and Company, in the current volume of the same reports. But in none of these cases did the question arise under circumstances which admitted of any general decision upon the principle. In Turquand's case there was plainly no ground for the contention of gross negligence. The second is not without some importance, as being the case of a single transaction for which it was sought to make an absent director responsible. The director escaped, but he was found not entitled to his costs in consequence of his negligence. The case of Overend, Gurney, and Company is chiefly important from the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, who refers to views which he had expressed in the case of Turquand, and makes some observations upon the doctrine of gross negligence, which are not without weight. But the general question as to how far the director of a joint stock company—such as the Western Bank—is liable for mere omission to discharge his duty, or what amount or kind of omission will be held to be crassa negligentia, have never as yet been authoritatively determined.

This record contains no allegation or suggestion of corrupt motive or fraudulent intent, neither is there any allegation of conspiracy, or concert, or joint action with the other members of the direction. These things are not only not in the action, but are excluded from it.

No. 19.

Nov. 22, 1872. Western Bank v. Baird's Trustees.

It may be said, not without force, that the duty undertaken by the directors of joint stock companies, such as the Western Bank, is subject to some qualifications which may not be always incident to offices of agency or trust. Such officials are generally chosen from their commercial position, their habits of business, and the amount of credit which their name will command. They are generally persons who have their time occupied by avocations of their own. When the shareholders elected William Baird as a director of the Western Bank they could not have expected him to make himself conversant with all the details of the management, or the items of all the accounts kept at the head-office and the numerous branches of so vast a concern. The ordinary conduct of the bank was placed in the hands of a professional manager, to whose integrity, as well as to whose skill, the directors were entitled in great measure to trust.

But, on the other hand, it is impossible for a Court of law to assume that such an appointment is a mere name. The duties which are prescribed by the contract must be performed by the directors. If these are not very specific, their scope and object at least are sufficiently intelligible, and if a director grossly neglects the discharge of them he must be liable in the consequences, as agents or trustees are who grossly neglect the interests of those for whose benefit they are appointed. Whatever the duties are, they must be discharged with fidelity and conscience, and with ordinary and reasonable care. It is not necessary that I should attempt to define where excusable remissness ends and gross negligence begins. That must depend to a large extent on the circumstances. It is enough to say that gross negligence in the performance of such a duty, the want of reasonable and ordinary fidelity and care, will infer liability for loss thereby occasioned.

The gross negligence alleged against William Baird in this record is set out in the 29th, 30th, and 31st articles of the condescendence. I need not read them, but their substance is this: The general ground of complaint is that William Baird, along with his co-directors, grossly neglected to superintend and control the manager in granting credit on open accounts. That is the general charge brought against them, and, as far as it goes, it is a charge not of action, but of inaction. There are, besides, two allegations of knowledge on the part of William Baird and his associates which are material. They are said, in the first place, to have known that the bank was in embarrassed circumstances owing to improper credit having been given by the manager; and, in the second place, to have known that the manager was in the habit of allowing advances on open account at his pleasure and without control. It is at the same time said that they were in culpable ignorance of what these advances were, and that they never at any time made the arrangements which the contract empowered them, and which it was their duty to make, to regulate the powers of the manager in this respect. The specific statement against William Baird personally is, that for two years he attended the meetings of the directors and the committees, but entirely failed to discharge his duty in superintending the manager, and that for the last four years he kept aloof from the bank altogether and did no duty whatever. Divested of much superfluity this is the substance of the allegations on record. It is admitted that in 1852 he ceased to be either a director or a shareholder.

I cannot say that these allegations are in themselves irrelevant. If William Baird knew that the bank was in embarrassed circumstances, owing to improper advances by the manager, and knew also that the manager systematically gave advances without control by the directors, and if he failed to take any steps to put matters upon a more safe or proper footing, he did grossly neglect his duty, whatever the result of that neglect may have been. In the same way, for the four years in which he did nothing, he certainly entirely neglected his duty; but whether that amounted to gross neglect, may depend upon the circumstances in which it took place.

A question was much agitated under the former action, as to whether it was necessary to the relevancy of the action that the neglect libelled should be joint with the other directors. I doubt if neglect can be accurately said to be joint, where it is not the consequence of previous concert. But in the question of s, as the consequence of negligence, it seems clear that no individual neglect the part of one director could have led to damage, unless all the other ectors had also neglected or at least failed to discharge their duty. It would refore be necessary for the pursuer to prove his averments that no director d fulfilled his duty before he can trace the loss, which he alleges as the ult, to the neglect of any one of them. If one director had performed his ty, according to the hypothesis of the action, no loss could have been sus-ned. In regard to that period during which William Baird absented himself m the direction it may be material whether he had reason to know or believe at the other directors neglected their duty. I read the averments on record regard to his knowledge as applying to the whole period.

But on these open accounts there still remains the question whether any case sufficiently alleged on record to infer that the advances in question were un-rranted on the part of the manager, who is said to have made them. On this tter the record is not satisfactory. It only specifies balances of account. It does not, as I conceive it ought to have done, take up each account individually, and explain wherein the unauthorised advances consisted, but only avers that the accounts in 1852 shew a certain balance which was unauthorised. In the former action similar statements in regard to the open accounts were considered so doubtful and unsatisfactory that the Court were not prepared to sustain them as relevant.

An attempt is made in the 26th article of the record to represent the per-mitting of overdrafts on open accounts, excepting in special circumstances, as of itself equivalent to granting cash credits without security, and so in violation of the contract, and contrary to the rules of sound banking. In regard to that matter I have only to refer to the opinion of Lord Cowan on that part of the statement in the former case in which he explained very clearly that overdrafts on open account, when kept within their legitimate limits, were among the most usual, as they were among the most profitable, branches of banking business. I concur in that opinion. But, on the other hand, advances on open account must be within the limits which the nature of the account, the position of the customer, and the amount of the advance indicate. An open account must not be made the vehicle of or the excuse for dead loans without security, nor can the advances on it with propriety go to an amount manifestly beyond the posi-tion of the customer or the objects of the account. I should have found great difficulty in dealing with these allegations had they come up for judgment with-out the accounts to which they relate. But these accounts have now been reported in extenso by the accountant. I have studied them attentively, and I am relieved of all difficulty on this head. In regard to the greater number of them they are prima facie consistent with the statement on the record. I by no means intend to prejudge questions which may arise when the facts have been ascertained, but I am of opinion that many of them disclose advances which are not legitimate on open account or under the contract, and that this appears on the very face of the accounts. If, under the colour of an advance on open account, continuous drafts are made without any payments to credit over a long period, or if the accounts are manipulated so as to conceal the true balance, or if large drafts are made in single sums without any counterpart, in such cases it will be difficult to maintain that these form legitimate operations merely because they appear in an open account. I forbear, however, to say more in the present state of the proceedings.

On the whole matter, therefore, on this branch of the claim, I am of opinion hat the record contains statements which ought to be sent to proof. In regard o the accounts which are to be the subject of this proof, they will embrace all hose which terminated at, or prior to, June 1852, although I do not intend the marks which I have made to be applicable to all of them, but see no sufficient ason to exempt any of them from the course which I propose. I think we ould also include one or two of the accounts which, although not absolutely rminated in June 1852, had no substantial operations on them after that date. The pursuers will have to consider whether it will not be incumbent on them prove their allegations in regard to each of these accounts, and not only to substantiate their averments of gross negligence, and the knowledge alleged o the part of the directors, but also to prove in each instance that the the advanc complained of were unwarranted, and that reasonable and ordinary care on th part of the directors would have prevented the loss which was sustained. An pleas in regard to the individual accounts which may be maintained by th defenders are of course in no degree prejudged.

The second branch, however, of these open accounts raises a different an more difficult question. These accounts were carried on to the failure of th bank, and the demand under the record, although apparently, as in the precedin claim, for a loss incurred when Mr Baird left the direction, is in reality for loss incurred, or at least ascertained, five years afterwards.

The record on this subject does not disclose the true nature of the facts, b we must read the accounts, as they stand in the books, as an essential part the statement of the pursuers, and from them, as appears from the appendix t the report of the accountant, we gather the facts which are truly alleged, an the relevancy of which we are to determine. Many of the customers whos balances in 1852 are in question remained ostensibly solvent until 1857. Thei accounts were carried on by the bank, and the balances entered in the books a good assets year by year. In almost every instance the credit given was in creased, and in some largely increased, and the debtors, for the most part, faile when the bank failed, many of them paying considerable sums. The clai which is now made is in each instance for the balance which was due in 185 diminished by a proportional amount of the ultimate recoveries, ascertained b applying the amount per pound of dividend, paid on the whole ultimate debt to reduce proportionally the balance of 1852.

It must, however, be evident that a result arrived at by such a process is, a a statement of a loss incurred in 1852, entirely imperfect. As far as it is a averment of fact it amounts to no more than this, that in the liquidation of th debtor's estate after the stoppage of the bank, the liquidator claimed for th whole debt then due, and recovered a sum which amounted to a certain pe centage of that debt. But this fact does not exclude, on the contrary is con sistent with, the entire solvency of the debtor, and the entire safety of the deb to the bank, in 1852. The record says that the debt for which the pursue sue "proved irrecoverable" to the extent specified. But the pursuers do not s that the debtor was insolvent, or that the debt was irrecoverable in 1852, offer to establish this by proof. All that is said is that these debtors we "unworthy of credit to the extent" sued for, an averment which falls far sho of saying that the amount was lost to the bank in 1852.

An instance or two will illustrate the anomalous position in which the reco stands in this respect. John Monteith owed in 1852 £8000. In 1857 we fin from the report that he owed £68,000. In 1852 Buchanan and Lockhart owe £18,000. In 1857 they owed £28,000. They paid £22,000, being more b £4000 than the whole debt due in 1852. John Moffat owed in 185 £247. In 1857 he owed £2337, or about ten times the amount of h debt in 1852. He paid £750, or three times the amount of his debt in 185 The balance due on the aggregate of these accounts exceeds that of 1852 b more than £100,000. Yet in these and the other instances the balance sued f is brought out by ascertaining the amount per pound which the debtor ult mately paid on the whole debt, and deducting that percentage from the balanc due in 1852.

All this is quite irrelevant as an allegation of a specific loss suffered in 185 if it be a necessary part of the case of the pursuers, as stated, that the debt wa irrecoverable in 1852. This radical defect in the allegation of loss, however, i more an objection to the structure of the record than to the substance of th claim itself. If it be otherwise well-founded the bank was entitled in 1857 t have claimed from William Baird the whole of the outstanding balance of 185 leaving him to recover what he could from the customer, whom they were no bound to discuss. William Baird's obligation was in no sense subsidiary, bu was original, arising from the misappropriation of the funds of the bank. I William Baird had in 1857 ranked for his relief on the estate of the insolven stomer he would no doubt have drawn exactly the dividend which is now dited by the bank,—and no more. But this, had it been the case plainly ted in this record, would have inevitably raised the important question ether the bank was entitled to delay their claim until then; and whether the urse of dealing with these customers during the interval had not excluded it. am of opinion that the bank, after taking over these accounts as good assets in 52, continuing to deal with the customers as solvent traders, and increasing eir credit, were not entitled, and the liquidator who represents the bank is not w entitled, to come back on William Baird with this demand. The claim, ch as it is, is one in which the bank is the creditor. The bank might have ade it in 1852. If the bank had not stopped it might have been made by the irectors in 1857. It is a claim of a kind which any bank, as a going concern, ight make against any former director on similar grounds. Its nature is in no spect altered by the insolvency or stoppage of the creditor. The liquidator ow represents, as the directors would then have represented, the bank,—entitled to sue on the same grounds, and of course liable to the same exceptions. William Baird, since 1852, has had no relation to the bank excepting that of a third party against whom the bank alleged a claim, and whatever he could have pleaded against the bank he can plead against the pursuer. The latter, indeed, represents the shareholders, but exactly in the same sense and to the same effect as that in which, while the bank was solvent, the directors represented them. Both must be held as representing the company, and only through the company, the shareholders; a claim which the bank, as a going concern, would be precluded from making could not acquire any vitality from the bank going into liquidation.

If, therefore, the bank in 1857 had brought this claim against William Baird I think it could not have been sustained. The directors stood in the position of being the agents or mandataries of the bank, for their own interest and that of the society, composed of shareholders, acting by the management provided by the contract. If an agent by gross negligence allows the money of his principal to be advanced to customers contrary to his instructions he will be liable for any loss thereby occasioned. But if the principal, whether he be an individual or a collective body acting through a management provided by contract, in full knowledge of the facts, take the agent's accounts off his hands, adopt the balances as legitimately incurred, and continue to trade with the customer, it is too late, when a crisis occurs, and the customer fails, to fall back on the agent. Things are no longer entire. The commercial position of the customer has been changed by the act of the principal, and it would be inequitable to require the agent to enter into the question whether the debt was, when his agency ceased, one which the debtor could have paid. The case would of course be different if the principal were in ignorance of, or without the means of knowing, the grounds of the claim. But that the bank, and those who acted for them, knew the grounds of this claim, is necessarily implied in the statement on which this action is maintained.

On this ground, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that this part of the case must fail, on the statement of it in the record, taking the accounts themselves as an essential part of it.

It has been pleaded for the defenders that these balances in 1852 have been paid up and extinguished by subsequent payments into the accounts, and that although the aggregate balance was never reduced all the entries to credit must be held as appropriated to the earliest balance, on the principle established in the well-known decisions in the cases of Clayton and Devaynes, and in the series of judgments by which they have been followed. If the views I have already expressed are well-founded I need not resolve this rather difficult question, and, indeed, its solution seems very much to depend on the same principle. As between these customers and the bank these balances have been innovated again and again. The balance on which the bank drew a dividend in 1857 was not composed to any extent of the balance of 1852, which, as between the debtors and creditors in many of the accounts, had unquestionably been paid. I can give no weight to the plea which was forcibly pressed on us that all these payments were appropriated to future drafts. I do not find that they were so t any extent, but, on the contrary, the form of the amount implies the reverse That a payment into the account is made by the customer in anticipation o future drafts is only what takes place in most merchants' bank accounts, an cannot of itself affect the appropriation which the form of the account in la implies.

The doubt which arises is, whether in this question with the delinquen director, who is no party to the account, the bank are now bound so to appl these payments. The nature of their demand involves a challenge of the for of the account, and the debit entries and balances in it. They maintain tha these advances were not legitimate transactions with the bank, and that the are now entitled to strike them out of the account, and throw them back on th director who made them. If they have not adopted the account, and are entitle to repudiate it, the principle of Devayne's case can have no application. If the have adopted, and are bound by it, no further question remains. But I reserv my opinion on this matter.

II. The Bills of Exchange.—The claim under this head is for the balance o five discount accounts as they stood in June 1852. The total of this balance, afte deducting the amount due in 1848, when Mr Baird became a director, is said t have been no less a sum than £292,000; and after crediting the amount of th alleged recoveries the sum now sued for is £151,000.

Had the accounts terminated in 1852 I should not have doubted that farthe investigation would have been necessary. The amount of the advances them selves raises a prima facie case of reckless dealing; and the averments regardin the position of the customers, and the general course of dealing between them and the bank, although not so precise as could be wished, are very strong, an would in my opinion have compelled us to send the case to proof. The accountan reports that the total discounts during the period in question amounted t £1,200,000. On the question of negligence the case does not quite rest on th same footing as that on which the open accounts stand, because it cannot be sai that advances by way of discount are prohibited by the bank contract; an therefore the propriety or impropriety of the advances to a large extent woul come to depend, in this part of the case, on the position of the customer and th amount of the advance. But looking to these accounts I should have had n hesitation at all in saying that they raised a prima facie case which woul have entitled the pursuers to go to proof upon it. But we have now a ver complete analysis from the accountant of the whole of these bill transaction down to the stoppage of the bank. The information thus given, along wit that disclosed on the record, raises important considerations.

It appears that these five firms continued, down to 1857, to deal with th bank as solvent customers. All the bills which were current in 1852 were re tired. The credit given to them by way of discount was enormously increased so that when the bank stopped the aggregate balance was £1,476,000, or nearl five times the amount due in 1852. I gather by deducting the outstanding de ficit stated on the record from the balance of 1857 that of this sum the liqui dator has recovered no less than £673,000—more than twice the amount du in 1852, although on the same principle as that followed on the open account only £141,000, or little more than a fifth part, is credited in reduction of th balance due in 1852.

The observations which I have already made on the principle followed i calculating the loss on the open accounts applies with still more force to thi branch of the claim. There is certainly no presumption that debtors who pai nearly £700,000 in 1857 could only have paid one-fifth of that sum in 1851 and indeed there is no allegation to that effect, or offer to prove it. The onl matter of fact on this head which can be held to be averred is the proportio which the debtors' assets in 1857 bore to the balance they then owed. The re is a mere arithmetical process,—which seems to me to be entirely fallacious, i the amount of loss in 1852 is to be measured by the debtors' capacity at the time to pay.

It is said on the record that although the bills which were taken by Willia

Baird and his associates for these advances were retired this was done by the subsequent directors renewing the bills from time to time without any fresh payment, and that this could not amount to repayment of the money or fresh advance. The accountant has given us in an appendix a very exhaustive analysis of all these bills, from which it appears that a considerable proportion are shewn from the books to have been renewed, but that a considerable proportion also were retired by payment, as far as the books indicate. He says "a latitude of eight days has been allowed on either side of the exact date when the bill or renewal became payable, that is, a bill due or at maturity on, say the 10th day of a month, is held to have been renewed in whole or in part by a bill with similar drawers, acceptors, and indorsers entered in the list of bills discounted to the respective firms within a period from the 2d to the 18th of the month." Beyond that period the bills are held not to be renewals. He reports that in both cases this list may be fallacious in detail, and that it would be necessary to examine the books of the firms in question to ascertain the fact with accuracy, but that with hardly an exception he has found evidence of the payment of all the bills contained in the list.

If our opinion depended on the principle thus assumed, or on the proportion of bills actually retired by payment, it might have been necessary to have investigated these matters farther, although, for myself, I should have been satisfied to adopt the views of the accountant as conclusive on both points. But my opinion on this part of the claim is founded on the more general principle which I have already explained. The bank, after William Baird ceased to be a director, have dealt with these customers, and trusted them to an enormous amount. In so far as the balance of 1852 was kept alive by renewals they have traded on it, and made profit by the discounts paid and charged on the renewed bills. But they have done much more. The balance of £340,000, which was outstanding in 1852, grew in five years to the sum of £1,400,000, and the bank must have got the benefit, such as it was, of the discounts on several millions of money, in the turning over of so large an amount; for the system disclosed in these transactions, hazardous as it was to the bank and ruinous to the customer, was one, while it lasted, attended by considerable profit. I can see no principle of justice on which, at the termination of such a period of speculation, during which the balance of 1852 became entirely absorbed and merged in operations of such magnitude, the bank can be permitted to revive this claim, after the position, the assets, and the liabilities of the customers had undergone changes so material.

Holding this opinion, I think we should give effect to it at this stage of the proceedings I see no ground for further inquiry, which could only put the parties to additional and very great expense without affecting the result. In regard to both these branches of the action I am of opinion, taking the accounts themselves as an essential part of the pursuers' case, that there is, first, no relevant specification of loss, as the result of the gross negligence libelled; and secondly and mainly, that the state of the accounts, and the course of dealing which it discloses, exclude the claims.

III. The Policies of Insurance.—My remarks on this head may be very short. The amount sued for consists of sums paid as premiums of insurance under policies opened by the bank on the lives of sundry debtors. This is a matter very different from those I have hitherto dealt with. These insurance transactions seem to have been practised by the bank from a very early period of its history, and the accountant has reported on them very fully. It appears that as far as they consisted in taking assignations from debtors to subsisting policies of insurance in security of debts on the whole they resulted in a considerable gain to the bank; but in so far as they were opened by the bank itself, without collateral security for payment of the premium, they seem to have resulted in a loss.

Opening such policies is certainly not ordinary banking business. But it is a different question whether there may not be circumstances in which the course might not be prudent and desirable. Your Lordships, on a former occasion, expressed yourselves much to that effect. I think the case on this branch resolves into an allegation of error in judgment, and rash or indiscreet administration, very similar to the illustrations put in some of the cases I have referred to. But as it appears that since the stoppage of the bank, the liquidator, without communication with William Baird, has sold these policies, I am of opinion that he has lost his recourse, even if otherwise it had been open to him.

I propose, therefore, that we should sustain the action as regards the open accounts which terminated in 1852, according to a schedule which I have prepared, to the effect of farther inquiry, and dismiss it quoad ultra. In regard to the mode of proof, I am very clear that this is a case in no respect fitted for a jury. Each of these accounts forms a separate subject of inquiry, and questions may arise under each of them as to the particulars to which I have referred, and as to the details of the accounting, which are specially within the province of a Court of law. I think in regard to that branch of the claim we should order a proof before answer.

LORD COWAN.—I need scarcely say that this case, in all its bearings, has been the subject of deliberate consideration by all the members of the Court. After the able and elaborate argument at the close of last session, the record and voluminous papers, including the accountant's report and relative appendices, to the effect of which that argument was directed, have been carefully and anxiously gone over by myself, as I believe they have by all your Lordships. The views that suggested themselves to us severally, have, both verbally and in written notes or memoranda, been made the subject of repeated consultation. It was satisfactory to me to find that the results at which I have arrived, and which I was prepared to have explained fully in a separate opinion, were in accordance with those at which your Lordship had arrived, and which you have embodied in the elaborate opinion now delivered. That opinion I have had the opportunity of considering; and as, in its main features, and to all substantial effects, it gives full expression to the grounds of judgment on which I consider our decision ought to proceed, it is as unnecessary, as it would be to waste the time of the Court, to do more than to state my entire concurrence with it in all essential respects.

This course I am the more inclined to follow on the present occasion because of having at former advisings, not under this record only and in this action, but in the action against the present defender and his brother James Baird, which did not issue in any judgment—fully stated the legal principles which appeared to me applicable to some of the leading questions which lie at the base of the defenders' liability, and to which and other questions your Lordship has adverted at the outset of your opinion. From the views then stated, and those explained by the then Lord Justice-Clerk (the present Lord President), in delivering the opinion of the Court, and which views, I observe, were founded on at the bar, and referred to, if not adopted by the Lord Chancellor in the case of Turquand, January and February 1869 (4 Chancery Appeals, 376, Law Reports), I have seen, on reconsideration, no reason in any respect to depart. To them, as the case now stands, I consider that we are now giving practical effect, except in so far as the report of the accountant enables us in certain important matters, and to a large extent, to dispose of the claims made in the action on the special grounds which you have fully explained. I may, however, say that I entirely reserve my opinion with regard to the application of the principle which ruled the case of Devanyes and Others. From the grounds of judgment which we are prepared to adopt it is unnecessary to enter on this branch of the argument, or to say whether its application is or is not attended with doubt or difficulty.

I am of opinion that judgment ought to be pronounced to the effect and in the manner suggested by your Lordship.

LORD BENHOLME.—The very able and elaborate opinion with which your Lordship has favoured us has been the subject of repeated and most anxious consideration by us all, and I do not think I can add anything to it, especially as your Lordship was kind enough to allow us to state the points on which we ad any doubt or difference, and shewed yourself very ready and able to put an ad to these doubts. I concur in the judgment.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur in the judgment proposed to be pronounced, and ave very little to add, because your Lordship has gone over the grounds on hich it is founded; but there are one or two remarks which I should like to ake in reference to some special views which were urged upon us. This is a laim against Mr William Baird upon a personal ground of liability, which may e described as arising quasi ex delicto, and therefore I think that he is not a correus debendi, and that the views which might prevail with reference to the ase of a cautioner do not afford him any protection. He became a personal debtor in consequence of his alleged negligence, but he can only be liable if loss has resulted, for it is loss alone that makes him liable, and the loss is explained in this record not as a general claim of damage or reparation to be assessed by a jury, but special amounts of debt incurred by improper advances, just in the same way as is common in cases of this kind where a man of business is made liable for a special debt lost by his negligence, either through a bad security, or from not using proper diligence. There might have been a claim possibly for general damage, but that is not the claim made here. It is a claim for pounds, shillings, and pence, arising upon an arithmetical calculation, and it is a claim of debt which is alleged to bear interest,—which is not of the nature of general damage. That being the case, the question is whether any of that loss has been wiped away by what has taken place since Mr W. Baird's directorate ceased. Those matters which were then open, and as to which no ulterior transactions took place, your Lordship has proposed to be admitted to proof, and in that I fully concur, but the others are excluded. I think it cannot be doubted that the debt, as regards the current open accounts, and the discounted bills as they stood in 1852, have to all appearance, at least, been extinguished and obliterated by the large transactions which took place with the same debtors in the subsequent years, and the only way of attempting to get rid of that is by saying that these debtors did not pay anything in reality, but only gave pieces of paper which were of no value, and were not payment in extinction of the debt due. But the true state of matters is manifest by the enormous amount to which the old debt was increased in the course of the following five years. Now, is it possible for the bank, as a corporation, having taken up these debtors and dealt with them in that way, turning over new bills, making advances, and making profit upon discounts (for that is a very profitable business if it is well conducted), to come back at this distance of time upon Mr W. Baird for the original bills which have been over and over again sopited and extinguished, not by anything like express renewals, nor on the footing of renewals, but in the course of an extensive discount business carried on by the directors systematically upon the credit of these other parties. That is out of the question so far as the bank is concerned, and it is the same thing as if the bank itself had brought this claim. The only ground on which that was sought to be got over was this, that during these five years the shareholders knew nothing about this, because they were excluded from seeing anything that took place. They pocket the dividends arising from this great source of profit, but they say they are not answerable although they carried on this business, because the subsequent directors also kept them in the dark, and they knew nothing about it. I think that cannot be listened to here, because the creditor of Mr William Baird seems to be the bank as a corporation, and it cannot be held that the bank as a company could be ignorant of its own affairs. It had its own administration and organisation, and by that means it knew as a company what was going on, or must be held to have done so. As to the individual shareholders, we should need a very different record from this to enable us to take their case into consideration. Who are the shareholders that were kept in ignorance? Were they shareholders during Mr William Baird's time? We know nothing about it. Were they shareholders even during these five years? We know nothing about that either. It is not at all unlikely that a number of shareholders, who were the original constituents of Mr William Baird, feathered their nests pretty well while things were going on in a flourishing way, and that those who now suffer are those that came in at the end of the day. But that is not the question which we are dealing with here, and is not the ground of liability that here arises. The claim is by the company as represented by the liquidator, and the ignorance of the individual shareholders is nothing to the purpose in that respect. If they have been betrayed by their subsequent directors they may have their remedy against them, but I do not think it is possible to hold that they are not responsible for the company, as a company entitled to carry on its own affairs, and having the means of doing so, and deliberately going into transactions calculated to be very profitable with the very persons to whom it is said they were advancing improperly. We have here a taking up and homologation of prior proceedings; and in a question of their liability it is quite a sufficient answer to shew that any apparent loss that might have arisen in 1852 was wiped out by the entire substitution of different liabilities in 1857; and, consequently, that the liability of Mr William Baird has ceased.

No. 19.

Nov. 22, 1872. Western Bank v. Baird's Trustees.

With regard to the form of the interlocutor the defenders argued;—The defenders are entitled to absolvitor. This is not a mere discussion on relevancy; the facts as appearing from the accountant's report disclose that no claim exists. A claim may have existed but it has been extinguished.

The pursuers argued;—The defenders are only entitled to have the action dismissed. The action has been disposed of on the relevancy of the pursuers' statements, and where that is so the uniform practice is dismissal. The books have been part and parcel of the pursuers' statements and must be held to be incorporated with them.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think we are not here deciding the proper merits of this case. We are deciding that the action as stated is not relevant, as being excluded by the facts which appear on the face of it. Therefore I think we should dismiss the action. In regard to the expenses, I think it is premature to come to any decision whatever. The points that have been decided on the one side and the other are very various. The success upon them has been varying also; but before we know whether the pursuers are to prevail in any part of the case it is premature to consider the question of expenses. The accountant's report will be exceedingly important when the case goes to proof. There are many matters to which I have not alluded brought up in the documents appended to the report which must be of considerable moment. Into these matters it is unnecessary to go now; but I think it would be premature to deal with the question of expenses at this stage.

The other Judges concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced on 15th November 1872:—"Repel the 3d and 4th pleas in law stated for the defenders, so far as founded on the alleged disqualification of the defender William Baird to be elected or to continue to be a director of the Western Bank: Repel also the 5th plea stated for the defenders: Before answer, in regard to so much of the action as relates to the accounts of the parties named in the schedule appended to this interlocutor, allow both parties a proof of their respective averments relative thereto: Appoint the proof to be taken by Lord Cowan at such time and place as he may fix Quoad ultra dismiss the action, and decern; and reserve all questions of expenses."

Dennistoun v. Thomson.

ALEXANDER DENNISTOUN, Pursuer.—Lord-Adv. Young—Watson—Campbell.
JAMES THOMSON, Defender.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Asher.

Property—Implied Contract—Conterminous Proprietors.—A, the proprietor of building ground in a burgh held in burgage, disponed in burgage to B, a purchaser, two adjacent lots, No. 3 and No. 4. Lot No. 3 was described as bounded on the north by "the central line of R Street" (an unformed street), "to measure 60 feet in breadth from building line to building line," and lot No. 4 as bounded on the north by other ground belonging to the seller, "on a line coinciding in range with the central line of R Street."

The disposition contained an express obligation on the purchaser as to the completion of the new streets which formed the east and west boundaries of lot 3, but no obligation was expressed with reference to R Street.

Some years after, A and B entered into an agreement that they should mutually furnish ground for the formation of R Street eastwards along the northern boundary of lot 4, as delineated in a plan which shewed R Street extending along the northern boundary of lot 3; the purchaser subsequently acquired from the seller two additional lots of ground bounded by R Street, one on the east and the other on the west of lot 3, by a disposition which declared that both parties should have right to the whole new streets therein mentioned bounding the subjects disponed.

Held, in a question between persons who represented A and B, that B's representative was under an implied obligation to leave space for the formation of R Street on lot 3.

Free St Mark's v. Taylor's Trustees, Jan. 26, 1869, ante, vol. vii. 415, commented on.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Gifford. M.

THIS action, raised by Alexander Dennistoun of Golfhill, concluded for declarator that James Thomson, proprietor of certain portions of the lands of Annfield, Bellfield, and Slatefield, lying between Duke Street and Gallowgate, Glasgow, was bound under his titles (1) to open up and form on the said lands certain streets, Sword Street and an unnamed street, and to open up and form a street to be called Reid or Reidvale Street, intersecting Annfield Street, Sword Street, and the unnamed street, in a line delineated on a plan, and that to the full width of 60 feet, so far as said street was wholly situated on defender's lands (lot No. 4 and other lots), and to the extent of half the width, so far as it formed the boundary thereof (i. e. of lot No. 3). There were also conclusions with regard to the causewaying said streets, the removal of obstructions, &c. The lands were held in burgage.

It is unnecessary to refer to Sword Street and the unnamed street. By a disposition dated in February and March 1854 the Western Bank of Scotland (the pursuer's author), with consent of Reid's Trustees, disponed to John Thomson, potter in Glasgow, the defender's father, two plots of the lands of Annfield, Bellfield, and Slatefield, viz.—

(1) Lot No. 3, containing 17,234 square yards, bounded on the east partly by the central line of Sword Street, to measure 50 feet in breadth from building line to building line; . . . . . on the north by the central line of Reid Street, to measure 60 feet in breadth from building line to building line, along which it extends 255 feet, or thereby; on the west by the central line of Annfield Street, to measure 60 feet in breadth from building line to building line. . . . . .

(2) Lot 4, containing 4060 square yards, bounded on the north by other ground belonging to the said trustees, along which it extends 255 feet 6 inches or thereby, on a line coinciding in range with the central line of Reid Street; on the east, ... on the south, ... and on the west by the central line of Sword Street.

v. Thomson.

The disposition further bore,—"But these presents are granted, and the subjects hereby disponed are conveyed to the said John Thomson and his foresaids, with and under the following further restrictions, privileges, and obligations, viz.—. . . . . that the said John Thomson and his foresaids shall be bound, jointly with us or our successors, or the trustees of the said John Reid, to open up and form the street to be called Annfield Street, to the extent of 60 yards from Gallowgate Street, by the term of Martinmas 1854, and to open up and form the whole of the said street fronting the said ground hereby disponed northwards within the space of five years from 19th May 1852; that the said John Thomson and his foresaids shall be bound, within five years from the term of Martinmas 1852, in the event of us or our foresaids, or the trustees of the said deceased John Reid, also agreeing to do so, or sooner if found to be of advantage to us or our foresaids, or the said trustees and him, to open up the said street called Sword Street northwards so far as it fronts the said ground hereby conveyed; that the said John Thomson and his foresaid shall be bound, when they come to erect buildings, &c. . . . . which said conditions, provisions, restrictions, and obligations hereinbefore inserted are hereby declared to be real liens and burdens affecting the subjects herein before conveyed, and as such shall be inserted in the instrument of sasine to follow hereon, and in all the future transmissions and investitures of the said subjects, otherwise the same, and all following thereon, shall be null and void."

In April 1860 the Western Bank and its liquidators entered into a agreement with the said John Thomson, the defender's father, which bore—"Whereas the said first parties (the Western Bank) have got prepared by Mr Thomas Kyle, land-surveyor in Glasgow, and have exhibited to the said second party (John Thomson), a plan of the lands of Annfield and Bellfield, belonging to them, and of lands adjoining now belonging to the said second party and others, situated, &c. . . . . and whereas, in the formation of Reid Street, as delineated on said plan, eastward from the central line of Sword Street, also delineated thereon, so far as said portion of Reid Street extends along property" (lot 4) "belonging to the said second party, there will be embraced within the south half of said Reid Street an angular portion of ground belonging to the said second party, and also an angular portion of ground belonging to the said first parties, which said portions of street," &c. The deed then set forth that the parties had agreed to give up for the formation of Reid Street along the northern boundary of No. 4 the pieces of ground required from their respective properties without any price being paid by the one to the other. The plan referred to shewed Reid Street running from street further west, eastward along the northern boundary of lot 3, crossing Sword Street, and continuing eastward over lot 4.

By disposition dated in December 1860 the Western Bank disponed the said John Thomson the other lots of ground, one to the east and the other to the west of lot 3, which were described as bounded by the centre line of Reid Street. The deed bore to be granted "under the declaration" "that the said John Thomson and his foresaids shall have the full right and privilege of the several streets before mentioned, bounding the several subjects hereinbefore disponed, and which several streets, of the width and extents foresaid, shall be left open and unbuilt upon, and be public for the use and behoof of us and our said disponee respectively, and all others having right thereto in all time coming."

This declaration was declared to be a real burden, and appointed to be inserted in all future conveyances.

In 1864 Alexander Dennistoun, the pursuer, purchased from the Western Bank, with consent of the trustees of the late John Reid of Whitehill, other parts of the lands of Annfield, Bellfield, and Slatefield, in all about 74,000 square yards, subject to all the obligations of the bank with respect to the lands.

In November 1870 Mr Dennistoun raised the present action for the purpose of having Reid Street or Reed Street and other streets formed.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defender and his predecessor having failed to implement the obligations incumbent upon them, in regard to the opening up and formation of said streets, the pursuers are entitled to have decree ordaining the defender to implement the same, as concluded for.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The action cannot be maintained, in respect that the writs libelled do not contain any obligation applicable to the streets in question.

A proof was led, and the Lord Ordinary afterwards pronounced this interlocutor:—"Tertio, Finds and declares that the defender, under and in virtue of the writs and title-deeds of his property mentioned on record, is bound and obliged to open up, form, causeway, &c., a portion of the street or line of street called or to be called Reid Street or Reidvale Street, said portion being wholly upon the lands of the defender, &c.: Quarto, Finds and declares that the defender, under and in virtue of the writs and title-deeds of his property mentioned on record, is bound and obliged to open up, and leave open, unoccupied, and unenclosed, certain portions of the street or line of street called or to be called Reid Street or Reidvale Street, leading from Bellgrove Street eastward, and that in addition to the portion of street referred to in the third or preceding finding, and that in so far as the said street or line of street to be called Reid Street or Reidvale Street is upon the lands of the said defender, that is, to the extent of 30 feet in width, being half the width of the said street, and that in the line shewn and delineated upon the said plan, No. 7 of process; and to the extent and effect mentioned in the preceding declaratory findings, finds and declares in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the original and of the supplementary summons: But finds that the defender is not under his titles bound to form or to causeway any portion of the said streets, excepting that portion of Reid Street or Reidvale Street mentioned in the third finding above written: Farther, decerns and ordains the defender to open up, and leave open, unoccupied, and unenclosed, and also to form, causeway, and pave the various streets or portions of streets mentioned respectively in the preceding findings, and that in terms of the said findings in all respects, and also to make and form the common sewer in manner mentioned in the third finding above written, and ordains him instantly to remove all palings or obstructions of every kind at present existing on any portion of the site of the said streets, and decerns."*

* "NOTE.—This is a very important case, both in reference to the interests of the parties to the litigation, and in reference to the rights and obligations which arise when lands are given off to be built upon, and described as bounded by intended or projected streets.

"The Lord Ordinary was favoured with an able and instructive argument as to how far building stipulations or feuing plans are binding upon singular successors, and in what circumstances feuing plans or conditions of feu, or the formation of streets, are made and constituted real burdens upon property, or binding upon singular successors.

"In the view which the Lord Ordinary takes of the present case, however, it is unnecessary to consider the interesting and difficult questions regarding real burdens or obligations laid upon singular successors, for he is of opinion that none of the parties to the present action can be regarded as singular successors, but that the question arises between the pursuer, Mr Dennistoun, and those holding through him on the one hand, and the defender on the other, just as it would have arisen between the Western Bank, from whom Mr Dennistoun derives right, and Mr John Thomson, the defender's father, who was the original contracting party with the Western Bank. The defender, it is admitted, represents his father, to whom he has succeeded under certain family settlements and arrangements, and the Lord Ordinary holds that the pursuer, Mr Dennistoun, is, so far as the lands are concerned, under all the obligations which the Western Bank undertook to Mr Thomson; for although Mr Dennistoun is a purchaser from the Western Bank, and in one sense a singular successor to them, yet the conveyance in his favour is expressly granted 'without prejudice to all obligations upon us or our predecessors contained in conveyances granted by us or them of portions of the said lands of Bellfield and Annfield.' It is also granted without prejudice to obligations in reference to Sword Street contained in an instrument of sasine in favour of John Reid, dated and registered 26th December 1838, and it contains various stipulations intended for the benefit of Thomson as to buildings to be erected by Mr Dennistoun. In reality, therefore, Mr Dennistoun comes exactly in the place of the Western Bank, and is subject to all pleas and exemptions which would have been competent against the bank. Even if this had not been so, however, still, as the defender represents his father, and as Mr Dennistoun is undoubtedly vested in the whole rights of the Western Bank, it is thought Mr Dennistoun could enforce all the personal obligations which John Thomson undertook to the bank and their successors. It would not be in the defender's mouth to plead that, although he was well and firmly bound to the bank, he is not bound to the bank's disponee, to whom the bank has made over all its rights.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks, therefore, that the present questions are really questions of contract between two contracting parties, and that the case is not embarrassed by the niceties attending the constitution of real burdens. The true question simply is, what was the contract,—what did the parties undertake to do or to abstain from doing in reference to their respective properties?

"Even if the question had been with singular successors, however, the Lord Ordinary thinks that to some extent servitudes of road have been validly created, for he is disposed to think that if a street of a particular width is stipulated for that implies a roadway or a servitude of road of the specified width, and as road is one of the known servitudes it may be constituted by grant without entering the records. In point of fact, however, the roads or streets mentioned in the title do enter the records, and are specially mentioned as real burdens in all the infeftments.

"Viewing the questions as narrowed, therefore, to pure questions of contract, the Lord Ordinary will shortly explain the grounds upon which he has reached the conclusions expressed in the preceding interlocutor.

"The conclusions of the summons relate to three streets, all of which are at present begun, partially opened and partially laid out. The three streets are—(1) Sword Street, or rather the upper or northern portion of Sword Street, extending from Duke Street to the line of Reid Street or Reidvale Street; (2) Reid Street or Reidvale, extending from Bellgrove Street on the west, eastward till it enters what is wholly the pursuer's land; and (3) an unnamed street running parallel, or nearly parallel, with Sword Street, and being the next street eastward from Sword Street, and extending from Duke Street to Reidvale Street. This street is at present only open at its northern end, and there it seems to be called Bellfield Place.

"As the defender's position in reference to these three streets, or the portions thereof which bound or intersect his property, is or may be different, it may be convenient to take them separately, and to see what obligations the defender, or rather his father, John Thomson, has undertaken in reference to each of them.

e the obligation. A mere description by a bounding line called a et involves no obligation not to build up to the bounding line.[1] A plan

'(3) The portion of Reidvale Street interjected between the line of Sword eet and the unnamed street,"—(i.e., along lot 4).

"This piece of street stands in a different position from the others. It is olly upon the ground of the defender, and the title-deeds contain special ulations in regard to it.

"It appears that the projected line of Reid or Reidvale Street required for its mation, at the portion in question, a small triangle of ground wholly belonging to the bank, a similar triangle of ground belonging to John Thomson, and a ipe of ground belonging to the bank. Having in view their mutual rights d interests, all parties entered into a minute of agreement, dated in April 860, whereby the bank on the one hand, and Thomson on the other, agreed nditionally to contribute their respective triangles of ground for the formation f Reid Street. The condition was in the event of the bank selling out their nds agreeably to Kyle's feuing-plan. Nine months afterwards the bank did ll out its lands to Thomson himself, agreeably to Kyle's feuing-plan. This is lear upon the proof, and upon the comparison of Kyle's original feuing-plan ith the partial plan signed relative to the agreement and disposition. Therepon the agreement of April 1860 was carried out and embodied in the disposion of December 1860, and the deed contains special obligations in reference to he bit of Reid Street now under consideration.

"By the deed of December 1860, then, the bank's triangle, as well as various ther bits of ground, are conveyed out and out to John Thomson. It is the econd subject conveyed, containing 403⅝ square yards; and then follows the pecial declaration and obligation, 'Declaring always, as it is hereby specially rovided and declared, that the said proposed street, to be called Reid Street, hall be formed along the subjects belonging to the said John Thomson, as hown upon the foresaid plan or sketch signed as relative hereto, and the same hall be to that extent of the breadth of 60 feet, including the foot pavement on ach side; that the north half of the said street to the extent foresaid shall be ormed from the compartment of ground above conveyed in the first place, hile the south half thereof shall be formed of the triangular piece of ground bove conveyed in the second place, and of a triangular portion of the foreaid lands belonging to the said John Thomson: And declaring farther, that he said John Thomson and his foresaids shall be bound and obliged, at their wn expense, to form and causeway the said street, and to pave the same, and lso to form, make, and maintain a common sewer in said street, so far as exending along the subjects before conveyed.'

"Now, the Lord Ordinary does not see any grounds on which the late John homson or the defender as representing him can decline fulfilling this express bligation. It is quite explicit. The deed and the signed plan make it quite nambiguous, and the whole expense is carefully laid upon Mr Thomson. The ank had a most vital interest in making and enforcing such an obligation, for ey retained as their own property the four large and important building lots blocks of streets lying to the west of the portion of Reid Street now in quesn. This whole ground, extending to upwards of six acres, now belongs to the nsuer, and if this bit of Reid Street is not to be formed, he will be entirely t from Reid Street altogether, and have no access to the Gallowgate except und by Duke Street. Both right and interest, therefore, are clear and paramount, d the Lord Ordinary thinks that the defender is bound to specific implement.

"It was just to secure the peculiar interest which the bank retained, and ich now belongs to the pursuer, that this portion of Reid Street is made ferent from all the rest, for the expense of formation, causewaying, and paving expressly laid upon Mr Thomson and his foresaids. All is to be done at 'their n expense.'

"At the sametime, making all the streets open as real liens and burdens applies to this piece of Reid Street as well as to the rest. The obligation to form and causeway is a superadded obligation, superadded for good and obvious reasons.

"In reference to this portion of Reid Street, therefore, the pursuer has been entirely successful, and the Lord Ordinary has given him decree as concluded for.

"(4) The remaining portions of Reid Street, so far as fronting the defender's property,"—(i.e., lot 3).

"The obligations as to these portions of Reid Street depend partly on the disposition of 1854, partly on the disposition of 1858, and partly on the disposition of 1860, already so fully referred to. Strong arguments are also derived from the earlier titles, and particularly from the sasines in favour of Reid and his trustees, which are made binding on the defender.

"It is unnecessary to go over the ground again. The Lord Ordinary thinks that under his own titles the defender is bound to leave half of Reid Street or Reidvale Street, so far as it is opposite his property, open and unenclosed. But here again the pursuer's conclusions are too broad, for the Lord Ordinary cannot discover any obligation on Thomson binding him to form or causeway. In short excepting only the little bit of Reid Street above dealt with, and which is in an exceptional and peculiar position, Thomson's obligations are really those of the owner of a servient tenement—they consist patiendo non faciendo.

"It only remains to notice one or two points on which the defender specially relied.

"He maintained that none of the plans were made parts of the title, but that any reference to them was merely for description. This is not so. The plan, No. 109, is expressly made part of and signed as relative to the disposition of 1860, and it goes a long way in the pursuer's favour. It may be true that Kyle's original and general feuing plan is not made part of the title, for it embraces subjects belonging to third parties who never consented thereto, but portions of it seem to be made conditions of the grants when particular streets are made mutual between adjoining feuing blocks. It is also to be kept in view, as favouring the pursuer's argument, that the whole ground is building ground, which can only be utilised by being laid out in streets and covered with buildings. It is just in reference to such land that such mutual obligations and contracts might be expected.

"The defender urged that as the whole ground was burgage there could be no tie or connection between the lots, as there is when the whole are held of a common superior. This is true, but there is no incompetency in the owner of burgage lots selling them out and imposing obligations on the purchaser, either in favour of himself or in favour of his successors; and these obligations, if aptly expressed, as they seem to be in the present case, will be enforced.

"The defender urged that, under a portion of his half of Reid Street, there was clay, said to be very valuable, which he wished to work out before opening up Reid Street. If it were a mere question of a few months, or even a year or two, there might be some reason in this, but when it is considered that, as to one part of Reid Street, the defender and his father have been under obligation to open it for twenty years, and as to the remainder for twelve years, the defender can hardly say that the pursuer is precipitate in enforcing it. Even yet, if a specific motion had been made for a few months' delay the pursuer intimated willingness to consent, the natural level of the ground being made up again. A very few weeks or months would work out all the clay under half the street. But the defender has not yet begun to work it. The clay will not serve as an indefinite suspension of his obligation.

"Lastly, the defender contended that the City of Glasgow Union Railway having been constructed through a portion of the lands embraced in Mr Kyle's old general feuing plan, the whole feuing plan and the whole obligations in any of the titles at once flew off and came to an end. This is far too violent a proposition. The railway only went through a part of the ground, and although at ntification. If the defender is merely subject to a servitude, he is not und to do anything. If there is an implied obligation to make a street e pursuer is not entitled to enforce that agreement.[1]

The pursuer argued;—Each party was entitled to enforce the similar urdens laid upon both by their common author. While a description of nds as bounded by the centre of an intended street does not imply an bligation to make that street, such an obligation was here involved in he terms of the various deeds.

At advising,—

Lord Ardmillan.—There is no doubt that, in point of fact, the defender's roperty is bounded in one part by Sword Street, and in another part by the treet known as the unnamed street; and I do not think that the defender's obligation to open up and keep open Sword Street and the said unnamed street can e successfully disputed. In regard to Sword Street, indeed, I understood that o argument against the obligation was maintained by the defender's counsel. n regard to the unnamed street along the eastern line of the defender's property, arked No. 7 on the plan, I do not think there can be any doubt. The same ule must apply.

It is to be observed that both parties derive the rights from a common author, nd that the formation of streets, involving, of course, the erection of houses ith access thereto, was contemplated from the first as the leading object for hich the creation and distribution of feus was effected. This is, in my view, an nportant consideration. In judging of prædial, and particularly of urban servitudes and obligations, it is necessary to consider the object for the promotion f which the laying out of the ground and the arrangement of the feus was undertaken. I retain the opinion which, concurring particularly with Lord Deas, have more than once expressed, to the effect that restrictions on the use of roperty cannot be easily implied, nor enforced without clear and strong reasons, or without a legitimate interest to sustain the plea for restriction. But in such case as the present, where the formation of streets and the furnishing of access o houses was the leading object of the feuing arrangements, the interest to enforce an obligation to give access by opening a street is obvious, and the obligation to open the street in conformity with the intention and understanding of hat part the general feuing plan was interfered with, it is impossible to maintain that in other portions of the ground the feuing plan cannot be carried out. he railway does not interfere with those portions of street embraced in the conclusions of the present action. These streets when completed will be substantially the same as originally intended, the only alteration being a slight deviation f Reid Street wholly on the pursuer's ground. The portions of street now rdered to be opened up are not altered one inch by the railway, and the only rejudice which the defender can allege from the railway is, that for a small pace along Reid Street his breadth for building is something narrowed. But he defender has received compensation from the railway company for this injury, nd it would be most unjust if, in addition to the compensation which he has covered, he were to be released from his whole obligations to the pursuer.

"The pursuer's conclusion for damages was not seriously insisted in. It rather pears that no substantial damage has been sustained, the prices of building ound having greatly risen. But even were it otherwise the question of right s a fair question to try, and the pursuer has failed, excepting to a small tent, to fasten upon the defender any obligation to form or to causeway the eets.

"The Lord Ordinary has modified the pursuer's expenses, because he has been uccessful in his attempt to compel the defender to form and to causeway, and s formed throughout an important part of the pursuer's demand."

parties is supported by the reasonable and equitable considerations which cannot be overlooked in such a matter. A right of access or of road is of the nature of a servitude known and understood, and an obligation to give such a right of access or road is, under the circumstances of this case, natural and appropriate. Both parties—disponer and disponee—are bound to secure access by opening and keeping open the streets. It may be called a conventional servitude. It is a mutual obligation for the protection of the rights and interests of both parties, and it is such an obligation as might be reasonably and naturally expected. The case is thus quite different from the case of restriction on the use and enjoyment of property, as, for instance, preventing the building of a porch, the building in a back-green, or the raising the height of a house.

Now, in the two instances to which I have adverted, viz. the opening up of Sword Street and of the unnamed street, I think it clear that there is a right in the pursuer to enforce the obligation, and a sufficient interest to sustain his demand, and a distinct obligation on the defender to open up and leave open these two streets.

On this point I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I have nothing to add. In so far as the Lord Ordinary has found and declared that the defender is bound to open up and leave open these two streets to the extent specified in the interlocutor I am for adhering to his judgment.

I also agree with the Lord Ordinary that the defender is bound by the agreement, dated in April 1860, between the Western Bank and Reid's trustees on the one hand, and the defender's father Mr John Thomson, whom the defender represents, on the other hand. By that agreement Mr Thomson (and now the defender) entered into specific obligations in regard to the portion of ground situated between the letter C on the plan and the east margin of No. 7, where it unites with No. 9 on the plan, otherwise described as "eastward from the central line of Sword Street delineated thereon." Along that portion of ground the two parties, viz. the Western Bank and Reid's trustees on the one hand, and Mr Thomson on the other hand, mutually agree and oblige themselves that Reid Street shall be formed along the subjects (lot No. 4) belonging to Mr Thomson to the breadth of 60 feet; that the north half shall be formed from lands belonging to the first party, and the south half formed of the angular portions of ground belonging to the two parties respectively. It is also by that agreement provided that each party shall be at one-half of the expence of forming and causeweying the said street, and paving the same to the extent foresaid. I have no doubt that the defender is bound by these obligations, and I think that the Lord Ordinary has justly recognised and rightly enforced them.

The remaining question relates to the obligation of the defender to open up, and leave open, the line of street called or to be called Reid Street or Reidvale Street, leading from Bellgrove Street eastward to the central line of Sword Street (i.e., where it formed the northern boundary of lot 3), near the point C, which I have already mentioned.

This is really the only question of difficulty now before us. After what has been already stated I shall not occupy your time by explaining the grounds on which I have arrived at the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary. It is, on the one hand, true that we have here no question between superior and vassal. It is also true that we have here no question with a singular successor. The defender represents the party originally bound by the obligations which the pursuer seeks to enforce; and the pursuer, to whom the whole remaining space was conveyed, is in the right and interest to enforce the obligation.

If the disposition in favour of Mr Thomson in 1854 had stood alone, and we had no aid from other deeds in its construction, I should have felt some difficulty in distinguishing this case from the case of the Trustees of Free St Mark's Church v. Taylor, 26th January 1869; although the two cases are, in regard to the exact terms of the titles, and particularly the manner in which, and the purpose for which, the plan is referred to, not in precisely the same condition. But I do not pause to explain that distinction, for I do not think that justice is done to the defender's case by confining our attention to the words of the title in 1854. It is certain that even in that title the boundary of the defender's proated to be on the east by "the central line of Sword Street;" on the 'the central line of Reid Street;" and on the west by "the central nfield Street." These streets are all named—named in the title, and the plans of the day. Whether formed or not, they were all, within edge and intention of the parties, real and existing lines of street quite stood, and the ground is stated to be delineated on a plan made out s Kyle, land-surveyor, and signed by Reid's trustees as relative to the a. Accordingly we have the plan. It is not a general feuing plan, plan with elevations, but being intended as relative to this disposi- a plan in which the "central line of Reid Street" is specially de- It appears to me that the main object of referring to that plan, and it by reference into the title, was to explain and fix down, as the of the subject conveyed, the central line of Reid Street.

sposed to think that when the central line of a street is the boundary wo properties each proprietor owns the one-half of the street, but both s have a common interest in the street, in so far as necessary to secure , and to advance the objects, contemplated in the feuing arrangements. ing of a street, and the giving of access by a street, along the line id described as Reid Street, was the intention and purpose of the this deed, well known and understood to be so; and I think that y had a right to claim that access, and to enforce the opening up of t.

I have already said, I do not confine my attention to the title of 1854. at the agreement in April 1860 supplies additional confirmation of which I have taken of that title of 1854. It is impossible to read the t of 1860 without perceiving that the existence of Reid Street in the eated on the plan there referred to (not the same plan, but exhibiting line of street) was taken for granted, and that the formation of Reid m the western extremity of it up to the central line of Sword Street, ned and agreed on, inasmuch as the further extension of Reid Street was provided for by mutual arrangement. Accordingly I read the t of 1860 as aiding my construction of the title of 1854.

ve have the disposition by the Western Bank and Reid's trustees to Thomson in December 1860. By this disposition an additional piece was conveyed to Mr Thomson, and the minute of agreement of April pecially referred to. Mr Kyle's plan is mentioned as delineating the e proposed streets, and the agreement is stated to be "for the forma- eid Street, as delineated on said plan, eastward from the central line of reet." After narrating this agreement a large piece of ground—as I . 7 on the plan—is conveyed to Mr Thomson under reference to a plan yle, and the boundaries are given, one of which is, "on the west by al line of Sword Street, measuring 50 feet in breadth;" on the east central line of a proposed street, to measure 50 feet in breadth," that is known as the unnamed street; and "on the south by the central line osed street to be called Reid Street, to measure 60 feet in breadth." t portion of street bounding No. 7 on the south, and described as a street to be called Reid Street, is undoubtedly the portion falling within ment of 1860, which was just a proposed extension eastward of the own as Reid Street, which had been delineated in the plans, and re- in the previous deeds.

g these three deeds together, viz., the disposition of 1854, the agree- April 1860, and the disposition of December 1860, and construing them d with reference to the plans, and to the undoubted fact that the for- f streets, and the giving of access by streets, was the original purpose tion of the whole arrangements, I come to the conclusion that this case uishable from the case of Free St Mark's Church; and then, in regard ntral line of Reid Street, as well as in regard to the central line of reet, and of the unnamed street, the defender is under obligation so to his own property as to secure the access by street, which has been all ended, in which access by street the owners of the said streets on both sides, deriving their right from a common author, have a common interest which they are entitled to protect.

If the obligation exists, as I think it does, then there can be no doubt that the pursuer has right and interest to enforce it; and it is equally clear that the defender, not a singular successor, but representing the disponee, who is in the position of a contracting party, is the person who must be liable in that obligation to open up and keep open all the streets in question.

In so far as regards the space at the east end of Reid Street, and forming the south boundary of No. 7, the words of the agreement are clear, and the defender has been rightly ordained by the Lord Ordinary not only to open up, but to form and causeway that part of the street.

In regard to the other streets to which the agreement does not apply, the Lord Ordinary has only found the defender bound to open them up and keep them open. In thus limiting his judgment I understand that he has not pronounced any opinion in regard to the formation and causewaying of streets, apart from the specific obligation in the titles; and taking that view of the question I concur in holding that there are no sufficient grounds for ordaining the defender at once and immediately to form and causeway these streets. There are no definite words of obligation to that effect anywhere, except in the agreement, which relates to one part of one of the streets only. There is no time specified or pointed at for the formation and causewaying of the streets, and I am not surprised that the Lord Ordinary has refrained from giving a decernitur at present to that effect. For my own part, I think that it is sufficient at present to say that Mr Thomson is not taken bound by his titles to form and causeway the streets at present.

Lord Deas.—I agree with the remark made by the Lord Advocate to the effect that the general rule that a proprietor may make any use of his property he thinks right, except in so far as he is under express limitations by his titles applies only in a qualified manner to such a matter as this—the formation of a street. I think, with regard to that, there is a great deal in the argument that it is a sort of mutual contract, in which you are to look mainly to what appears to have been the intention of the parties. Taking that view of it, I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion arrived at by Lord Ardmillan, and so entirely upon the grounds which he has stated in reference to the deeds that I do not think it at all necessary to go into particulars. I agree likewise in the construction he puts on the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor as not determining the question whether the party here, who is objecting to the formation of the street, shall or shall not be found liable, at the proper time, to assist in causewaying the street. I think that also,—and indeed peculiarly,—will be a matter to be decided according to the construction of the contract and the fair meaning of the parties. The Solicitor-General very adroitly took advantage of what he represented as a concession by the Lord Advocate, that the whole question was a question of servitude—the servitude right of one property over another property. But although the doctrine of servitude was very properly contended for as involved in the case, it did not appear to me that it was contended for in such a way as to exclude the different question,—what was the fair meaning of the parties in this contract. The two things are not inconsistent. I quite concur that there is no express obligation to form the street at present; but as to what questions may arise afterwards it is not necessary to pronounce an opinion. With this explanation or variation I entirely concur in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord President.—As regards the main part of this case I think it is free from any doubt, and I concur entirely in the grounds of judgment stated by the Lord Ordinary. The mutual rights of the neighbours here seem to me to be secured by the very express clauses in the deeds, and I can hardly conceive any case more complete in that respect. The only difficulty has been in disposing of that part of Reid Street, or Reidvale Street, which lies to the north of the properties No. 3 belonging to the defender. That was acquired along with No

ler a disposition dated 27th January 1854, and the terms of that deed in nce to Reid Street are very peculiar. Lot No. 3 is described as being led "on the north by the central line of Reid Street, to measure 60 feet in th from building line to building line, along which it extends 255 feet or by." The property is bounded on two other sides by two other streets,— ield Street and Sword Street. Then the property No. 4, which immediately as No. 3 upon the east, is described as being "bounded on the north by ground belonging to the said trustees, along which it extends 255 feet hes or thereby, on a line coinciding in range with the central line of Reid t." Now, there is a marked distinction undoubtedly between the de- tion in the case of No. 3 and that in No. 4. It may be much more easily red in regard to No. 3 that it was intended to impose upon the disponee an ation to leave 30 feet of his property for the formation of Reid Street than uld in the case of No. 4, because, as far as No. 4 is concerned, there are no ls to indicate any intention whatever to prolong Reid Street beyond the line o. 3, the line of northern boundary in No. 4 being "other ground belonging he said trustees" "on a line coinciding in range with the central line of l Street,"—that is to say, the line which forms the northern boundary of 4 is a continuation eastward of the straight line which forms the northern dary of No. 3. The disposition is in other respects peculiar, because the r two streets which are mentioned as boundaries of No. 3 are made the ect of very express provision at the conclusion of the deed, and the obliga- is expressly imposed upon the disponee to open up and form these streets in a certain limited time in so far as the area of the street is upon the solum operty conveyed. The mention of these streets, and the obligation expressly sed upon the disponee in regard to these two streets, while no correspond- bligation is imposed in regard to Reid Street, create a very general difficulty e case. On the other hand, there is this circumstance favourable to the con- on of the pursuer in the action, that Reid Street, at the time when this dis- ion was granted, was to a certain extent an existing street. Nearly up to No. d between the west boundary of No. 3 and Bellgrove Street (a street farther), it appears that Reid Street was then an existing street, whether actually swayed and used I do not know, but it certainly was built upon to a certain nt. These are the peculiarities of the case, which it would have been sary to consider a great deal more seriously and elaborately if the case had d entirely on the disposition of 1854, and if it had been so I confess I ld have had very great difficulty indeed in deciding in favour of the pur- here, because of the decision of this Court in the case of Free St Mark's v. or, which I hold not only to be a binding judgment upon us, but to be dgment entirely sound in itself, and in the principle of which I entirely ur; but fortunately for the pursuer the case does not depend upon the dis- ion of 1854 alone. The same parties who stood in the relation of seller purchaser in the transaction of 1854 proceeded in a subsequent period, 1860, al with other parts of the property belonging to the disponers. In 1860, with a view to the further acquisition of property by the defender's father Thomson, there was a minute of agreement entered into, dated in April of year, in which an arrangement was made for the extension of Reid Street g that line, or rather along a line substituted for that line, which is called e disposition of 1854 "a line coinciding in range with the central line of Street." Now, the object of this agreement was to ensure that Reid Street, e breadth of 60 feet, should be carried eastward between the two properties d No. 4 and No. 7. That was the object of both parties to this agreement. this purpose a special arrangement was made, and the line of direction of treet was varied, for instead of being a mere projection in a straight line of Street as opposite No. 3, it turned up to the north to a certain extent, and terchange of ground, or rather a contribution of two triangular pieces of d, was made by the parties respectively in order to enable this divergence e street to be carried through. Now, when the parties in April 1860 were carefully providing for the extension of Reid Street between No. 4 and ,—that is to say, to the eastward of No. 3,—and when Reid Street had also been previously formed to the westward of No. 3, it seems to me impossible to contend that the defender or his father were after that in a position to maintain that Reid Street should not be formed as it passes No. 3, and should not be formed of the same breadth as it is both to the west of it, and, as provided in the agreement of 1860, to the east of it. It may be represented perhaps that this agreement of 1860 construes the disposition of 1854, and I think a great deal might be said in support of that view, that it construes the disposition of 1854 so as to impose an obligation on Mr Thomson, as the disponee in that deed, to submit to have 30 feet in width taken off his property No. 3 for Reid Street. But whether that is the true view of it or not I hold it at least to be very clear that, taking the disposition of 1854, the agreement of April 1860, and the subsequent disposition of December 1860, by which last deed Mr Thomson acquired the property No. 7,—taking all these together, the defender is undoubtedly placed under an obligation to permit 30 feet of his property No. 3 to be occupied by the area of a street. Upon these grounds I concur with your Lordships in the result at which you have arrived. As to the formation and causewaying of the streets, the Lord Ordinary has found "that the defender is not under his title bound to form or to causeway any portion of the said street excepting that portion of Reid Street or Reidvale Street" mentioned in the third finding, being the portion which passes between No. 4 and No. 7, and which is regulated by the agreement of April 1860. I rather apprehend that the Lord Ordinary meant here to do no more than to find that the titles do not contain any obligation which can be enforced against the defender to causeway these streets. What his obligation otherwise may be is a totally different question. But perhaps there may be some little ambiguity in the mode in which that finding is expressed, "that he is not in his title bound to form or to causeway," and it would tend to remove that ambiguity if, in place of the expression "is not in his titles bound," we were to express it, "is not taken bound by his titles" to form and causeway. With that variation I should be prepared to adhere to the whole interlocutor, as your Lordships find.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Vary the said interlocutor in so far as to substitute in the last finding for the words 'not under his titles bound' the words 'not taken bound by his titles': Quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor, and refuse the reclaiming note: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses since the date of the said interlocutor; allow an account," &c.

Retention—Payment by Instalments.—Where work was contracted to be done for a price payable by instalments during its progress, and at the sight of an architect, who was appointed arbiter in case of dispute between employer and contractors, and an instalment had been sent, for behoof of a contractor, to the architect, who returned it to the employer, with a request that he would send it direct to the contractor, held that the employer had no right to retain the instalment so sent in extinction of a claim of damages for non-fulfilment of the work, and that it was liable to arrestment in his hands by a creditor of the contractor.

2D DIVISION. Lord Jerviswoode. R.

A MINUTE of agreement, dated 3d and 6th February 1871, was entered into between Messrs Skene and Peacock, W.S., as agents for and on behalf of John Gordon, Esq. of Cluny, on the one hand, and Alexander Aimers, plumber, Kelso, on the other, whereby the latter contracted to perform the slater and joiner work required in certain repairs and improvements ch the former proposed to make on the farm of Belville, in Berwick-e, all as described and set forth in plans and specifications prepared William Dickison, architect, Kelso. Payment for the said work was e made "by instalments, to be fixed according to the progress of the k by the said William Dickison," to whose satisfaction the said work s to be executed; and it was provided that if Aimers became bankrupt insolvent, or unable for any cause to implement his obligations under agreement, the said John Gordon might enter into possession of the rks, and complete the same at the contractor's expense, or might, in his n option, declare the agreement null and void, and make the contractor ble for any loss or damage which might be sustained from his failure implement the agreement. All disputes or differences that might arise to the meaning or intent of the agreement, plans, or specifications, were ferred to the amicable decision of the said William Dickison, whose ard was to be final and binding on all parties. The work was to be ished on the 1st of November 1871, under a penalty of £10 for every eek of delay, and the contract price was £310.

On 30th June, subsequent to this agreement, Aimers further contracted r the slater, plumber, and plaster work of cottages proposed to be built the same farm at the sum of £61, 16s.

Aimers proceeded with the work under these contracts, and obtained yment from Mr Gordon's agents of three instalments of £50 each, in ebruary, May, and July 1871 respectively, on their obtaining certificates om Dickison that the work was going on well, and that these sums ere within the value of the work actually done. About the 20th July 871, however, Aimers, having fallen into embarrassments, was imprisoned r debt, and remained in jail for about three weeks, during which time e works were suspended. On his release he returned to his work at elville, and continued to execute it down to the end of November 1871, hen he absconded.

Meanwhile Field and Allan, who were slate-merchants in Leith, had pplied Aimers with slates, and had received in return his bill for £66, s. 4d., dated 29th September 1871, and payable one month after date, in enewal of one formerly current. On 29th August 1871 Field and Allan rote to Dickison that they had made an arrangement with Aimers, hereby they were authorised to draw the first £50 payable on his con-act, and requesting the name and address of the proprietor of Belville r his agent. To this Dickison replied on the 4th of September, promis-ng to make them aware when Aimers obtained the draft. On the 10th of October Field and Allan further wrote to Dickison that Aimers had agreed hat Dickison should retain in his hands any instalments due till they mounted to £66, 1s. 4d., and then hand them over to the pursuers; to hich Dickison replied:—"In reference to your note about Aimers' bill, I m sorry to say that . . . I am not in a position for a few days to grant an rder. It may be a fortnight yet before he has money; but you may rest ssured that as soon as he gets it you shall have it." On 13th November ickison sent to Messrs Skene and Peacock a certificate to the effect that imers was entitled to £92 for work done at that date, which sum was cordingly sent to Dickison in the form of a cheque on the 15th.

Meantime the bill due by Aimers to Field and Allan had not been paid, d they raised action for payment thereof before the Sheriff of Roxburgh, d on 16th November used arrestments in the hands of Dickison of sum of £85, and on 20th November further arrested the sum of £100 the hands of Mr Gordon. Between these two dates Mr Dickison, who l not cashed the cheque, returned it to Messrs Skene and Peacock, writ-to them that "if you are free from any arrestment you might send the order to Mr Aimers himself, and I could instruct him what payments to make." Their reply was that the money must remain with them, subject to any right Messrs Field and Allan might have to make it furthcoming from him.

On 27th November 1871 Field and Allan obtained a decree in absence in the action above-mentioned, decerning and ordaining the said Alexander Aimers to make payment of the sum of £66, 1s. 4d. contained in the foresaid bill, together with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum from the date the said bill became payable till paid, and £2, 4s. 4d. of expenses.

In these circumstances the present action of furthcoming was brought, concluding that the defender, John Gordon, arrestee, should be decerned and ordained to make payment of the said arrested sum of £100, or at least of the above sums of money contained in the decree in absence against the other defender Aimers, besides £2, 3s. 6d., being the expenses of the arrestment.

The pursuers pleaded resting owing.

The defender, Gordon, pleaded;—(1) The defender not being indebted to the principal debtor, and the pursuers' arrestment not having attached any funds of his in the hands of the defender, the latter should be assoilzied, with expenses. (2) Any debt which may have been due by Mr Gordon to Aimers is extinguished by the liabilities and expenses incurred and to be incurred by Mr Gordon in completing the works, and the damages sustained by him, actual or pactional, through the non-completion by Aimers of his contracts. (3) The defender, Mr Gordon, is entitled to retain any balance that may be now or ultimately due to Aimers to meet said liabilities, expenses, and damages, and cannot be called upon at present to count and reckon with and pay over any sum to the pursuers.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel, and made avizandum, and considered the proof, debate thereon, productions, and whole process,—Finds as matter of fact (1st) that the defender, Mr Aimers, failed to complete his part of the contracts between him and the defender and arrestee, Mr Gordon, which are set forth on the record, and whereby he undertook to execute certain slater and plumber work on the farm-steading of Belville, on Mr Gordon's estate of Belchester, and the slater and plumber work of certain cottages which were to be erected on the farm of Belville; (2d) that Mr Gordon has consequently been obliged to employ other parties to complete the slater and plumber work so undertaken to be performed by Mr Aimers; and (3d) that the pursuers have failed to establish that any sum was, at the date of the arrestment founded on in the summons, or is now, due by Mr Gordon to Mr Aimers: Therefore, and with reference to the preceding findings, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the said defender and arrestee entitled to expenses, of which allows an account to be lodged," &c.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The sum of £92 certified by Dickison was really due at the date of the arrestment. Under the minute of agreement the defender Gordon had no right of retention,[1] and the return of the cheque to his agents was only subject to the rights of the pursuers.

Argued for the defenders;—This was a case to which the doctrine of retention applied.[2]

t advising,— No. 21.

ORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts of this case are simple enough. We have Nov. 23, 187 contract for work to be performed between the defender, on the one hand, Field & Allan certain tradesmen on the other, under which the former, in case of bank- v. Gordon.
cy, insolvency, or failure to implement the agreement on the part of the r, is authorised to enter into possession of the works and complete the con-
. On the other hand, the contractors are to be paid by instalments, and e are to be fixed by William Dickison, the architect superintending the
ks. Further, any disputes arising with regard to the completion of the work o be referred to the amicable decision of Dickison, who therefore held an pendent position, so far as this contract was concerned. This case refers to of the instalments. A certain amount of work had been done by Aimers, for ch Dickison gave his certificate. The employer recognised it, and the money ch it certified to be due was paid to Dickison in the form of a cheque, for purpose of being paid to Aimers. It turns out that Dickison had had some munications with the pursuers, who were creditors of Aimers, and not only they been authorised by their debtor to receive the next instalment, but kison had undertaken they should receive it, and had encouraged them to te further supplies of slates on the faith of it. What took place afterwards filled me with the greatest surprise. While the cheque was still in Dickison's ds the pursuers used an arrestment in his hands on the dependence of an ion at their instance against Aimers. Dickison, instead of paying over the ney to the pursuers, sent the cheque back to the employer's agents, with a uest that the money might be sent direct to Aimers. The agents very pro-ly wrote back that the money must remain with them, subject to any right ers Field and Allan might have to make it furthcoming. I think it clear t Dickison was bound, by his own undertaking, to pay the money to the suers, and also that Mr Gordon's agents received the cheque back on the e footing as that on which Dickison had received and held it. A second stment has been used by Field and Allan in Mr Gordon's hands, and this ess of furthcoming has been brought. In defence there is no attempt to say t the instalment was not due. In these circumstances the defence is twofold, ther is inconsistent. The defender, Gordon, says, in the first place, "that never got back the money, for Skene and Peacock did not in that matter act him;" and, in the second place, "that he did get it back, and that he is tled to retain it in extinction of a claim against the common debtor for nonlment of his contract," which is preferable to the arrestment in his hands ch is now founded upon. The defender was, however, bound to take one or r of these views, and in fact now takes the latter. And the only question hether he has any claim of retention. I think he has not, for he put the ey out of his hands when the cheque was sent to Dickison, and never ved it back excepting on a footing which bound him, or his agents, to hold bject to the pursuers' claims. It is not necessary for us to decide any act question in regard to the effect of arrestment in a contract like this, in h the price is payable by instalments. This contract differs, as regards the s of the employer, from an ordinary mutual contract in which the price is ble when the work is completed; on the other hand, an obligation to pay stalments does not constitute a series of separate contracts; and I am not ied that if, before an instalment, already due, has been paid, the contractors ne bankrupt, the employer could not retain the sum, to indemnify himself ay loss arising from the non-completion of the work. It may be that in a case the arresting creditor of the contractor could only use his debtor's s, and would only attach them subject to the employer's plea of retention.
ther the debtor's continuing obligation to complete the contract in such a would have that effect we need not decide. These questions do not arise

In this case the money was beyond the defender's control. Skene and ock received it back as the defender's agents, but held it subject to the ers' rights against Dickison. The second arrestment therefore validly ned it in their hands, on the special footing on which they held it, and the ce of retention must be repelled. The pursuers are entitled to decree.

No. 21.

Nov. 23, 1872. Field & Allan v. Gordon.

Lord Cowan.—It seems to me that the circumstances of this case exclude the plea of retention altogether. The position of Dickison in the contract admits of no doubt. He is selected as the person at whose sight the work is to be performed, and by whom the instalments coming due are to be fixed. I apprehend that it is quite clear that the certificate or order for payment fixed and settled that Aimers was entitled to have a certain sum paid for work already performed. It makes no matter in my mind whether Dickison was servant of Mr Gordon or servant of Mr Aimers. As regards the matter in question he was sole judge under the contract. Thus, as regards his attempt to gain some advantage to himself in disregard of the previous agreement with Field and Allan, that their bill should lie over, on the understanding that he should intimate to them the issue of the next certificate: When he tried to repudiate this, and to get the money into his own hands, and to pay himself in the first place, he did that which no Court can sanction.

Your Lordship has explained the position of the money in the hands of Messrs Skene and Peacock, who acted for Mr Gordon. The money was in truth in their hands earmarked as belonging to Aimers. It is said that the arrestment of the 10th November was inept for the purpose of attaching the fund. But what room is there to plead retention when the arrestee himself acknowledges that he holds for the arrester, to whom the money had been in fact paid over? That arrestment was a very proper step to guard against diligence by other creditors, but cannot be permitted to give a right of retention which could not otherwise have been pleaded.

Lord Benholme.—I confess I have felt in this case somewhat more difficulty than has been expressed by your Lordships. There is a large class of contracts entered into between proprietors and tradesmen the basis of which is payment by instalments. They are often considerable in amount, and embrace a tract of time. In such cases it is of the last importance to the tradesmen that they should be supplied from time to time with the means of enabling them to go on with their part of the undertaking. There can be no doubt that as the work progresses the landlord gets something added to his estate. It was so in this case with Colonel Gordon, and as he got value added to his estate he became bound to make payment of certain instalments. It appears to me that whenever the architect had given his certificate that so much work was done, Colonel Gordon, on the one hand, had had his estate increased by so much, and on the other was under the distinct obligation to pay over to the contractor the sum certified to enable him to go on with the work. If he withheld the money he might thereby embarrass his contractor, and be himself the cause of his ultimate bankruptcy during the progress of the contract undertaken.

That is the principle which distinguishes all such contracts from ordinary mutual contracts when there are no such stipulations as to instalments. A mutual is an indivisible contract—a unum quid—not divisible into parts. That is the general principle which underlies the judgment in the case of Johnston quoted to us. But I think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor plainly bears on the face of it an indication of the point where he has gone wrong. It is in the matter of fact. He says that Mr Aimers failed to complete his part of the contract, and that therefore Mr Gordon had to employ other parties to complete the work, and consequently that the pursuers have failed to establish that any sum was at the date of the arrestment founded on due by Mr Gordon to Aimers. That, I take it, is a finding that at the date of the action there was no sum due by Mr Gordon. If that is right, then the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is justified. But it was not so in my opinion. The third finding is not well founded, for I think the pursuers have not failed to prove that any sum was due, but on the contract I think they have proved it very clearly. If the Lord Ordinary is mistaken, his whole judgment falls to the ground. For it will not do to say that in consequence of the contractor's subsequent difficulties the contract could not be gone on with, and that therefore damages are due to the defender. That has nothing to do with the performance of their obligation by the parties up to the date of the arrestments. If Mr Gordon had paid in virtue of the architect's ification, then Field and Allan would in all probability have supplied just it was wanted to complete the work, namely, more material.

t appears to me that this case is in itself very clear, and that it has been over- with extraneous matter which has caused us all the difficulty. Gordon had his hand money due to Aimers, which must be held to have been either d to him at the time, or to have been held by Gordon or his agents for his oof, and must now be made furthcoming to his arresting creditors.

Lord Neaves.—I think there can be no doubt as to the decision of the case, I I concur generally in the remarks of your Lordship and Lord Benholme on subject of contracts, with, however, a certain reservation. I am not prepared ay that a sum may not be due as an instalment under a contract of this nd, and yet be retainable.

In the present case there is no doubt that the sum was prima facie due, and ght to have been paid. But in certain circumstances an employer might be titled to say, "I see that there is something wrong, and I am not bound to y." An arrester or assignee is, I conceive, in the same position as the original ntractors, and the employer might be entitled to say, "I foresee the bankruptcy the principal coming, and I must protect myself." But I think the nature of e present case renders it unnecessary to define the circumstances in which such es of retention could be sustained. The money here was appropriated to the ntractor. The employer had set aside the sum and sent it to his agent to be id to Aimers. There was nothing at the time to justify retention, and the nployer had no intention of retaining it. But then comes the very question- ble conduct of Dickison, the bearing of which Messrs Skene and Peacock saw ry well from the beginning. It can in nowise raise up again a right of reten- on in Mr Gordon. The money was clearly appropriated to Aimers, and his esting creditors must now get it.

The Court accordingly recalled "the interlocutor complained of, and decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons."

Lord Advocate v. Sinclair.

The Lord Advocate, Petitioner and Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Clark—Ivory.

James Sinclair, Respondent and Appellant.—Millar—Marshall.

Property—Straightening Marches—Act 1669, c. 17.—The procedure laid down in Act 1669, c. 17 (anent enclosing of ground), whereby the Sheriff may be required to visit the marches, is imperative, and cannot be supplied by a remit to a man of skill, even of consent.

Property—Straightening Marches—Act 1669, c. 17.—The Act does not apply, (1) where there is in existence a natural boundary of steep cliffs, involving little danger of trespass; nor (2) where the expense of erecting the fence would be disproportionate to the value of the pieces of ground to be benefited.

2d Division. Sheriff of Caithness, Orkney, and Shetland. I.

The lands of Holbornhead, in Caithness, belonging to James Sinclair, Esq. of Forss, are at one part separated from the sea by the lands of Scrabster, belonging to the Crown, which there consist of a long narrow strip of land lying between Scrabster Bay and a line of cliffs about 120 feet high, and at some places very steep. The present boundary line between the two properties runs along the face of these cliffs, and is very irregular in form.

The Lord Advocate, as acting on Her Majesty's behalf, and on behalf of the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, brought this petition before the Sheriff-substitute of Caithness against Mr Sinclair, proceeding on the narrative of the two Scotch Acts 1661, c. 41, and 1669,

c. 17, as ratified by 1685, c. 39,* praying the Sheriff to remit "to M George Brown, tacksman of Watten, or such other person or persons a your Lordship may appoint, to report upon the proper line of march be tween the lands of Scrabster and Holbornhead respectively, where no already fenced, and upon an estimate of the just value of the parts to b adjudged respectively from the one heritor to the other, and to decern i favour of the party from whom shall be taken land of more value tha the other, for any excess of value which may be found to be taken fro such party; and thereafter to find that the most suitable fence to b erected on the whole line is a strong wire fence, or such other fence a may be reported by the said George Brown or the other person or perso to be named by your Lordship, and to ordain the same, or such othe fence as your Lordship may find to be most suitable, to be erected at th mutual expense of the parties, and for that purpose to authorise contract to be entered into under your Lordship's sanction, and thereafter to de cern against the respondent for one-half of the whole expense of such erection, and incidental thereto, and to find the respondent liable in th expenses of process," &c.

The remit was granted by the Sheriff-substitute, and Mr Brown visited the ground and prepared a report to the effect that as the present lin was very crooked, and passed over ground so steep and broken that n fence thereon could be durable and satisfactory, he would recommend a excambion of pieces of ground of equal value to be made, and a straighte line to be drawn on which should be placed at one part a stone dyk and at the rest a wire fence.

To this form of procedure the respondent made no exception, but to th report he objected, inter alia, (3) that the extent of march proposed to b fenced inferred a cost totally out of proportion to the value of the lan to be fenced; and (4) that the report proposed to leave with the respond ent, at least at one point, a piece of ground so narrow and so surrounde by the proposed new fence and by an existing old one as to be useless.

Act 1669, c. 17, provides,—"That whenever any person intends to enclose by a dyke or ditch upon the march betwixt his lands and the lands belonging to other heritors contiguous thereunto, it shall be leisome to him to require the next sheriffs or bailies of regalities, stewarts of stewartries, justices of peace, or other judges ordinary, to visit the marches alongst which the said dyke or ditch is to be drawn, who are hereby authorised when the said marches are uneven or otherwise incapable of ditch or dyke, to adjudge such parts of the one or other heritor's grounds as occasion the inconveniency betwixt them from the one heritor in favours of the other, so as may be least to the prejudice of either party, and the dyke or ditch to be made to be in all time thereafter the common march betwixt them, and the parts so adjudged, respective from the one to the other, being estimat to the just avail and compensed pro tanto, to decern what remains uncompensed of the price to the party to whom the same is wanting; and it is hereby declared that the parts thus adjudged hinc inde shall remain and abide with the lands or tenandries to which they are respective adjudged, as parts and pendicles thereof in all time coming."

ary 1872.—Repels the objections stated by the respondent to the report o. 9: Approves of the line of boundary laid down in the report, and lative plan and certificate, and of the proposed interchange of portions ground, as specified in said certificate and report, and of the estimate sulting in equalisation of value: Farther, approves of the description d character of fence to be erected, and ordains the same to be erected thwith: Appoints the petitioner to lodge draft of the requisite con-acts for the execution thereof, after being approved of by the Court, reparatory to the completion of the work: Reserves all questions of xpenses," &c.

Mr Sinclair appealed to the Sheriff, who, on 22d February 1872, pro-ounced the following interlocutor:—"22d February 1872.—Dismisses id appeal, and adheres to the interlocutor submitted to review: And virtue of the Act 1669, c. 17, the Sheriff hereby adjudicates such parts f the ground of Her Majesty, being 3 roods and 12½ poles, as occasion e inconveniency betwixt the Crown lands and those of the respondent, belong to the respondent, and such parts of the ground of the respond-nt, being 1 acre 1 rood and 22 poles, as occasion the inconveniency be-wixt his lands and the Crown's lands to belong to Her Majesty, and the yke and fence to be made to be in all times thereafter the common arch betwixt them, and decerns; reserving all questions of expenses." *

On the case returning to the Sheriff-substitute he pronounced this in-erlocutor:—"31st May 1872.—Approves of the advertisements of the ffers of John Orrock and Donald Mackay mentioned in said minute, and f the drafts of the contracts with them: Authorises the said contracts to e extended and executed, and the necessary works to be completed in erms thereof: Quoad ultra reserves consideration of the cause," &c.

The respondent appealed.

Argued for him;—Looking to the nature of the ground the Act of 1669 does not apply. The expense of the fence, being about £70 or £80, s too great, in comparison with the value of the patches of ground which t is to separate, the said value being about two guineas a-year. The etition was incompetent (1) as not being for the mutual advantage of the arties;[1] and (2) as craving a remit to a man of skill instead of a visita-ion by the Sheriff, as appointed by the Act.

Argued for petitioner;—The objection of the respondent all along has ot been to the competency of the petition, nor to any fence being erected t all, but to the particular fence. The visitation of the Sheriff was dis-ensed with by consent of parties, and was not of the essence of the Act.

* "NOTE.— . . . . The 3d objection is vague, and in one view is an nswer or defence to the application, which should have been stated long ere ow. But it was explained that it had reference to the value of the braes along hich the fence is to be constructed, to the exclusion of the valuable arable nd on the top. The land deriving the benefit of the new fence the Sheriff onsiders to be the arable land, and hence this objection fails.

"As regards the last (4th) objection, the road shewn on the plan (which the own says is public, and the respondent says is of another character), explains hy the reporter did not feel warranted in doing anything to interfere with ghts not in question in this process.

"It is proper to mention, with reference to the requirements of the Act 1669, at it was stated at the debate that in respect of the Sheriff-substitute's know-lge of the locality his visiting the proposed march had been dispensed with both parties. The Sheriff happens also to know the ground."

No. 22. At advising,—

Nov. 26, 1872. Lord Advocate v. Sinclair.

Lord Cowan.—The Crown has thought fit, founding upon the statut are referred to in the application, to present this petition to the Sheriff ness for straightening of marches. I think it is material to observe, firs what the terms of these statutes are. The first is that of 1661, which " where inclosures fall to be upon the borders of any person's inherita next adjacent heritor shall be at equal pains and charges in building, and planting that dyke which parteth their inheritance, and recommen Lords, Sheriffs, and so forth, to see this Act put in execution. The sec which was passed in 1669, provides that whenever any person inte inclose by a dyke or ditch upon the march betwixt his lands and t belonging to other heritors contiguous thereunto," it shall be leisome t require the next Sheriffs or other officers " to visit the marches " along the said dyke or ditch is to be drawn, who are hereby authorised, when marches are uneven or otherwise incapable of ditch or dyke, to adjud parts of the one or other heritor's grounds as occasion the inconveniency them, from the one heritor in favour of the other. I have great diff thinking that this is a case which falls within these statutes at all. wish to lay down positively that this is not a case falling, in some of its within the statutes. At the same time, I think this is a case of a very able nature—it has more the appearance of an attempt to have an boundary run along the whole of the march between these two properti there is a natural boundary sketched by the hills, clearly marked out, t of a proper straightening of marches. If it had been stated that at p parts there was danger of trespass on account of the want of inclosures have been competent to have asked a dyke or ditch to be made; but not been said to be the case, except in one small part of this property the south of the boundary. But apart from that, although I think it sideration that one cannot keep out of view in judging how we are to d this application, I think the prayer is inconsistent with the statute. think that under an application of this kind—at least I can find no auth it—it should be an application to the Sheriff to remit to a particular pa and report upon the boundaries and upon the values of the several por ground which should be exchanged with a view to the adjustment of a march. Such a process has for its object rather a forced excambion as these two parties of particular portions of their estates, and this is not th or purpose of either of the statutes. The proper application under the s that the Sheriff or Judge-Ordinary shall visit the ground, and in presen parties consider what particular parts ought to be given to the one an other, and what dyke or ditch it was necessary to have in order to prev passing from one side to the other of the march. Now, here the appli not to visit, and in point of fact the Sheriff never did visit these p because the Sheriff-substitute says he was acquainted with the district i of general way, just as we are all acquainted, I suppose, with districts w have traversed or occasionally seen; and the Sheriff-principal says he same kind of general knowledge. In these circumstances, the parties h pensed with that which I apprehend to be at the basis of every appli this kind. It is well known that prior to the statutes under which thi cation is made the way in which boundaries were marked out and t prevented was by a perambulation of the march by the Sheriff, with accompanying him, who adjudicated upon the line of march that oug fixed as the true boundary; and I am not aware that there ever was a straightening of marches otherwise carried through, where the parties consenting, than by the Sheriff visiting the ground under a legal perami That has now been superseded by the statutory procedure; but, unless e dispensed with by the parties the statute plainly requires that there sh a visitation of the ground on the part of the Sheriff as the first step in a of this kind—and for this good reason, that when he goes to the grou has the parties there, he can judge for himself, and determine whethe ny need for an extended march-wall of the expense that is proposed that were delivered in the case of Strang v. Steuart (March 31, 1864, rly laid down. The original jurisdiction was recognised to be in the NEAVES.—I concur. This is a matter of delicacy, because while these useful Acts on the one hand, they are also capable of being made y oppressive on the other. To compel a man with a small property to xpensive fences may often be ruin to him; and, on the other hand, a h a small property may cause great annoyance by nimiously seeking do not say that there may not be cases where it is possible to employ the statute in the first place, which authorises the party who wants to

it. He may afterwards take advice of any kind, but he ought if posisit the ground, as it is only in that way that we can get a judgment o the weight which ought always to be given to it. We cannot look round ourselves, and can only get vague descriptions of it, but the report of his visitation ought to be the record of the true state of things, ll then have its due use and authority. Here we are perfectly helpless spect, and all we have to guide us is the report of Mr Brown, who was
d, I think, by the pursuer, his name being put into the petition. I do : that is a proper way of proceeding, In this case, also, there appear to is for holding that this is a boundary where it is nimious to require a ke to be erected. There are places where there are natural boundaries nder that unnecessary; and although the mere extent of a boundary will not supersede the necessity for an enclosure where there may be danger of trespassing, this is not a case in which there is any reasonable ground for expecting that result in any injurious degree. I will not say how far an enclosure may not be right at some points here, but I think the parties can arrange that themselves without putting in operation these old statutes, which appear to have been designed for a totally different matter, and intended to be carried out in a different way from that which has been adopted here. The Sheriff is said to have known these properties, as he had been previously there. That does not signify, if he did not apply his mind to the special question at issue between the parties. On these grounds I think we should refuse the application.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I quite agree that the Sheriff, in following out the statute, if it applied, ought to have gone himself to the ground, and to have acted upon his own judicial persuasions; but I am inclined to think that, apart from that altogether, this application ought never to have been presented, and ought not now to be entertained. I have no notion that the provisions of the statute could apply to a rocky strip of ground along the sea shore such as this, or that the expense that is proposed for the erection of this fence is at all legitimate. I find that the prayer of the petition is to this effect—after praying that the respective portions of ground which are found to belong to either party should be adjudged respectively from one heritor to the other, it then proceeds in this way,—"and thereafter to find that the most suitable fence to be erected on the whole line is a strong wire fence, or such other fence as may be reported by the said George Brown, or the other person or persons to be named by your Lordship." Now, this strong wire fence is to be erected for the purpose of clearing the boundary between patches of ground, the value of which amounts altogether to two guineas a-year, and the expense of it, according to the estimates, is to be between £70 and £80. I think that it is absolutely out of the question, and therefore I think we ought to dismiss this application.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, alter the judgment, and dismiss the application, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to expenses in this Court," &c.

BETSY PATERSON or BRODIE (Pursuer), Appellant.—Guthrie Smith—Jameson.
JAMES DYCE (Defender), Respondent.—Fraser.

Proof—Presumption—Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant—Husband and Wife—Parent and Child—Bastard.—In an action of filiation and aliment brought by a married woman against a man not her husband held that the presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant had been redargued, although there was possibility of access.

Question.—Whether it was competent to call the pursuer's husband as a witness to prove non-access.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.
M.

BETSY PATERSON or BRODIE, designing herself "wife of James Brodie, labourer, and whose place of abode has been unknown to the said Betsy Paterson for three years and upwards," brought this action of filiation and aliment against James Dyce. The defence was (1) a denial of all the averments in the summons; (2) an averment that the pursuer had had improper intercourse with a number of other men who were named (at or about the date of conception).

The Sheriff-substitute (Robertson)—after a proof in which it was stated by the pursuer that she had not cohabited with her husband after the first night; and by another witness, that he was still living in Dundee, had not spoken about his wife for three years—found that the deer was the "father of the pursuer's illegitimate child, born in May l," and that he was liable in inlying expenses and aliment.

n appeal the Sheriff (Maitland Heriot), on December 30, 1871, in sequence of what took place at the debate, recalled this interlocutor ex statu, and appointed the pursuer to lodge a petition in terms of ion 83 of the Act of Sederunt 10th July 1839, stating the facts she posed to prove, and the witnesses by whom they were to be proved, remitted back to the Sheriff-substitute.*

The petitioner accordingly gave in a petition to be allowed further of of her desertion by her husband Brodie immediately after the emony of marriage on 12th December 1866, and that he had not abited with her since; that she had received parochial relief for her-f and her three children in consequence of the desertion of her husband
m the date of her marriage; and that search had been made for him the inspectors of poor for various parishes. The petition also set th that she had made numerous and extensive inquiries since the date the last interlocutor, and had discovered that her husband was a patient the Royal Infirmary of Dundee suffering from typhus fever. The de-der having given in answers, the Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof of s averments in the petition; but the Sheriff, on February 29, 1872, sus-ined the appeal, finding "that the pursuer has not in said petition stated shewn any such 'very weighty reasons' as to entitle her to any further oof, therefore dismisses the said petition; and having resumed conleration of the record proof, and whole process, finds in point of fact at the pursuer has failed to prove that the defender is the father of the ild libelled: Therefore dismisses the summons, and assoilzies the de-der from the whole conclusions thereof: Finds the defender entitled ) expenses," &c.†

* "NOTE.—This is a very exceptional case. It seems to the Sheriff to be most impossible to consider this case unless the pursuer's husband be examined.
he pursuer's procurators stated that they would endeavour to discover him, and xamine him. It seems that justice cannot be done between the two parties to his case unless the pursuer's husband be examined. See case of Scott, 25th November 1864, 37 Jur. 64.

† "The Sheriff, as requested, gave the pursuer an opportunity of shewing very weighty reasons' why she should yet be allowed to lead further proof, nd in particular still to examine her husband.

"Having heard parties, and carefully examined the petition, No. 15 of pro-ess, the Sheriff finds himself unable to hold that she has stated any such 'very eighty reasons' as to entitle her to lead further proof.

"It is not even said that she had endeavoured and failed to find her husband r examination before the proof was circumduced. It would rather seem that he pursuer did not in time perceive the importance of examining her husband ) entitle her to succeed in her action. The defender, while he denied the state-ents in the summons, averred that a number of men specified had had interourse with the pursuer, but not a word is said as to her own husband having ad such intercourse, and not a question is put to the pursuer when examined to this; and it is only after the proof is concluded that the plea is raised, Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant,' but nothing of this kind is alleged in the id petition. The statements in the petition, such as they are, seem to the heriff to be irrelevant. No reason is stated why her husband was not examined the proof formerly taken by the Sheriff-substitute.

"Then, on considering the proof as taken, the Sheriff finds that he cannot ld that the pursuer has proved her case. Her husband, it appears from the oof, has been living at Dundee, within a three hours' walk of Forfar, and thin an hour by rail. For aught that appears, her husband may have come

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—In order to rebut the presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant it was not necessary to prove that access by the husband was absolutely impossible. It was enough if it were shewn by ordinary evidence that in fact he had not access, and by the law of Scotland the denial of both parents that the child was theirs sufficed to exclude the presumption.[1]

The respondent (defender) argued;—As no weighty grounds for allowing additional proof had been submitted the Sheriff had no alternative but to allow full weight to the presumption. In such cases the evidence of the husband and wife was not admissible by the law of England, and even in Scotland it had been allowed only to prove facts that had occurred before the circumstances which had given rise to the action.[2]

At advising—

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is possible that the presumption may be rebutted without calling either the pursuer or her husband as witnesses; and in that case the Court would not be called upon to decide as to the competency of such evidence.

This interlocutor was pronounced on 17th July 1872:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the record and proof, Allow the pursuer (appellant) to lead additional proof by witnesses, other than the pursuer and her husband, for the purpose of shewing that the pursuer's husband had no access to the pursuer, so as to have connection with the pursuer, at such time as would account for the conception and birth of the child born on 9th May 1871; reserving for consideration, when the said additional evidence shall be before the Court, whether the pursuer and her husband, or either of them, ought to be examined as witnesses on the said question of access or non-access: Grant commission to the Sheriff-substitute of Forfarshire, at Dundee, to take the proof," &c.

The additional proof having been led and reported, the debate was resumed.

At advising—

LORD ARDMILLAN.—On the first question raised here, and the only question decided by the Sheriff-substitute, I have come to the same conclusion as the Sheriff-substitute. Apart from the question of presumed legitimacy, arising from the fact that the pursuer is a married woman, I cannot say that I think the case attended with much difficulty. If this had been one of the ordinary cases of filiation I could not have avoided the conclusion that the case is sufficiently ved against the defender. The pursuer's character is very bad. That fact es, on the one hand, detract considerably from her credibility, and renders noboration necessary; but, on the other hand, her notoriously bad character akes a visit to her at night by a married man a most suspicious fact, from hich scarcely any inference can be drawn except one unfavourable to the fender's moral propriety in the matter, and that is the inference contended for the pursuer. The defender is a married man, and his visits to the pursuer, der the circumstances appearing on the proof, are only susceptible of one conruction. No other reasonable explanation has been given. She was willing d ready for illicit intercourse, and he, knowing her character, visited her under spicious circumstances, when she was sure to tempt, and he, excited by liquor, as most likely to yield. The testimony of the pursuer, if believed, is direct d clear, and I am compelled to come to the conclusion that, in the evidence of e other witnesses, there is sufficient corroboration of that testimony. The heriff-substitute is of that opinion, and I think he gives good reasons for it.

But the peculiarity of this case arises from the fact that the pursuer is a marid woman. She is the wife of a James Brodie, a labourer, who has for about ree years been working in or near Dundee. The pursuer, when examined as witness in the filiation process, gives a very bad account of herself, for she ys—"I have been twice married. I have three illegitimate children by difrent men, one before I was married, and two after. I was married to my prent husband (that is, James Brodie) four years ago. We never lived together cept the first night."

Now, the question is, whether, by force of the maxim Pater est quem uptiæ demonstrant, this child, born on 9th May 1871, is the legitimate son of mes Brodie? If he is, then of course the pursuer, notwithstanding the idence led in this cause, can have no claim against the defender. The maxim at the husband of the mother shall be presumed the father of the child is ll settled and most reasonable. It is generally enough for a child alleging gitimacy to prove that he has been born during the marriage. The law will ow for him the inference of legitimacy. But it is now quite settled that the esumption of legitimacy thus created is not absolute. It may be rebutted. he proof of impossibility of access has long been held sufficient to destroy the esumption. At one time it was supposed that access could not be considered possible unless the sea rolled between the two spouses. But that idea has ow passed away. The great changes which have taken place, and the extraidinary increase in the facility of locomotion, have rendered the limitation of possible access to the case of separation by the sea quite absurd. Crossing e sea is by no means impossible or difficult. It is now much easier to pass om Calais to Dover than to travel from Wick to Edinburgh, or from Kirkdbright to Aberdeen. The admission of other evidence of impossibility of cess than that of separation by the sea is now settled. There are many cases oth in England and in Scotland, which were very judiciously presented to us y Mr Jameson, leaving no room to doubt on this point.

But it is necessary to go further than this, and I do not hesitate to do so. I ink it is now recognised as sound law that the fact that access or intercourse s physically possible is not of itself sufficient to fix the status of legitimacy. he cases must be very rare indeed where access or intercourse is proved to have en physically impossible. I do not think that necessary. I do not think it asonable to expect it. If the result of a careful consideration of all the facts d circumstances proved be that the Court is satisfied that there actually was t access or intercourse at or about the period when the child must have been ocreated, and if the Court is also satisfied that another man had access and d intercourse with the wife at that time, then the presumption from the maxim ater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant cannot receive effect in the face of such idence. The presumption is rebutted by such evidence as is sufficient to isfy the judicial mind that the husband could not be the father of the child. there be clear evidence to the satisfaction of the Court that de facto a husband d not intercourse with his wife, and could not be the father of his wife's ild, that child will be held illegitimate, though the utter impossibility of access be not established by the evidence. It may be physically possible, and yet in the circumstances, and according to the evidence, the possibility may be excluded. Nothing less than complete satisfactory evidence can be sufficient, but if there be such evidence, then, on the face of it, the presumption cannot receive effect. There is plenty of authority for this in the more recent decisions, both in Scotland and in England. It is the opinion of Lord Curriehill, as Lord Ordinary in the case of Mackay v. Mackay, 24th February 1855, 17 D. 494, and that opinion is accepted as correct, and authoritatively approved by Lord President Colonsay, who expressly states it to be "sound law." Lord Ivory and Lord Deas expressed, in that case, the same opinion. I could, if it were necessary, quote other authorities to the same effect. It is enough to remind your Lordships of the opinion of Lord Stair, (Stair, iii. 3, 42), that "with us, absence is not necessarily beyond sea;" and he adds,—"with us it will be sufficient that his (the husband's) absence be special and circumstantiate, that there remaineth no doubt that he could not have been present." Professor Bell (Prin. 1626) states the question as one of general evidence.

Taking this view of the weight and nature of the presumption, I think that in this particular case there is really no doubt that James Brodie, the husband of this pursuer, had, in point of fact, no intercourse with her at or about the time when this child must have been procreated. Her own statement on oath to that effect is quite distinct. If there were any opposing evidence on the subject, then her conduct and her bad character would greatly impair the force of her testimony. But there is no opposing evidence, and the proof subsequently led is entirely to the same effect as her own statement.

I think it would not be incompetent, if it had been necessary, to examine the husband as a witness in this matter. But the evidence which we already have appears to me sufficient, and it is desirable to avoid further expense. The husband's time is accounted for, and the wife's time is accounted for, and, although the space which divided them did not exceed fifteen or sixteen miles, I think it is satisfactorily proved that they did not meet, and could not have had conjugal intercourse. The presumptions of fact in this case, as well as the testimony of the witnesses, and the uncontradicted oath of the wife herself, are all opposed to the presumption of law that the husband of the mother is father of the child. I need not enter into the details of the evidence, which has satisfied me that the husband and wife had no intercourse at or about the time when the child, born on 9th May 1871, must have been procreated. I think that the time of both the husband and the wife during that period is as well accounted for as could be expected. I can see no reason why they should have desired to meet during that period or at all. They had parted long before that. There had been no reconciliation. There was no love. There was no interest. There was no motive—not even the stimulant of animal passion, for he was living with another woman, and she was abandoning herself to a loose life without scruple. That they did not wish to meet is very obvious. That they should have met is most improbable. That they did not meet is proved to my satisfaction by the evidence before us, and by the oath of the woman herself.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that, without requiring the additional evidence which the testimony of the husband would furnish, we have enough in the proof before us to lead to the conclusion, on sound and safe grounds, that at and about the period when the pursuer's child must have been procreated her husband, James Brodie, had no access to her, and no intercourse with her; and that the case of filiation must be disposed of without reference to James Brodie, and just as if the pursuer had been an unmarried woman.

So viewing the case, I concur in the opinion of the Sheriff-substitute that the pursuer has instructed sufficiently that the defender is the father of her child.

LORD DEAS.—The only doubt which I have had in this case has been whether it would not have been better to have examined the husband, and re-examined the wife. The wife was certainly asked about her marriage, on behalf of the defender, in the proof before the Sheriff-substitute, but she was not examined in the same way and for the same view with which she would be examined at this stage.

agree with Lord Ardmillan that there is no incompetency, according to our law, in examining the husband or wife or both of them, reserving all questions of credibility. I am, however, also disposed to agree that in this case it is not necessary—that the proof as it stands is sufficient. I have come to this conclusion with the less reluctance because any judgment we now pronounce cannot prevent this child hereafter, if sufficient grounds should be shewn, from establishing his legitimacy.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall all the interlocutors in the Sheriff-court subsequent to the interlocutor of 2d November 1871: Find that the defender (respondent) is the father of the pursuer's (appellant's) child, born on the 9th May 1871: Therefore decern against him in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Find the defender liable in expenses, both in this and the inferior Court; allow an account," &c.

On a deposition on oath by one witness to the truth of these statements a Justice of the Peace, before the complaint had been served, issued a warrant for the apprehension of the accused, and they were accordingly apprehended. Five months after one of the accused raised an action of damages for wrongous apprehension against the complainers' law agent and two officers of police, on the ground that the Justice was not entitled under the Day Trespass Act to issue the warrant of apprehension before the complaint was served, without having information on oath that the accused was likely to abscond. Held that, although the proceedings had been irregular, there had not been such a deviation from the statute as to deprive the defenders of the protection of sec. 35 of the Summary Procedure Act, which requires that all actions arising out of proceedings under it shall be brought within two months, and therefore that the action fell to be dismissed.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Mure M.

A COMPLAINT by the trustees of the Earl of Fife, bearing to be under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, charged William Murray and Gordon Smith, designed as "residing at Bridge of Dee, near Aberdeen," with a contravention of the Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 Wm. IV. c. 68, in having, on 13th November 1871, unlawfully trespassed on the complainer's lands in pursuit of game "The said William Murray and Gordon Smith having each, or one or other of them, been required by the gamekeeper forthwith to quit the land whereon they both, or each or one or other of them, were so trespassing, and also to tell their or each or one or other or both or their or his christian name or names, surname or surnames, and place or places of abode, the said William Murray and Gordon Smith did both, or each or one or other of them, after being so required, refuse to tell their or his real name or names, and place or places of abode, or did each, or one or other or both of them, give such a general description of his or their place or places of abode as was illusory for the purpo discovery."

This complaint having been, before service on the accused, prese to James Rust, Esquire, a Justice of Peace, a deposition was taken by Justice on oath from one witness, who deponed "that what is conta in the foregoing complaint is true." Upon this the Justice granted rant for the apprehension of the accused.

On 13th May 1872 William Murray raised an action against J Allan, solicitor, Banff, the law-agent for the complainers, George Me superintendent of police at Banff, and William Knight, police const there, for damages for wrongful apprehension on the said warrant. pursuer set forth his apprehension, and alleged,—"The said war apprehension, and taking in custody were wrongful and illegal. By 11th section of the Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 William IV. c. 68, enacted, that where any person shall be charged on the oath of a cre witness before a Justice of the Peace with any offence punishable by v of the Act, 'The Justice may summon the party charged to appear b himself, or any one or two Justices of the Peace, as the case may req at any time and place to be named in such summons, and if such shall not appear accordingly, then (upon proof of the due service o summons by delivering a copy thereof to the party, or by delivering copy at the party's usual place of abode to some inmate thereat, explaining the purport thereof to such inmate) the Justice or Justices either proceed to hear and determine the case in the absence of the p or may issue his or their warrant for apprehending and bringing party before him or them as the case may be, or the Justice before w the charge shall be made may, if he shall have reason to suspect, information upon oath, that the party is likely to abscond, issue warrant in the first instance, without any previous summons.' No mons preceded the aforesaid warrant or the aforesaid apprehension taking into custody. The said apprehension was the first intim which was received by the pursuer, or by any one on his behalf, t charge of trespass was made against him;" and "the pursuer believes avers that the said warrant did not bear to proceed and did not pro upon an information on oath that the pursuer was likely to abscon upon such an information on oath as is necessary, in terms of the a recited section, to entitle a Justice of the Peace to grant a warra apprehend without a previous summons. The pursuer had no inte of absconding or of refusing to appear in answer to a summons."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The apprehension of the pursuer and t him in custody, as set forth in the condescendence, were wrongful illegal, in respect that the warrant on which they took place was no preceded by a summons nor by an information on oath that the pu was likely to abscond. (4) The 35th section of the Summary Proce Act has no application to the present case, and it only applies to defe ejusdem generis with those particularly enumerated in it. (5) The sent action, in so far as it is founded on departure from the forms of cedure prescribed by the Day Trespass Act, is not one which is lim by that or any other statute.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The damages claimed being in respe alleged illegality of proceedings against the pursuer, and these proceed having been taken under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and pursuer having allowed more than two months to elapse without ra his action, the action is barred by the 35th section of the said Act.

Section 35 of the Summary Procedure Act is as follows:—"E action or prosecution against any Sheriff, judge, or magistrate, or ag any clerk of Court, procurator-fiscal, or other person, on account of anything done in any case instituted under this Act, shall be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen, unless a shorter period is fixed by the special Act, and not afterwards."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that this action is not excluded by the 35th section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864; and, before further answer, appoints the case to be put to the roll, with a view to the adjustment of issues for the trial of the cause."*

* "NOTE.—The provisions of the 35th section of the Summary Procedure Act, which require that actions of the present description should be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen, appear to the Lord Ordinary to be confined to things done in cases 'instituted under the Act.' Now, the matters here complained of relate to a warrant of immediate apprehension, which, as the Lord Ordinary reads the Act, is not made competent in all cases, but is, by the 6th section, authorised only where apprehension is otherwise competent. The question, therefore, whether the proceedings complained of were 'instituted under the Act' must, it is thought, be disposed of by the provisions of the Day Trespass Act, 2 and 3 William IV. c. 68, on which the complaint is founded. By the 11th section of that Act Justices are authorised to grant warrant for immediate apprehension only when there is 'reason to suspect, from information upon oath, that the party is likely to abscond.' But in the present case it does not appear that any such information was laid before the Justice. The warrant does not itself bear that there was, neither does the oath upon which the warrant purports to proceed; and in the statement upon which the application is rested it is not alleged that there was any intention on the part of the pursuer to abscond, or any apprehension in that respect upon the part of the petitioners. In these circumstances it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the warrant for the apprehension of the pursuer was an incompetent proceeding, inasmuch as it was not granted in compliance with the requirements of the Day Trespass Act.

"In the somewhat analogous case of the apprehension of a party as in meditatione fugæ, the application and relative deposition always bear that the creditor has reason to believe that the party means to leave the country; and where no such oath is taken the warrant cannot legally be granted—Robertson, 20th June 1812. Now, the Lord Ordinary sees no reason why, in a case of the present description, similar evidence that the provisions of the Day Trespass Act have been complied with should not be preserved in gremio of the warrant or in the proceedings. There is, however, not only no evidence ex facie of the proceedings in this case to the effect that the pursuer was likely to abscond; but it is not alleged on the part of the defenders in the record that any such information upon oath was laid before the Justice, while there is, on the other hand, a substantial allegation on the part of the pursuer that no such information upon oath was emitted upon the occasion. The Lord Ordinary has therefore come to the conclusion that the proceedings were not taken in compliance with the requirements of the Day Trespass Act, and were consequently not properly instituted in the sense of the 6th and 35th sections of the Summary Procedure Act.

"The question of relevancy cannot, in the view the Lord Ordinary takes of it, be at present satisfactorily disposed of, because,—although there may be cases in which an officer who merely executes an ex facie legal warrant, which is afterwards found to be illegal, has been held not to be liable in damages; and an agent may not in all cases be liable in damages for putting in force a warrant illegally obtained, if done by express directions from his employer,—there is in the present case a distinct allegation that both agent and officer were aware of the irregularity of the proceedings, and acted maliciously in obtaining and executing the warrant; and assuming this to be proved, the Lord Ordinary is not prepared to hold that they are not responsible. He has therefore, before answer on the question of relevancy, appointed issues to be given in with a view to their adjustment."

Murray v. Allan.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—There was enough before the magistrate to entitle him to suspect that the pursuer was likely to abscond. But even if the proceedings were not strictly in accordance with the statutory regulations, there was no such flagrant departure from them or such irregularity as to deprive the defenders of the protection of the statute. There was enough on the face of the complaint to entitle the Justice to grant the warrant. Although a person is not justified merely because he thinks he is doing what the statute authorises, yet if he acts in bona fide, and has some ground in reason to connect his own act with the statutory provisions, he will be held to have acted under the statute, and will be entitled to claim its protection. If the proceeding in this case was not entirely in accordance with the statutory provisions, it deviated so slightly from these provisions that it must be held to have been a proceeding under the statute; and therefore, by the 35th section of the Summary Procedure Act, this action should have been raised within two months after the proceedings complained of.[1]

The pursuer replied;—It is not enough to bring a proceeding under the protection of the statute that it bears on its face to be so, or that the party bringing the complaint believes it to be under the statute. The magistrate had no such information upon oath as could be held to be a reasonable ground for suspecting that the pursuer was likely to abscond, and therefore the proceeding was entirely contrary to the provisions of the statute. Even if the grounds of the complaint had happened to have been such as to point to the likelihood of the party absconding, the magistrate would have had no right on that account to have granted the warrant; for what the statute required was a separate oath to the effect that the party was likely to abscond, and not merely a general oath to the verity of the grounds set forth in the complaint. On these grounds this could not be held to be a case instituted under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and therefore the defenders were barred from pleading the 35th section of that Act.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action to recover damages for the illegal apprehension of the pursuer upon an alleged warrant granted by a Justice of the Peace of Aberdeenshire, bearing to be under the Day Trespass Act. The 11th section of this Act provides that "the Justice may summon the party charged to appear before himself, or any one or two Justices of the Peace, as the case may require, at any time and place to be named in such summons, and if such party shall not appear accordingly, then (upon proof of the due service of the summons by delivering a copy thereof to the party, or by delivering such copy at the party's usual place of abode to some inmate thereat, and explaining the purport thereof to such inmate) the Justice or Justices may either proceed to hear and determine the case in the absence of the party, or may issue his or their warrant for apprehending and bringing such party before him or them as the case may be, or the Justice before whom the charge shall be made may, if he shall have reason to suspect, from information upon oath, that the party is likely to abscond, issue such warrant, in the first instance, without any previous summons." Now, it is quite clear that in order to entitle a Justice to issue a warrant without a previous summons he must have reason to suspect that the party is likely to abscond, and the information which leads to this suspicion must be before him upon oath. So, when a warrant is issued without these conditions being complied with, it is irregular, and is not granted under the Act; and this is what is urged by the pursuer. He avers that the warrant was not in compliance with the terms of the Act, and was therefore illegal.

It is further provided by the 17th section of the Day Trespass Act that "all actions and prosecutions to be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of this Act shall be commenced within six calendar months after the fact committed, and not otherwise; and notice in writing of such action, and of the cause thereof, shall be given to the defender one calendar month at least before the commencement of the action." Now, the pursuer brought this action within one month, the time required after giving notice, and within the six months prescribed by the Day Trespass Act.

But he is met by the objection that the complaint was also brought under the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, which contains another and different limiting clause. The 35th section of that Act provides that "every action or prosecution against any Sheriff, judge, or magistrate, or against any clerk of Court, procurator-fiscal, or other person, on account of anything done in any case instituted under this Act, shall be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen, unless a shorter period is fixed by the special Act, and not afterwards." Now, this clause does not exempt any person from being accountable for wrong done under the Act, it merely limits the time during which the party aggrieved must take his remedy. In all cases like the present there would be no hardship in making the action be brought within two months, while it is extremely important that persons engaged in prosecutions should not have claims against them extending over an indefinite period. The provision is therefore of a beneficial character, and ought not to be subjected to a judaical interpretation. Giving full and fair effect to the provision, and having in view the object of the statute, we have to decide whether it applies to the case before us. The proceeding here is certainly instituted under the Summary Procedure Act. We are not left in doubt as to the meaning—"All proceedings for summary conviction for any offence, whether at common law or under any Act of Parliament, and all proceedings for the recovery of any penalty which may be sued for or recovered in a summary form, whether such proceedings are at the instance of a public or private prosecutor or complainer, may be instituted by way of complaint in one or other of the forms set forth in the schedule (A) to this Act annexed; and it shall not be necessary to mention in any complaint any Act of Parliament other than the Act declaring the offence for which a conviction is sought, or imposing the penalty or forfeiture which is claimed; and it shall be sufficient to refer to the Act or section of the Act founded on, without setting forth the enactment in words at length; and where it is necessary that any such complaint should be made upon oath of the complainer, or of a credible witness, such oath may be in the form of schedule (B) to this Act annexed." The form in schedule (A) is applicable to common law offences, and the form in schedule (B) to statutory offences. Here the prosecutor framed the complaint in terms of schedule (B), beginning with the important words "Under the Summary Procedure Act, 1864." But it is admitted that the first thing which was done was the irregularity of the Justice in issuing a warrant without any previous summons, and without having information upon oath that the party was likely to abscond. I assume that a wrong had been committed—that is, that there was here a miscarriage of justice, for which the pursuer would have been entitled to ask the verdict of a jury if the action had been brought in time. One might fancy cases brought under the Act, where the wrong was of such a nature that the limiting clause of the statute would not be held to apply at all. We have seen cases where the complaint had so little connection with the Act of Parliament that it would be a grievous wrong to apply the limiting clause. If a man, having obtained a warrant under the Act, proceeds illegally and by violence to apprehend the accused, and brings him before a Justice, the Act will not apply at all. People may go so absurdly and extravagantly wrong as to put themselves beyond the protection of the statute. Or, if he proceed to arrest and poind without an warrant, no one can doubt that he had no protection under the Act. In ord to plead the clause of the statute, the defender must shew that he was apparentl acting within its provisions. It is not easy to draw the line, but it is easy t describe extreme cases on either side. It is easy to imagine how the slip of pen might make the whole proceeding null and void. The question is to whi side of the line this case belongs. I have not much difficulty in saying that th case belongs to the latter class and not to the former. It is true that there w no separate oath from which the Justice might infer that the accused intend to abscond. But there was an oath to the verity of the complaint, which co tained statements of a peculiar kind. It states not only that the pursuers we illegally trespassing in pursuit of game, but also when they were required to t their names and places of abode they refused to tell their real names or plac of abode, or did give such a general description of his or their place or places abode as was illusory for the purpose of discovery." These facts make up pa of the statutory charge. But it appears to me that the statute contemplates separate oath that the deponent believes that the accused intended to abscon or an oath to facts on which such a belief is based. But can it be said here th the prosecutor has gone so extravagantly wrong as to put himself beyond th limiting clause of the statute? This was a very venial transgression of the Ac and I am therefore compelled to differ from the judgment of the Lord Ordinar and to hold that the action is excluded by the 35th section of the Summar Procedure Act.

Lord Deas.—This is a difficult and delicate question. We have here a pro ceeding instituted under the Summary Procedure Act and not under the Da Trespass Act. It is to the Summary Procedure Act that the protecting clau refers. Still we must look to what the Day Trespass Act requires in order t judge of the defenders' liability. The Day Trespass Act certainly meant to re quire that there should be an information before the Justice to enable him t judge whether the person was likely to abscond, and that information was to b upon oath. The proper course under the Act was that there should be an oat of credulity to that effect. The error committed was, that in place of requirin an oath of credulity the Justice seems to have inferred, from the whole circum stances, that the party was likely to abscond. The difficulty is that this infe ence was drawn from a statement which, although on oath, contains nothin more than a statement of what was essential to constitute the offence. There no doubt that this was an error. It is a difficult question whether it was suc an error as to take the proceedings out of the statute. I have always unde stood that the law laid down by Lord Denman and Mr Justice Williams i Cann v. Clapperton, June 13, 1839 (10 Adolphus and Ellis, 582), was correc and that mere good faith is not enough. There must be not only good faith, b grounds in reason for thinking that the statute had been complied with. O the whole, however, I am disposed to agree with your Lordship, that it was n so unreasonable for the Justice here to suppose that he was acting in complian with the statute as to deprive the proceedings of the benefit of the statutor protection.

Lord Ardmillan.—I am not able to take the same view as the Lord Ordina has taken of the question which has here arisen. This is an action of damag raised on the 13th May 1872, for an apprehension said to be unlawful on 15 November 1871. The proceeding in which the warrant for this apprehensi was issued commenced by a complaint which was and bears in terms to be und the Summary Procedure Act, at the instance of Lord Fife's Trustees. Th offence charged was under the "Day Trespass Act," and especially the 2d sectio and an oath of verity by a credible witness to the statements in the complai was produced to the Justice of Peace. On this the Justice granted warrant apprehend, which he is entitled to do under the 11th section of the Day Tr pass Act, "if he have reason to suspect, from information on oath, that the par is likely to abscond."

Murray v. Allan.

It is pleaded for the pursuer Murray that the warrant is bad, and the apprehension unlawful, because the Justice had no information on oath from which he was entitled to suspect that Murray was likely to abscond. The statute (the Day Trespass Act) does not require a separate oath in addition to the oath of verity, nor is it necessary that the oath bear in express words that the party is about to abscond, or is likely to abscond. It is enough if the oath of verity contains statements from which the Justice, reading and construing it fairly, has "reason to suspect" that "the party is likely to abscond."

Now, in this case the statements in the complaint and to which the oath of verity applies, were such as might have led and did lead the Justice to suspect "that Murray was likely to abscond," and he issued his warrant accordingly. The oath is to the truth of the complaint, and the complaint bears that "the said William Murray and Gordon Smith did both, or each or one or other of them, after being so required, refuse to tell their or his real name or names and place or places of abode, or did each or one or other or both of them give such a general description of his or their place or places of abode as was illusory for the purpose of discovery." He may or may not have drawn a correct inference under the circumstances. I do not say that the Justice was altogether correct in the inference which he did draw. It would have been a wiser and better course to have insisted on a separate oath, or at least a more explicit statement, in regard to the expectation or probability of Murray's absconding. But there were within the complaint, and within the oath of verity, some grounds for expecting or suspecting such a step on his part, and the Justice, on considering these grounds, recognised their sufficiency and granted his warrant. For the wrong said to have been done by apprehension under that warrant this action of damages has been brought.

The 35th section of the Summary Procedure Act is in the following terms:—"Every action or prosecution against any Sheriff, judge, or magistrate, or against any clerk of Court, procurator-fiscal, or other person, on account of anything done in any case instituted under this Act, shall be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen, unless a shorter period is fixed by the special Act, and not afterwards." This section does not exclude redress, or protect a wrongdoer, or sanction injustice. But it limits the period within which any prosecution can be raised. If this section here applies it is obvious that this "action or prosecution" is too late, and must be dismissed accordingly, for the "case" in which the thing complained of was "done" was commenced by a complaint bearing to be "under the Summary Procedure Act," and greatly more than two months have elapsed since the "cause of this action" arose. The only question, as I think, is, whether the 35th section of the Act applies; and that question involves the other question, whether the case was "instituted under the Act." I have no doubt that it was so instituted. On the face of this complaint it bears so to be. It came before the Justice in the form of a proceeding under the Act, and unless his conduct in granting the warrant on his own view of the oath of verity took the case out of the statute, it was a warrant granted—a something done—in a case instituted under the Act. To an action of damages such as this the protection of the statute especially applies; and some Judges who have doubted of its application to a suspension or process of review, where there was clearly an irregularity, had no doubt that it applied to an action of damages.

To administer aright this clause of limitation of action requires careful discrimination on the part of the Court, and some questions of difficulty may arise.

On the one hand, it is manifest that the clause of limitation and of protection is not required where there has been no error or irregularity of procedure. It is designed to meet the case, and to protect from prosecution after a limited time, where there has been irregularity. Therefore, to say that this warrant for apprehension, being irregular, is for that reason beyond the reach of the limitation and protection of the Act, is just to exclude the clause of limitation in every case, except where it is not required.

On the other hand, a mere colourable proceeding under the statute will not be within the protection. Nor will a silly belief—a foolish imagination—that a proceeding is in pursuance of the statute, or that a case is instituted under th statute, entitle a wrongdoer to the statutory protection.

Between these two classes of cases the case now before us is presented.

Unless cut out of the definition of "a case instituted under the Act," by th unjust and oppressive nature of the inference from the oath of verity, this ca is within the clause of limitation, and the defenders are now protected from th action of damages by the lapse of the period to which such prosecutions a limited.

Now, I am of opinion that the Justice was not acting oppressively or unjustl or in a manner grossly unreasonable, in drawing the inference which he did fro the oath of verity, and in granting warrant for apprehension. I agree with yo Lordship in thinking that he erred, but erred innocently, and that he ha some reasonable grounds, though not quite correct or adequate grounds, for takin the view which he did of the oath of verity. This is just the case contemplate as within the protection.

I therefore apply the 35th section to the case to which, as an action of damage I think it especially appropriate.

The result is, that in my opinion the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should l recalled, and the action dismissed.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall th interlocutor: Sustain the second plea in law stated for the defen ders, and in respect thereof dismiss the action, and decern: Fin the pursuer liable in expenses; allow an account," &c.

Edinburgh and Leith Sewerage Act, 1864, sec. 47—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, sec. 3—Supplementary Assessment—Owner—Sequestration.—The 47th section of the Edinburgh and Leith Sewerage Act 1864, enacts that "the owners of all lands, &c. any sewer, outfall, or drai from which shall, after construction of the said main and branch sewers an works, be connected with the same, shall be liable in payment to the commis sioners of a reasonable sum of money for the use of the said main or branc sewers;" and the 3d section of the General Police (Scotland) Act, 1862, incor porated therewith, declares that the word "owner" shall include joint owne &c., "or other person in the actual possession or receipt of the rents of ten ments," &c. Held, that a trustee in a sequestration was "owner" of the bank rupt's property in the sense of the 47th section, and that the commissioners wer not bound to claim in the sequestration an assessment which had been impose before the bankruptcy, the trustee being bound to pay it as a condition o his taking possession of the property, or drawing the rents.

2D DIVISION. Lord Jerviswoode. I.

BY sec. 47 of the Edinburgh and Leith Sewerage Act, 1864, it i enacted that "the owner of all lands, houses, or other property, an sewer, outfall, or drain from which shall, after construction of the sai main and branch sewers and works, be connected with the same, shall b liable in payment to the commissioners of a reasonable sum of mone for the use of the said main or branch sewers and works, which the com missioners are hereby authorised and required to fix and exact in respe of all such lands, houses, or other property; provided always that suc lands, houses, or other property shall not have been assessed for the ex pense of making such main or branch sewers or works; but if such land houses, or other property shall have been so assessed, and shall have bee built upon, enlarged, or altered after the assessment for making suc main or branch sewers and works was imposed and levied, the owners thereof shall be liable in payment to the commissioners of such reasonable sum of money as aforesaid.'" And by sec. 73,—"The said assessment or assessments shall, with the legal interest thereof, from the time when the same shall be declared payable, together with all expenses incurred in the recovery thereof, continue burdens on the lands and heritages liable for the same, or in respect of which the same shall be payable, but that only for three years from the date when the same shall be respectively payable as against bona fide singular successors or heritable creditors; provided always that nothing herein contained shall affect the legal recourse of persons paying such assessment or assessments and interest against such as are primarily liable for the same, or affect the rights and remedies of superiors for the recovery of their feu-duties and casualties."

By sec. 3 of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, which is incorporated in the Edinburgh and Leith Sewerage Act, it is enacted that "the word 'owner'" shall "include joint owner, fiar, life-renter, feuar, or other person in the actual possession or receipt of the rents of tenements, lands, and heritages, of every tenure or description, and the factor, agent, or commissioner of such persons, or any of them, or any other person who shall intromit with or draw the rents." And by section 42 of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 17 and 18 Vict. c. 91, also incorporated with the said Sewerage Act, it is enacted that "the word 'proprietor' shall apply to liferenters as well as fiars, and to tutors, curators, commissioners, trustees, adjudgers, wadsetters, or other persons who shall be in the actual receipt of the rents and profits of lands and heritages."

The commissioners, by certain resolutions, fixed 2s. 6d. per pound of rental as the reasonable sum to be paid by owners liable under the said 47th section for the use of the main or branch sewers and works, but under the proviso that where such owners were liable in respect of new buildings they should be entitled to deduct from the above sum the proportion of the original assessment for the expense of making the said main and branch sewers and works which they could instruct as having been paid from the ground before it was built upon. The original assessments imposed by the corporations of Edinburgh and Leith, upon owners of lands and heritages liable under section 68 of the said Act, for the expense of making the said main and branch sewers and works, amounted in whole to the like sum of 2s. 6d. per pound of rental; and assessments to this amount were levied from all such owners.

Oman, prior to his sequestration, was proprietor of certain subjects in Edinburgh containing sewers, which, since the construction of the main sewers, had been connected with them.

The commissioners, through their clerk, raised an action against Oman for the 2s. 6d. per pound in respect of the subjects belonging to him, under deduction of the original assessment paid for the ground, and on 24th November 1871 obtained decree for "1st, the sum of £35, 19s. 3d., in respect of premises situated in Drumdryan Street, Edinburgh, with interest thereon at five per centum per annum from 8th July 1869 until payment; 2d, the sum of £15, 19s. 8d., in respect of premises situated at Nos. 25, 27, 29, and 33 Brougham Street, Edinburgh, with interest thereon at five per centum per annum from 30th December 1870 until payment; and 3d, the sum of £7, 15s., in respect of premises situated at Nos. 7 and 9 West End Place, Edinburgh, with interest thereon at five per centum per annum from 18th February 1871 until payment."

On 9th November 1871 Oman had been sequestrated, and Mr Andrew Paterson was appointed his trustee, and on 9th December the commissioners served an additional notice on the defender for £44, being assessment on certain other subjects the property of Oman.

The commissioners now raised this action against Oman's trustee for the three sums contained in the decree, and the £44.

The defender stated,—(Stat. 4.) "On 13th January 1872 Mr M'Laren, the defender's agent, wrote to the pursuer that, before the defender could recognise the claim, the pursuer would require to lodge it with him, in terms of the Bankruptcy Act. The pursuer declined to do so, insisting in his right for payment in full, without any compliance with the provisions of the statute. Mr M'Laren subsequently wrote to the pursuer that the defender did not deny liability for the claim, but simply called upon him to lodge it in the usual way. Thereupon the pursuer raised the present action to compel the defender personally to make payment, without any compliance on the part of the pursuer with the provisions of the statute. The defender is merely realising the estate. He has as yet made up no statement of the claims of the creditors, neither has the statutory period arrived for his doing so, nor for making up, ranking, or paying any dividend. Farther, he has not as yet realised sufficient funds to meet the preferable claims; and, in particular, he has not had an opportunity of determining, as he is entitled to do, whether the claims of the pursuer are preferable or ordinary." (Stat. 6.) "The defender is willing to receive the pursuer's claim if lodged with him in terms of the said Bankruptcy Act, and, if it should appear well founded, to rank the same on the bankrupt estate in such a manner and to such an extent as may to him appear just."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender, as trustee on the sequestrated estates of John Oman, being owner and proprietor, within the meaning of "The Edinburgh and Leith Sewerage Act, 1864," of the properties and premises mentioned in the summons, is liable under section 47 of the said Act in payment of a reasonable sum in respect of the said premises for the use of the main or branch sewers and works belonging to the commissioners. (2) The reasonable sum so payable by the defender having been fixed by the commissioners in terms of the said Act the pursuer is entitled to decree, with expenses.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action being for payment of a debt due by the bankrupt is incompetent. Separatim, the pursuer cannot proceed by way of action to recover from the defender any sum for which he has already obtained decree. (2) The defender, as trustee in the sequestration, being entitled, in the first instance, to adjudicate upon and rank the claims of all the creditors, cannot, in the circumstances, be sued personally or otherwise for payment of the pursuer's claims. (3) The defender being merely trustee on Mr Oman's sequestrated estate is not liable to be sued, personally or otherwise, for any assessments imposed upon the bankrupt or his estate in terms of "The Edinburgh and Leith Sewerage Act, 1864;" and the pursuer was bound to have lodged and proved his claim in the sequestration, in terms of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856. (4) Mr Oman's properties not being liable for the assessments sued for, the defender is, in the circumstances, entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (5) The Court has no jurisdiction over the defender, at least in the first instance, as such trustee, in reference to any matter forming claims upon the bankrupt estate.

The Lord Ordinary (Jerviswoode) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, under a sound construction of the terms of 'The Edinburgh and Leith Sewerage Act, 1864,' founded on by the pursuer, the assessments imposed by virtue of said Act, in respect of the heritable subjects which belonged to John Oman, the bankrupt, and which now form part e defender then tendered a minute admitting "(1) that he had n the rents of the properties mentioned in the record due at the of Whitsunday last, the rents for the preceding term having been n by Mr Robert Forman, chartered accountant, the judicial factor on man's estates, who accounted for the same to the defender after his intment as trustee; (2) that the premises mentioned in the record in sewers, outfalls, or drains which have been connected with the s made by the pursuers, in terms of their Act of Parliament, after truction of the same; and (3) that the sums concluded for are reason- as against the party liable to pay the same, and that no part thereof been paid to the pursuer;" and the Lord Ordinary pronounced this er interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary allows a minute for the de- er to be received at the bar; and in respect thereof, and of the find- in the preceding interlocutor of 12th June current, Finds that the uer was not bound to have lodged a claim with the trustee on Oman's estrated estate: Decerns against the defender in terms of the conclu- s of the libel: Finds him liable to the pursuer in expenses," &c.

e argued;—The claim must be made in the sequestration. If pre- ble, it would be ranked as such. It was not preferable. It was a debt due by Oman, and fell to be ranked with his other debts. The tee was not "owner" in terms of the statute. He was merely an er appointed for realising the estate. Section 73 declaring assess- ts to be "burdens on the lands" only applied to the original assess- t. This was a supplemental assessment.

he pursuer argued;—The assessment was payable by the owner. ion 73 declared it to attach to the lands, or rather to the ownership, to be payable under the limitation therein mentioned by the owner he time being. The Legislature intended a readily found person to able. It did not intend that the commissioners should have to hunt he verus dominus, who might be abroad and could not be discovered. commissioners were not bound to claim in the sequestration. The ey was due as a condition of the trustee taking possession, and he d not rank or divide till he obtained such possession. The assessment reasonable in amount.[1]

RD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case has arisen out of a claim made by the clerk e Water of Leith Sewerage Commissioners against Mr Paterson, the trustee e sequestrated estate of Mr Oman, a builder. The action is brought under 17th section of the statute, in respect of four several sums, for three of which e was taken against the bankrupt himself; and with regard to the fourth, hich notice of its being due was given to the trustee himself after the estration. The defence stated by the trustee is, that in so far as the bankrupt had become liable the claim of the commissioners lies only against the s trated estate, and that they are only entitled to rank on the sequestrated making good a preferable claim if they have one. With regard to the sum, he substantially maintains the same defence, on the ground that, t the notice had not been given, the debt had emerged before sequestration. Lord Ordinary has found that the assessments imposed in virtue of the burgh and Leith Sewerage Act, in respect of the heritable subjects in qu are, in so far as properly imposed, preferable debts affecting the subjects selves, as well as the owner or proprietor, or other intromitter with the and that the defender, as trustee on the sequestrated estate, is owner an prietor of the subjects in question within the meaning of the said Act, and to payment of any sums due under the 47th section of the statute.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that in substance the interlocu right, though I do not entirely concur in the view that these payments ar ferable debts, or that they affect the subjects, so as to be in any way b upon them. My opinion is that they affect the trustee himself as ow terms of the 47th section and of the interpretation clause. My view do depend on any strict application of the proper assessment clauses. These c come towards the end of the Act, and extend from sections 68 to 81. The a body of rules for the imposition and payment of the necessary assess for the original construction of the works authorised by the Act, and th clear and precise. The machinery is as follows:—Commissioners having appointed, they are to fix the sewerage district dealt with by the Act, a define the portion lying within the Edinburgh and Leith municipal boun respectively. They are to determine the drainage works to be construct estimate and fix the sum required for their construction, and to apportio assessment to be levied between Edinburgh and Leith. The respective co tions are then authorised to levy assessments of such amount as shall be nec for paying the sums required, and that according to the yearly value of and heritages as established by the valuation-roll for the year. The liabil assessment is not limited to lands which derive advantage from the drain be executed, but land not used for building purposes is assessed at a lowe as is provided for by the 72d section. The 73d section, on which a great has been said, applies only to the assessments already mentioned. It pr that they shall remain burdens on the lands and heritages liable in the sa against singular successors, for a period of three years. Then section 76 c certain powers on the collector for the recovery of assessments. This an clauses adopted from the Police Act deal with the recovery of assessments. this code of rules stands quite clear of the provisions in the 47th section. the same time a consideration of them throws a good deal of light upo objects of the provisions of that last-mentioned section.

The object of section 47, which was most probably an interpolation aft Act had been framed, was to enable the commissioners to obtain a fair share cost of the drainage operations from the owners of agricultural and other su not built upon at the time the operations were performed or omitted in the a ment, but deriving benefit therefrom in consequence of subsequent buil Its provisions were, that the owners of all lands, houses, or other property sewer, &c. from which should be connected with the main or branch sewe structed under the Act, should be liable to the commissioners in a reaso sum of money, to be fixed by the said commissioners, for the use of said and branch sewers, &c., provided they have not already been assessed fo making of the said main or branch sewers, or had been assessed at the rate provided for in the assessment clauses.

In the case of Macknight v. Macgregors, referred to, it seems to have be cognised as the object of this clause that the commissioners had thereby po equalise the burden on the owners of houses built after the primary asses had been collected, and that on the owners of houses built before that date. to this point there is no difficulty. But here arises the question in the p case, namely, who is liable in the payment of that "reasonable sum," section 47, or, which is the same thing, who is owner in the sense of that se

he interpretation clause the word "owner" is defined by a reference to neral Police and Improvement Act, 1862," as the "person in the actual ı or receipt of the rents of lands and heritages, &c., and the factor, commissioner of such persons, or any of them, or any other person who omit with or draw the rents,"—that is to say, the person in possession and profits, whether in his own right as owner or in some fiduciary

Now, it has been argued to us that it is only the owner at the time payment of this "reasonable sum" becomes due that is liable under section. If this payment were an annual charge, like an assessment e Poor-Law Act, the analogy of which was referred to, I think there a great deal in this argument; but whether it be the primary assess- his supplementary payment of a "reasonable sum," the payments under are not annual prestations. They are payments once for all for the use of the property for the future. I think the "owner" in possession he having the benefit of the works. He may have his relief against his s prior owners, or he may not; we are not concerned with that ques- ıt he has received the benefit, and there is no reason why the public hould suffer from there having been some other person in the position of ner" who might have been previously sued. Whoever receives the benefit ıeld liable in payment. Therefore, without invoking the aid of the asses- ea, I think that the trustee on the sequestrated estate, as the owner in he Act, is liable to the commissioners in payment of all the sums sued for. ht have been a question whether, using the analogy of the 73d section, e, as a singular successor, would remain liable after three years. That does not arise here. The trustee is owner under section 47, and it is al that his possession commenced after the ascertainment of the sums even after action had been raised against the bankrupt. The trustee is the rents, the subjects have received benefit, and therefore the trustee , and that as primary debtor.

d section appears to me applicable to all assessments mentioned in the parts of the Act, and to the supplementary assessments made under the ion, as well as to the original assessment for making the sewers. The "the said assessment or assessments," and if these words are applicable reasonable sum of money" which can be charged under the 47th section, hing in the 73d section which limits them to the original assessment. to me unreasonable to hold that the 73d section does not apply to the ntary assessments, for the same reason which renders it just to limit ity for the general assessment to three years applies as strongly to the ntary assessments. They are both made for the same object, and why ity for the one should be limited and the other not is what I cannot see. the 73d section ascertains the quality of these impositions. They are ue "burdens on the lands and heritages" liable for the same. The urden" is there used in a special sense. It does not mean an heritable burden, but such a burden as runs with the lands and passes with their n. Whoever takes the lands is liable for the assessment, and I cannot see, ıy this special character should apply to the one set of assessments and not ier. Therefore, without saying that I altogether dissent from your Lord- w that this 73d section affords a strong analogy, I am inclined to stretch a d take the full benefit of the clause in settling the question now before us. owever this may be, there is a great deal in what your Lordship has whether the section is directly applicable to the supplementary assess- merely affords a strong analogy to guide us, the conclusion seems to me the person in possession of the lands takes them under the condition this assessment. That view exempts this claim from falling under the tion. The payment of the assessment is a condition of the trustee's on possession of the subject, so that he cannot sell or subdivide or dis- until he has made the payment.

LORD NEAVES.—I feel considerable difficulty as to the 73d section. I h not been able to make up my mind whether it applies or not. But whethe not, it seems to me clear that the pursuer's claim is well founded.

It is important to observe the nature and foundation of the claim. It is an assessment supplementary to the original assessment; and that considera is favourable to Lord Benholme's view, that the privileges of the original ass ment should be extended to the supplementary. Then a price is to be paid c for all for the benefit of these drainage works. It is not an annual assessm like a poor or police tax, for which the proprietor for the year can only be lia but it is a payment to be made once for all, giving a prospective and perpe right, and not arising from contract, but from circumstances and the natur the obligation. If it is not a continual obligation it is very difficult to se what time it can be held as incurred. The payment is to be made for the of the drains. Now, suppose the original proprietor never gets any use of th is he to be liable? I am not inclined to say that. It is more reasonable t the proprietor at the time the subjects get the use, and at which the com sioners realise the assessments, is liable. The intention of the Act is, th visible and accessible proprietor shall be liable; and the owner who for the t is enjoying the use is responsible. He can make his own bargain with th who come after him. The 73d section, although perhaps not literally applyi suggests that all the assessments laid on by the Act are burdens lying on lands, and are exigible from the party in possession for the time. On th grounds I think the trustee is liable.

I would not find, as the Lord Ordinary has done, that the payments are j ferable debts affecting the subjects. Even if they were, that would give a ri to sue the trustee. They are due by the trustee in virtue of his being owner ousin's child claiming as her heir-at-law, held (rev. judgment of Lord Ormidale), at by the term "heir-at-law" the testatrix did not mean to denote her heirs in bilibus, but her heir in heritage.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the first fi ing of the Lord Ordinary's first interlocutor, and in lieu ther find that, under a sound construction of the terms of 'The Ed burgh and Leith Sewerage Act, 1864,' founded on by the pursu the assessments imposed by virtue of said Act in respect of heritable subjects which belonged to John Oman, the bankru and which now form part of his sequestrated estate, are debts c by and exigible from the owner or proprietor thereof, or other int mitters with the rents of the same: Further, find that the defenc as trustee on said sequestrated estate, is owner and proprietor the said subjects within the meaning of the said Act; and wh it is not alleged by him that the heritable creditors have ente into possession of the said subjects, or any of them, he is, as su owner and proprietor, the party entitled to intromit with s rents: Quoad ultra adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordina Find the pursuer entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

THIS was an action of multiplepoinding at the instance of the trustees the late Mrs Jean Glen or Grant, afterwards Sillars, wife of Thomas llars, residing in Ayr, the fund in medio being the residue of her estate. By trust-disposition, dated 15th May 1852, Mrs Sillars, then Mrs rant, a widow, assigned and disponed to her trustees certain heritable operty particularly described, and her whole other property, heritable d moveable, inter alia, for the following purposes:—In the second ace, "immediately after my decease my said trustees shall sell and dis- se of my whole heritable subjects hereinbefore specially conveyed, and y whole other means and estate, heritable and moveable, of every escription." In the third place, "so soon as my whole means and state shall have been realised as above directed, I hereby direct my said rustees to make payment of the following legacies." . . . . In the ourth place, "the whole residue of my estate, after paying all expenses ncurred by my said trustees in the execution of the trust hereby created, I direct my said trustees to invest in good heritable or personal securities, r in Government stock, or in the stock of joint stock companies, and ut of the annualrent or interest or dividends arising thereupon to pay n aliment of 6s. weekly to Mrs Jessie Campbell or Norman, my aunt, at present residing with me, during all the days and years of her life." In the last place, "should the said residue, or any part thereof, remain unappropriated for the said weekly alimony at the death of the said Mrs Jessie Campbell or Norman, I hereby direct my said trustees to pay over the same to my heir-at-law, whom failing, to my next kin."

Mrs Grant was soon after married to Mr Sillars, with whom, on 5th June 1852, about three weeks after the date of her trust-disposition, she entered into an antenuptial contract of marriage, by which, subject to a liferent to her intended husband, she disponed to "herself and the children to be procreated of the said intended marriage, whom failing, to herself and her heirs and assignees whomsoever," the heritable property particularly described and conveyed by the trust-disposition. Mrs Sillars died in 1853 without issue. Mr Sillars survived her, but died in 1871. There was a residue of her estate after paying the legacies, and providing for the annuity to her aunt.

The claimant, William John Stewart, son of a cousin of the testatrix, claimed the residue as her heir-at-law.

The Rev. John Glen and others, cousins-german of the testatrix, claimed it as her next of kin.

The Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, on a sound construction of the trust-disposition of the late Mrs Sillars, her next of kin, the claimants the Reverend John Glen, Miss Margaret Glen, and Mrs Janet Watson Glen or Napier and her husband, for his interest, are entitled to the fund in medio: Therefore ranks and prefers said claimants in terms of their claim, and decerns: Repels the claim for William John Stewart, and decerns: Finds no expenses due to or by either party."*

* "NOTE.—The question which the Lord Ordinary has had to determine in this case is, whether the claimants, who stand in the position of Mrs Sillars' next of kin, are entitled to be preferred to the fund in medio, being the residue of that lady's means and estate, preferably to the competing claimant Mr Stewart, who has the character of heir-at-law.

"This question the Lord Ordinary has felt to be attended with considerable

He argued;—"Heir-at-law" is a singular term. It must be i preted in its ordinary meaning, and the claimant being her heir-at-la the ordinary meaning of the word, fell to be preferred.

The next of kin argued;—The testatrix must have meant heir o body, and having left no heir of her body the claimants fell to be ferred as her next of kin. She could not have meant heir-at-law, c provision to the next of kin would be meaningless. There never have been a failure of an heir-at-law as long as there were next of This reading was rendered more apparent by her marriage-con entered into three weeks after the date of her trust-disposition. she destined the same residue as was dealt with in her disposition t "heirs and assignees whomsoever." difficulty, owing to the peculiar terms in which the bequest of her residu been expressed by the testatrix. By her settlement, which was execut 1852, she directed her trustees, 'immediately' after her decease, to sell an pose of her whole estate, heritable and moveable, and this was accordingly She then directed that from the proceeds of her estate her debts and v legacies should be paid, as well as an aliment of 6s. weekly out of the resi her estate to Mrs Jessie Campbell or Norman; and in the event of any p the residue remaining 'unappropriated for the said weekly alimony at the of the said Mrs Jessie Campbell or Norman,' she directed her trustees 't over the same to my heir-at-law, whom failing, to my next kin, and that first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas that shall occur six months aft death.'

"Who did she mean by her 'heir-at-law' and 'next kin'? At the time death the claimant Mr Stewart was technically and in the strict legal sen heir-at-law, and the other claimants were then her next of kin. But Mr S is not so near in propinquity to her as the other claimants; and it is obvious from the terms of her settlement that the testatrix neither intend contemplated that any lands or other heritable property should be preserv or should descend as such among, her successors. On the contrary, it i from the instructions she gave, to the effect that immediately on her dea trustees were to sell and dispose of her heritable subjects, that she intend contemplated that her succession was to be treated as entirely moveabl this view it does not appear to the Lord Ordinary to be an unnatural or st interpretation to hold that by the expression 'heir-at-law' she in reality her heir or heirs in mobilibus. In any other view her settlement wo irrational. It is impossible that her next of kin, in the ordinary sense c expression, could succeed, failing her heir-at-law, for she could never fail t an heir-at-law so long as she had next of kin. It rather appears, then, Lord Ordinary that the testatrix must have intended by the expression 'l law' her heir or heirs entitled by law to succeed to the residue of her estat verted, as she had directed it to be, immediately on her death, into money that by the expression 'next kin' she must have referred to persons who not by law be entitled to succeed to her ab intestato, such as her materna tions, or her relations by the half blood, rather than those technically the strict sense, and having the legal character of her 'next of kin.'

"The Lord Ordinary is not aware of any precedent exactly in point present case, but he may refer to M'Laren on Wills, secs. 726-7-8, for cases which he thinks support and are illustrative of the principles of co tion upon which he has proceeded in deciding the present.

"The Lord Ordinary has considered it proper in this case to allow each to bear their own expenses, in respect a judicial determination of the ma dispute was rendered indispensable in consequence of a difficulty created testatrix herself."

Nov. 29, 1872. Sillars' Trustees v. Stewart and Others.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When I read the interlocutor and note of the Lord dinary his construction struck me at once as not altogether a satisfactory one. s Lordship construes the term "heir-at-law" to mean "next of kin" and the m "next kin" to mean relations by the mother's side, not next of kin. The ficulty which the Lord Ordinary found was to arrive at some meaning attributle to "next kin" that should distinguish it from heir-at-law, when so interted. I am of opinion that we cannot read the destination as so construed.

It has been stated that according to our canon of construction "heir-at-law" a flexible term, and may bear reference to heritage or moveables, and be interted as heir in heritage, or executors in moveables, as the case may be. That sound enough in the general case as applied to the term heir; although perhaps e term heir-at-law has a more direct tendency towards the heir in heritage. ut there remains the question, whether it is the construction applicable here.

The property of this lady consisted almost entirely of heritage, and the direcion given to the trustees to sell was not so much with the purpose of converting he succession into moveables as of providing funds to meet certain purposes of he trust. It was therefore not unnatural that she should wish her heir in eritage to succeed to the residue; and when I find the term "heir-at-law" used a contradistinction to "next kin" I cannot hesitate to read it in that sense. The case of Cathcart[1] which Lord Cowan mentioned is much in point. The ound of doubt suggested is that the heir in heritage could not fail as long as here were next of kin, and therefore the conditional institution would have no eaning as a conditional institution. It certainly could not; but I am not clear hat as a substitution the destination might not have effect, or at least might not ave been supposed by the testatrix to have effect. It may fail, as substituions in moveables often do; but that can be no reason for refusing effect to words which, in the collocation in which they stand, have a definite meaning as echnical terms.

LORD COWAN.—There is undoubtedly a difficulty in the construction of this bequest, but looking at the whole terms of the deed I am satisfied that the Lord Ordinary has fallen into error. I put out of view altogether the marriage-contract, and think its date quite immaterial. I wish this to be clearly understood in explaining the ground of my opinion. I likewise put entirely out of consideration the imaginary difficulty raised on the use of the expression "next kin," instead of "next of kin." I do not think there is anything in that, one way or the other.

The question is, what is the meaning of the destination clause. I humbly think it all-important that the succession of this lady was heritage. Her instructions to her trustees to sell were plainly with the object of obtaining funds to fulfil the fourth purpose of the trust. And the meaning and intention of this destination of the balance or residue was, as I think it may be fairly presumed, to give it to the person who would have succeeded to the heritage had not a sale been necessary to obtain funds for the other purposes of the testatrix. The words are very explicit—"to my heir-at-law,"—and I can see no good reason for refusing them full effect. It has been said that, in that view, the addition of the words, "whom failing, to my next kin," is unintelligible, and can bear no reasonable construction at all. I am not satisfied of that. I can imagine circumstances in which they would be susceptible of a meaning, viewing them as substitutional. Say that the residue had been lent out by the trustees, as they were entitled to do, on heritable security, and that the heir-at-law after succeeding left the money thus invested and died intestate, would not the testatrix's next of kin have taken under this substitution to the exclusion of the heir's next of kin? But in truth we are not entitled to void a clear destination like this in the way attempted. The heir-at-law is the person whom the law recognises as the legal representative in any succession. It may very well be that the testatrix, looking to the possibility of a number of brothers and sisters succeeding, intended the succession to go to the eldest son, and failing him to the other children equally. But it is quite unnecessary to enter upon such speculations; the ground upon which I place my judgment is that the testatrix has declared, and must be held to have intended to favour, the heir who would have succeeded in heritage, had her direction to sell not been necessary for the execution of the trust; and in the light of that intention there is no difficulty in reading her destination.

[1] Cathcart v. Cathcart, May 26, 1830, 8 S. 803.

No. 26.

LORD BENHOLME.—This case seems to me a clear one. I am not inclined to give the same weight as the Lord Ordinary has done to Mr Paterson's argument that no case can be supposed which this lady could have in view in which the substitution could take effect, as there never could be a failure of an heir in heritage as long as there was next of kin. We are not called on to encounter that difficulty; we need only ask ourselves, is there an heir-at-law; and if so, the destination to next of kin is avoided. Heir-at-law is a singular term, and designates that individual who at law would have been entitled to take heritage ab intestato. Is there such a one in existence? The litigant who, under the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, has been found unsuccessful, is such. Had the term been "my heirs" it might have taken its meaning from the nature of the succession, but the term "heir-at-law" is different. In short, the Lord Ordinary has fallen into error in trying to remove a difficulty which we are not bound to solve.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot doubt that on a natural reading of this deed heir-at-law means heir in heritage. It is said that cannot be, as there never can be a failure of an heir in heritage as long as there are next of kin, and that heir-at-law must mean heirs in mobilibus. If that be so, there arises this other difficulty that heirs in mobilibus and next of kin are identical, and to get rid of that it is said that next of kin may mean the maternal relations. The Lord Ordinary seems to think that this is the meaning, but it seems to me a strained interpretation.

I am of opinion that heir-at-law means the heir in heritage, and in that view I think we are arriving at a conclusion quite consistent with the whole deed. The testatrix does not say that she wishes her property to be treated as moveable; on the contrary, she allows investments on heritable bonds. What she says is, "I am obliged to turn my houses into money in order to provide the weekly allowance I have given to Mrs Norman, but after providing for that allowance I wish the residue to go to my heir-at-law."

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Alter the interlocutor complained of: Find that on a sound construction of the trust-disposition of the late Mrs Sillars, her heir-at-law, William John Stewart, is entitled to the fund in medio: Therefore rank and prefer him and his mandataries in terms of his claim: Repel the claim of the Rev. John Glen, Miss Margaret Glen, and Mrs Janet Watson Glen or Napier, and decern: Find no expenses due."

In a sequestration a trustee resigned office before ing payment of his account. After a new trustee had been appointed the rupt offered a composition to his creditors. The Sheriff approved of the osition, after receiving a report by the trustee, in which he stated that the rupt and his cautioner had offered to the first trustee a bill for £20 in full s claim for £60, and that the commissioners and the reporter thought the reasonable, and that the reporter was satisfied therewith. 1ST DIVISION. Sheriff-substitute of Edinburgh.

UGH MILLER, C.A., was elected trustee on the sequestrated estate of liam Taylor Keith, who was sequestrated on 29th April 1872. Mr Miller ng resigned, Mr J. D. Ferrie was appointed trustee in the sequestra- , and on 21st August a meeting of creditors agreed to accept an offer he bankrupt of a composition of 1s. in the pound. On the following Mr Miller wrote to the new trustee enclosing his account for law nses in the sequestration, amounting to £42, 19s. 11d., and the unt due to him for outlays and trouble amounting to £17, 5s. 6d., requested him to arrange for a settlement of these before granting his rt as trustee to enable the bankrupt to carry through his discharge.

y sec. 141 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), s provided that "before the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff shall pro- nce the deliverance approving of the composition the commissioners l audit the accounts of the trustee, and ascertain the balance due to y him, and fix the remuneration for his trouble, subject to the review he Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, if complained of by the trustee, the krupt, or any of the creditors; and the expense attending the seques- ion and such remuneration shall be paid or provided for to the satis- ion of the trustee and commissioners before such deliverance is nounced."

he trustee (Ferrie) reported to the Sheriff that his account had been ited by the commissioners, the balance ascertained, and his remunera- fixed, and that the expenses, so far as the reporter's trusteeship was rned and the expense of taking out the sequestration, had been paid rovided for to his satisfaction and that of the commissioners.

Ir Miller objected before the Sheriff that his expenses had not been ided for in terms of the 141st section of the Act. The Sheriff milton) having, on 30th October, superseded consideration of the appli- n for discharge, the trustee (Ferrie) lodged an additional report, which —"The trustee reports that since submitting his previous report as he acceptance of the offer of composition by the bankrupt he had d a meeting of the commissioners on the estate, which was held of date (7th November 1872), at which an offer was made by the bank- (Mr Keith), to grant his bill for £20 sterling, payable at four months the date of his discharge, signed by himself and the cautioner, for his position, in full of all expenses incurred by Mr Hugh Miller, C.A., the er trustee, including his own commission and outlays, under reserva- of all Mr Keith's pleas against the charges of his former trustee, &c. commissioners on the estate (of whom a quorum was present at the ting) thought the proposal reasonable, and approved of it. . . . . reporter respectfully submits and reports to your Lordship that he considers the proposal for the settlement by the bankrupt of the expenses incurred by the former trustee to be reasonable, and that he is satisfied therewith."

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Sheriff-substitute having considered the foregoing report, minute of meeting of creditors, and bond of caution therein referred to, together with the trustee's additional report and relative productions, and having heard the parties on 30th October last, and again since the lodging of said additional report, Finds that the offer of composition, with the security therein mentioned, has been duly made, and is reasonable, and has been unanimously accepted by the creditors or mandataries of creditors assembled at said meeting: Therefore approves of the said offer with the security; but before granting a discharge, appoints the bankrupt to appear and emit the statutory declaration."*

Mr Miller appealed, and argued that the report approved by the Sheriff-substitute was not in conformity with the provisions of the statute.

The respondent argued;—(1) The appellant had no locus standi under the 141st section of the Act. The question whether he had any remedy against the present trustee or the bankrupt was not before the Court. (2) The report and resolution of the commissioners were in conformity with the statute, and could not be interfered with.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are a great many suspicious features in this sequestration. The first remarkable circumstance in its history is, that while a large apparent majority of the creditors claiming voted against the appellant when he was a candidate for the trusteeship, he was nevertheless declared duly elected, on the ground that a large body of the creditors who voted against him had no good claims. The next step was the examination of the bankrupt, in the course of which the Sheriff-substitute found it necessary to send him to prison, because he would not answer a question regarding the disposal of considerable sums of money which had recently come into his hand. When this matter was brought before the creditors on the report of the trustee they divided. One motion was made that the trustee's report be approved of, and another that it should not be approved of, in respect that in the opinion of the creditors the bankrupt had given a full and satisfactory statement of his affairs so far as was in his power, and that his examination had been protracted and oppressive, and was being carried on by parties having no claim against the estate. The second motion was carried by a majority in value of £1593 against £630—the creditors who voted for the motion which was carried being substantially the same who had voted for the unsuccessful trustee. In consequence of the support he had thus obtained the bankrupt petitioned for liberation, which was refused by the Lord Ordinary. The bankrupt reclaimed against that decision, and by that time the trustee, Mr

* "NOTE.—At the hearing on 30th October Mr Macara, W.S., appeared for Mr Hugh Miller, C.A., formerly trustee in the sequestration, and objected that the expenses incurred during Mr Miller's tenure of office, including his remuneration, had not been paid or provided for, in terms of the 141st section of the Bankrupt Act. As the objection appeared to be a relevant one under the statute and was in point of fact borne out by the terms of the trustee's report, the Sheriff-substitute was unable at once to pronounce a deliverance approving of the offer of composition, and superseded consideration of the application for discharge until the bankrupt should arrange, to the satisfaction of the trustee and commissioners, for the settlement of the expenses referred to. This has now been done, as appears from the additional report lodged by the trustee, and the minute of meeting of commissioners therein referred to and produced.

"The Sheriff-substitute would have hesitated to sustain Mr Miller's title to oppose the bankrupt's discharge upon any other than the special ground above mentioned."

ller, finding that he had no funds in his hands, resigned his office. In consence of that the bankrupt got the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor recalled in ence, and thus obtained liberation, which, I think, is very much to be retted. The trustee then very properly, upon the 22d August, sent in his ount to the new trustee, and, in his letter sent therewith, said—"You will ase arrange the settlement of this account before granting your report as trus-to enable the bankrupt to carry through his discharge." Nothing was done furtherance of that request. But an offer of composition was received, enter-ined, and accepted by the creditors, and the new trustee had reported to the eriff that everything was in order, and, among other things, that the trustee's ount had been provided for, and there was nothing to prevent the bankrupt m obtaining his discharge. It was quite impossible, looking to the course of oceedings in this sequestration, to doubt that this was mere revenge against r Miller for his having done his duty under the sequestration. If it were ssible under the Bankruptcy Act that such proceedings should be successful it ould be very much to be regretted. But I see no reason to doubt that the tatute has effectually provided against such a result. It provides that before any leliverance can be given approving of a composition "the commissioners shall udit the accounts of the trustee, and ascertain the balance due to or by him, nd fix the remuneration for his trouble, subject to the review of the Lord Ordi-ary or the Sheriff, . . . and the expense attending the sequestration and uch remuneration shall be paid or provided for to the satisfaction of the trustee and commissioners before such deliverance is pronounced." Now, it was contended that the only account which can be audited, and the only remuneration which can be fixed, and the only accounts or expenses that require to be paid or provided for under the 141st section of the Act, are those due to the existing trustee at the time when the audit takes place. Nothing could be more unreasonable than such a construction of the statute. That trustee may have been in office only for a week or two, while the sequestration might have endured for years. In what particular form the accounts of a previous trustee should be audited was a matter of little importance. I should think the natural way would be for the existing trustee to embrace the whole in his own accounts, so that the whole should be considered together, and the accounts provided for before the sequestration was brought to an end. But if he do not choose to do so, it cannot be supposed that the previous trustee cannot have his accounts audited.
I am quite clearly of opinion that the commissioners at this stage have to deal with the accounts of all trustees who may have been appointed in the sequestration. Hence the interlocutor of the Sheriff will not do. The Sheriff-substitute at first seemed to have been impressed himself with the difficulty arising under this clause of the statute, but he had been satisfied by what was subsequently done. Now, that which was done afterwards was not that which is required by the statute. The statute requires the commissioners to audit the accounts, to ascertain the balance which was due to the trustee, if any, and to fix his remuneration; and further, after that is fixed, it is to be paid or provided for to the satisfaction of the trustee or commissioners before any deliverance is pronounced. Now, what was done here was this—the commissioners met and had submitted to them a proposal by the bankrupt to grant bill along with the cautioner for the composition of £20 to Mr Miller in full of his claim of £60, 5s. 5d., payable at four months from the date of his discharge. Mr Miller did not accept that offer, and it would have been very strange if he had, looking to the amount of his claim. The only question that remains is, whether that minute records a sufficient compliance by the commissioners with the requirements of the 141st section of the statute. It appears to me that not one of the things required by that section has been done. The commissioners allowed the bankrupt and his cautioner to dictate to the former trustee what he was to receive, and I am therefore of opinion that we must find that the former trustee's accounts have not been audited, the balance has not been ascertained and his remuneration has not been fixed, that there has been no payment, or provision made for payment of the balance due to him in terms of the 141st section of the Bankruptcy Act, and that therefore the offer cannot be accepted.

Nov. 30, 1872. Lawson v. Lawson's Trustees.

Process—Leave to Appeal—48 Geo. III. c. 151, sec. 15.—An action was raised by the trustees of a deceased partner of a firm for count and reckoning as to his interest in the firm. The remaining partners averred that by certain letters produced an agreement had been entered into between the firm and the partner, by which he ceased to be a partner, and became entitled only to an annuity from the firm. The Court unanimously held that the letters did not form a concluded agreement, and ordered production of the balance-sheets of the firm, and the deceased partner's account with the firm. The firm presented a petition craving leave to appeal, and offered to secure payment of the annuity to the family of the deceased pending the appeal. Petition (Lord Benholme diss.) refused.

2D DIVISION. R.

THE trustees of the deceased Andrew Lawson, seedsman, Edinburgh, brought an action against the petitioners, partners of the firm of Peter Lawson and Son, seedsmen there, concluding for count, reckoning, and payment as to the interest of Mr Andrew Lawson as a partner of that firm.

The defenders alleged that by certain letters, which were produced, an agreement had been entered into between Mr Andrew Lawson and the firm some time previous to Mr Andrew Lawson's death, by which he ceased to be a partner, and became only entitled to an annuity of £300 per annum.

After certain procedure the Court unanimously pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the letters founded on did not constitute a concluded agreement between the late Andrew Murray Lawson and the defenders, and before further answer ordain the defenders to produce in process, 1st, certified copy of the company's balance-sheet prepared and signed by the partners in 1867; 2d, certified copy of any balance-sheet prepared and signed in 1868; 3d, copy of the account of Andrew Murray Lawson with the firm as it stood at the time of his death on the 11th of December 1869, reserving all questions of expenses."

The defenders, the present petitioners, asked leave to appeal, as required by the 15th sec. of the Act 48 Geo. III. c. 151.

They argued;—If the alleged agreement was sustained no further inquiry would be necessary. The Court were always tender of allowing an examination of the books of a firm, and the production ordered by the rlocutor complained of was only introductory to a more complete examination of the petitioners' books. Arrangements would be made by ich the petitioners would guarantee the continuance to Mr Lawson's ily of the £300 per annum pending the appeal.

The trustees argued;—Had Mr Lawson been alive he would have been itled to the production complained of. His family ought not to be ced in a worse position through his death. It would be in the power the Court to refuse any farther examination of the books of the firm if should appear to be unnecessary and injurious to the firm.

Lord Cowan.—The exercise of the power committed to us, to give or withhold ve to appeal in cases of this sort, is always a delicate matter, and is to be lged of according to the circumstances of each particular case. As your Lordips will recollect, in the case of the Western Bank[1] we some years ago made a mit to an accountant as we have done here, the result of which was foreseen be a long accounting, but which was essential to our proceeding with the case. he petition for leave to appeal at that stage was refused. It appeared at first ght hard upon the parties, who thought themselves aggrieved by the remit. t the House of Lords in no way interfered with our discretion. In another se, that of Bell of Enterkine, 3d November 1868, 7 Macph. 49, the petition to peal was refused, because in our opinion it was premature, as there remained legal question arising after the domicile had been settled and disposed of bere the accounting should take place. The petition was refused because the parties uld not have that point settled first, but leave to appeal would have been granted d it been applied for at that subsequent stage. In this case I am very clear that e should, in the exercise of our discretion, refuse this application. The interlocutor proposed to be taken to review, while it negatives the defence of concluded ttlement, does not necessarily lead to any protracted accounting. Indeed I am ot at all satisfied that even if the judgment we have pronounced were to be reersed, the limited order that we have made would be recalled. I think it is one e were entitled to make in any view of the case. We have not ordered a neral accounting, as the Lord Ordinary did. Had that been the case, there ould, I admit, be more ground for the application, and if after we have seen the cuments which we have ordered to be produced we see cause to order a general ccounting, it will be for consideration, should the application be renewed, hether or not it should be granted then. I can see no objection whatever to se productions ordered being made, and whatever may be the result I do not nsider that at the present stage we should be exercising a wise and just discretion, aving due regard to the interests of the other party, in permitting an appeal hich would hang up the case for two years at least.

As to the fear expressed by the defenders of a public exposure of their affairs, think it is quite groundless. The productions are to be made to us; we are ot the public, and there is no reason why they should go further.

Lord Benholme.—I am of a different opinion. It appears to me that if our dgment is reversed there will be an end of this litigation, and a settlement tween the parties on a different basis than if our order stands; because in that se there will be a quick mode of ascertaining the rights of parties indeendently of any investigation.

It has been suggested by Lord Cowan that we do not do much harm by ordering these partial productions, but it seems to me they are only introductory to more full examination, which will be shut out as being unnecessary in case is alleged agreement is held good.

Now, in regard to the respective dangers or embarrassment to the parties spectively according as the appeal is admitted or refused, there is no equality. n the one hand these children are to receive the £300 a-year pending the appeal, while if the defenders are once compelled to produce their books, a danger or damage they may sustain is irremediable. I am always tender the rights of companies where they state a plea which, if well founded, wo supersede the necessity of minute and detailed investigation into accounts. I think we ought to grant leave to appeal.

LORD NEAVES concurred with LORD COWAN.

LORD JUSTICE CLERK.—Though I am satisfied to refuse this application I not quite so confident in my opinion as the majority of your Lordships. T general rule against giving leave to appeal in the case of merely interlocut judgments is founded on strong grounds of expediency, and satisfactory reas must be shewn by the applicant why appeal should be allowed.

Now, this judgment is essentially interlocutory. If I could agree with L Benholme that though in form differing from the course taken by the L Ordinary we are in reality just paving the way for the general account which he has ordered I should then think with him that there was n reasons for allowing appeal. But I think it right to make it fully und stood that the very opposite view was present in my mind when I fram this order for production. It was exactly because I thought the result of t order would not necessarily lead to a general accounting that I thought advisable that we should make it. This is an action by the representatives a deceased partner against the remaining partners in a concern. Their c tract of copartnery specially fixes the last balance-sheet as that which shall termine the rights of such representatives. There may be very good reas why the representatives who are not themselves partners should not be allow to see beyond such last balance-sheet. On the other hand, when the balan sheets and accounts are produced, there may be circumstances arousing suspici or satisfying us that we must get behind the last balance-sheet in order to justice between the parties. The question we had to consider was, whet there was an agreement excluding the representatives from the sight even that last balance-sheet. We have found that there was no completed agreeme But even if their had been such an agreement as that sought to be establish I see nothing in it which could prevent the representatives seeing that balan sheet in question. Before Andrew Murray Lawson could have been asked sign a formal agreement based on the letters in question he must have been titled to examine the balance-sheets himself, and under these circumstance did not appear to me that the surviving partners could resist the product called for by our last judgment. I therefore think it would be wrong to ha up the case at its present stage for an indefinite time. I do not wish in the le to say what may be the result of the production of the last balance-sheet of t firm, or what we may then do. All these questions remain entire.

THE COURT refused to grant leave to appeal.

take all works necessary for the drainage of the districts under their supervision; and by sec. 97 it is enacted,—"In case any local authority shall refuse or neglect to do what is herein or otherwise required by law of them, or in case any obstruction shall arise in the execution of this Act, it shall be lawful for the Board, with the approval of the Lord Advocate, to apply by summary petition to either Division of the Court of Session, or during vacation or recess to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, which Division or Lord Ordinary are hereby authorised and directed to do therein, and to dispose of the expenses of the proceedings, as to the said Division or Lord Ordinary shall appear to be just." And by section 3 it is declared that the word "Board" shall signify the "Board of Supervision for the Relief of the Poor in Scotland."

The Board of Supervision presented this petition and complaint against the local authority of Montrose, on the narrative that the drainage of the burgh was extremely defective, and the effluvia from the sewage highly injurious to the health of the inhabitants, and that although the subject had been frequently before the local authority they had refused to improve the drainage, and praying the Court to find "that the local authority have refused or neglected to do what is required of them in the said Act, or otherwise by law, and that their refusal or delay to carry out a proper system of drainage in the burgh of Montrose is an obstruction in the execution of the Act; and to remit to a man of skill to report upon the drainage of the said burgh; and upon said report being returned, to ordain the local authority to execute such works as shall be considered necessary to effect the adequate drainage of the burgh, or to give such other remedy; or do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper."

Answers were lodged for the local authority, in which they stated that they were a newly elected body, that they were willing and anxious to carry out a complete system of drainage in the burgh, but that they craved the Court to allow them a reasonable time to take steps for that purpose.

The Board argued that the local authority had shewn, by their previous conduct, that they would do nothing unless compelled.

The local authority argued, that they were endeavouring to discover the most suitable system of drainage for the burgh, and that they were anxious to have such carried out. Under the statute the Board of Supervision had no right to complain, unless there was "obstruction" to the carrying out of the Act. There had been none such. At all events, the local authority were entitled to a reasonable time to discover the most suitable system, and to have it executed.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am sure your Lordships have no desire to assume the functions of the local authority, nor to do anything which might appear to be unreasonable towards a body of that nature. But the statutory right which the Board of Supervision have in this application exercised for the first time is one very important for the public interest, and I do not find that there is any question raised in the answers about its competency. An application such as this is, however, only the ultimate remedy. The respondents, in their answers, state that they, a newly elected body, are willing and anxious to promote a complete system of drainage, such as to allow them a reasonable time to take steps for that purpose. I think that course is a proper one. We are aware that a popularly constituted body like the local authority cannot move with great expedition in such a matter. We cannot dismiss the application, but, after the assurances we have received, I think we should appoint them within three months to report what steps they have taken with this important object.

Lord Cowan.—The power conferred on the petitioners to apply to this Court, in order to enforce proper drainage, is of the utmost importance to the and the operations sought to be enforced by this petition require to be v sidered, and it is right to see if the application is justifiable, and that t properly executed. Mr Shand argues that the Board of Supervision l power to come to this Court unless there is obstruction to the drainag tions being carried through. The words of the Act, however, are—"in c local authority shall refuse or neglect to do what is herein or otherwise r by law of them." Neglect is sufficient to entitle the Board to come i That there has been delay here in doing what is necessary for the sanit dition of the burgh there can be no doubt, but the causes of that del been fully stated on the part of the local authority; and the course whi Lordships propose will bring matters into the condition which the healtl community requires. Since a specific scheme is referred to we will dela how it is being carried out.

Lord Benholme.—This petition raises a question of great importance the first application of the kind presented by the Board of Supervision. not object to what your Lordship proposes; and in making an observati the peculiar position in which this local authority is placed I must not as differing from the course proposed.

The burgh of Montrose has been always considered a peculiarly healtl of residence. It has a remarkable basin of water in its neighbourhood and emptying with the tide, causing a great body of water to pass up an alternately with great force and rapidity through a narrow channel, w spanned by a drawbridge. This creates a sort of natural drainage, or, a a motion of the atmosphere, to which some think the peculiar healthines burgh is due. I do not make that observation to suggest a doubt as to t priety, or even necessity, of a regular system of drainage, or to insinua the Board of Supervision have been premature in their application; but t that we should proceed with peculiar tenderness in dealing with these commissioners. Because it may be extremely difficult for men to de what on the whole is the best system of drainage for the burgh. The b which I have referred, while it seems to suggest a facility of drainage, a gests an inconvenience; for while the sewerage at one time of the tide be rapidly swept down into the sea, at another it might be swept up i basin and be deposited at low tide upon its dry area. It will be extreme cult to connect the proposed drainage with the sea.

Farther, I understand that some attempt is being made to utilise the d by irrigating an extensive links or sandy surface belonging to the town, might afford a remuneration for the expense of the drainage operations practicability or possibility of this seems another reason why full time be given to the local authority to consider the best mode in which th can be done. The question of time is not of much consequence in this the burgh is exceptionally healthy. The commissioners, I feel satisfied, v propose any scheme which would be insufficient or abortive, but will, w reasonable time, propose one complete and effectual scheme, whether in co tion with irrigation or not. We cannot dismiss this petition: that is ou question. But we can pause, so as to allow the commissioners a reasonab to consider what scheme they may propose.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords, in respect t spondents have judicially stated their willingness to adopt with an efficient system of drainage, appoint the respondc report, within three months from this date, what steps the adopted to carry out the objects referred to in the answers: ultra supersede consideration of the case."

Massy v. Scott's Trustees.

Succession—Legacy—Liferent and Fee—Trust.—A trust-settlement directed the trustees "to pay" a legacy to a lady, "to be settled by my said trustees on herself and her issue, with power to her of disposal in case of no issue, and failing issue and disposal by her, to return to her own heirs, excluding those of her husband." Held, at a date when the legatee was forty-two years of age, and had been for several years married and had no children (1) that the legatee was not entitled to have the legacy paid to herself absolutely; and (2) that in order to give effect to the expressed intention of the truster, the trustees were bound to invest the money and to take the securities in the name of the legatee in fee, exclusive of the jus mariti of her husband, and after her death to any children she might have also in fee, subject to the condition that the children's right of succession should not be defeated by any gratuitous act of the legatee, and failing children, to the heirs of the legatee, excluding those of her husband—Lord Ormidale diss. on the grounds (1) That the exclusion of the jus mariti of the legatee's husband was not required by the settlement; and (2) That the trustees were bound to retain the legacy so long as there was a possibility of the legatee having issue, unless the legatee found caution or security to repeat in that event.

2D DIVISION, and three consulted Judges.

THE late Mrs Jane Cuninghame or Scott, of Edinburgh, died on 8th February 1868, leaving a trust-settlement in which the second purpose was that "my said trustees shall make payment, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after my death, of the following legacies to the persons after-mentioned, viz. "to John Dunbar, my nephew, ... ; and I appoint my said trustees to pay to my sister, ... ; to Isabella More Nisbett, now Lady Massy, my grandniece, and her heirs, the sum of £5000 sterling, to be settled by my said trustees on herself and her issue, with power to her of disposal in the case of no issue, and failing issue and disposal by her to return to her own heirs, excluding those of her husband."

R.

In a codicil,* the truster directed the trustees to settle the legacy to John Dunbar in such manner as to secure to him the liferent, and the fee to his children.

In 1872 a special case was presented to the Court by Lady Massy and her husband of the first part, and by Mrs Scott's trustees of the second part, for the opinion and judgment of the Court upon the following questions:—"1. Whether Lady Massy, the party of the first part, is entitled to the fee of the legacy of £5000, and to have the same now paid to herself absolutely? 2. Whether Lady Massy is entitled to have the said legacy of £5000 invested on securities taken in name of herself 'and her issue, with power to her of disposal in the case of no issue, and failing issue and disposal by her, to return to her own heirs, excluding those of her husband?' 3. Whether the trustees, the parties of the second part, are entitled or bound to retain said legacy during Lady Massy's life, or to invest the said legacy in securities taken in name of themselves or other persons, as trustees for behoof of the said 'Lady Massy in liferent for her liferent use allenarly, and her issue in fee, with power to her of disposal in the case of no issue, and failing issue and disposal by her, to return to her own heirs, excluding those of her husband,' the interest or annual proceeds of said legacy being always paid to Lady Massy during her life?"

Lady Massy, at the date of the special case, was in her forty-third year, and had been married since 1855 without having had any children.

No. 30.

Dec. 5, 1872. Massy v. Scott's Trustees.

The case was ordered to be argued before seven Judges.

The first parties argued;—It was not the intention of the testatrix that any trust should be interposed between the legatee and the fund which was bequeathed. The money was either to be paid to her or invested for her behoof. The direction that her trustees should pay the money at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas implied that they were to denude themselves. They had no authority to retain the money. The direction to "settle" was merely a direction as to the mode of payment.[1]

The trustees argued;—It was the duty of the trustees to carry out the intention of the testatrix, which was that the legacy should not be paid absolutely to Lady Massy, but should be so "settled" that her children's rights would be secured.[2] The absolute direction to pay was controlled by the subsequent direction to settle. If the intention had been that Lady Massy should have the fee, there was no reason for the power of disposal being given in the event of her not having children.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—By this special case we are called on to fix the construction to be put upon that part of Mrs Scott's settlement which bequeaths a sum of £5000 to her grandniece, Lady Massy, and her heirs. The duty of the Court in this and all similar cases is to endeavour, first, to ascertain what was the intention of the testatrix, and, second, to give effect to that intention if it be such as the law will recognise.

It is contended, on the one side here, that the meaning of this portion of the trust-deed is to settle £5000 on Lady Massy in liferent and her children in fee; while on the other hand it is maintained, that under this clause Lady Massy is entitled to the fee of £5000, and to have it paid over to herself at once unconditionally.

Now, I find it difficult to give effect to either of these contentions. The legacy in question is undoubtedly given in very peculiar terms. The second purpose of the trust-deed begins with these words,—"That my said trustees shall make payment at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after my death of the following legacies to the persons after mentioned, videlicet." It is accordingly argued that everything following these words in the second purpose is to be read as a direction to pay to certain persons. I do not attach much importance to that view. The sentence is broken before we reach the legacy to Lady Massy.

After bequeathing a certain sum to her nephew, John Dunbar, the testatrix goes on to say, "and I appoint my said trustees to pay to my sister," and therefore a new sentence begins there. It is in the course of that sentence that the legacy to Lady Massy is expressed, and in these terms,—"To Isabella More Nisbett, my grandniece, and her heirs, the sum of £5000 sterling, to be settled by my said trustees on herself and her issue, with power to her of disposal in the case of no issue, and failing issue and disposal by her, to return to her own heirs, excluding those of her husband." If this sentence had included no more than the words "Lady Massy and her heirs," there can be no doubt that it would have been a simple bequest to Lady Massy herself, but out of the words that follow the difficulty has arisen. The sum of £5000 is directed "to be settled,"

d we must ascertain what the testatrix meant by that. It has been argued by e trustees that the word "settle," so used, imports that Lady Massy is to have right of liferent of the sum merely; and that the fee is to be retained for her ildren in the event of her having any. But there is no direct mention of ferent here, and yet the testatrix, when she wished to create such a right of ferent and fee, knew perfectly well how to do so, as we see in the fourth dicil, where she very pointedly restricts the legacy of £18,000 already given John Dunbar to a liferent to him and a fee to his children. Now, it is a very markable thing that the testatrix, supposing she intended a similar right of ferent and fee in both cases, should carefully make that settlement in the case the one legatee, John Dunbar, by special codicil, while leaving the provision the other legatee, Lady Massy, to stand as it was in the original deed. Nor it unimportant to observe how John Dunbar's legacy stood in the original ed. It was a legacy to him, and failing him to his children. Now, that is t one of those legacies about which a doubt might arise. The doubt did cur to Mrs Scott, or else she changed her mind, but in Lady Massy's case she lowed the legacy to stand in its original terms.

It must next be observed that as there is no mention of liferent here, neither there any mode pointed out by which this assumed settlement of liferent and e could be maintained. It is not said that the trustees are to retain the fund pay it over to other trustees. It is not said that they are to invest it and ke the securities payable to the parties according to their respective rights. here is therefore neither mention of liferent and fee, nor any machinery hereby the creation of such rights might be effectuated. Yet when she does tend to make such a settlement she knows quite well how to do it. In the se of the residuary legatees she provides that the trustees, if they thought oper, should have full power to refuse to convey any share of the residue to e persons entitled thereto, and to retain and settle and secure the same in ch manner as that it should be free from the power of such residuary legatees. gain, in the codicil already referred to, she empowers the trustees either to act emselves as trustees with regard to the legacy to John Dunbar, or to appoint her trustees for that special purpose. I therefore find it quite impossible to ell out of this provision to Lady Massy any intention on the part of the testa- ix to limit her to a mere liferent. I come accordingly to the conclusion that e third question must be answered in the negative.

But then, on the other hand, Lady Massy contends that this is nothing more an a legacy to herself and her heirs, and I think it is quite as impossible to ncur in this view. If the testatrix had meant no more than that, then she ould have said no more. But being of opinion that she did mean something ore, we must consider how she directed it to be settled, in order to see whether e settlement intended is such an one as the law will give effect to. She directs e legacy to be settled on Lady Massy "and her issue." Now, I do not think at it is impossible to settle a provision on a person and her issue without sup- osing a right of liferent merely in the former and fee in the latter. I think at under such a settlement the person called is fiar, and her issue are fiars ccessive,—that is to say, they have a right of succession, but no present right. et us see how the other words used consist with this view. They are as fol- ows,—"With power to her of disposal in the case of no issue." That I interpret s a right of testamentary disposition. A power of disposal in connection with ch words as "in the case of no issue" can mean nothing but a power of testa- entary disposition. "Then, failing issue and disposal by her, to return to her n heirs, excluding those of her husband." This suggests that the jus mariti to be excluded in regard to the legacy, and in fact it must be so if it is to be iven effect to at all as I suggest. If the jus mariti took effect there would be immediate vesting of the legacy in the husband by the implied assignation of arriage, which would defeat the testatrix's intention. Again the issue of Lady assy might be by a subsequent marriage. In short, the idea is that the sband and his representatives are to be excluded absolutely, and the fee is to st in Lady Massy herself a morte testatoris, but her issue by this or any sub- quent marriage are to have a right of succession.

No. 30.

Dec. 5, 1872. Massy v. Scott's Trustees.

Now, that right of succession is a thing known to our law. We are familiar with it in marriage-contracts. We had a very distinct and interesting example of it lately in the marriage-contract of Mr Anstruther and also in that of Sir Charles Lamb (Arthur and Seymour v. Lamb, June 29, 1870, ante, vol. viii. 928), in which case the children were held to have a right, not a hope merely, of succession. Such a right does not limit the right of the fiar to use the fund, to part with it for onerous causes, to dilapidate and spend it. But on his death his children are creditors against his estate, not so as to compete with onerous creditors, but so as to have a valid claim against his solvent estate, which cannot be defeated by gratuitous deeds either inter vivos or mortis causa.

I confess I have not yet seen any such postponed right established by trust-settlement. All the cases that have come under my notice have been by contracts of marriage. But I do not see any difficulty in holding that if such right can be conferred by a marriage-contract so it can also by a testamentary deed. Mrs Scott has attached this as a condition to Lady Massy's legacy, which she was quite entitled to do. Lady Massy has in fact been placed just in such a position as she would have been by a marriage-contract giving her children a jus crediti.

In these circumstances, I think we should answer the first question in the negative. With regard to the second question, however, it does not suggest to my mind any words of conveyance at all satisfactory and applicable to the case. What I should propose is, that we should find and declare that the parties of the second part, trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of the testatrix, are bound to invest the proceeds of the said legacy of £5000, and to take the securities therefor to and in favour of the said Lady Massy in fee, exclusive of the jus mariti of her present or any future husband, and after her death to her children by the present and any future marriage, equally among them, also in fee, subject to the condition that the right of succession of the said children to a sum equal to the proceeds of the said legacy on the death of their mother, Lady Massy, shall not be defeated or prejudiced by any gratuitous act or deed done or executed by her, whether inter vivos or mortis causa, with power, nevertheless, to the said Lady Massy, failing such children, to dispose of the proceeds of the said legacy by any testamentary writing, and failing such children and the exercise of such power of disposal, then to the heirs of the said Lady Massy, exclusive of those of her husband. I need hardly suggest to the trustees that in making such investment the most suitable securities are heritable securities, because thereby the conditions attaching to this provision would at once appear on the record. But this cannot be laid on them as a positive order of the Court.

The third question, as I have already said, will fall to be answered in the negative.

In this manner I think the intention of the testatrix will be fully carried out.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur with the proposed judgment in so far as it holds that Lady Massy was not restricted to a mere liferent. I think there is no ground for holding that it was the intention of the testatrix so to limit the beneficiary named and favoured for behoof of her unborn issue.

With regard to the second point, however, I have more difficulty. The effect proposed to be given to the limiting words of conferring a right of credit in the possible issue, as protecting the destination or substitution to unborn issue, as against gratuitous alienation, is a novelty. It is a right familiar enough under marriage-contracts; but I am not aware of any instance in which such effect has been given by testamentary bequest, and that by an implied prohibition against testing, to the prejudice of a destination or substitution in mobilibus. Had the bequest been direct to the legatee in these terms I would have thought that the destination was not effectually protected. Some meaning, however, must be given to the direction to settle, and I am not disposed to carry my doubts so far as to differ from the judgment proposed. It is plain that without the exclusion of the jus mariti it would altogether fail to have the effect intended, and it illustrates the difficulties in the way of the course we are going to take that we are to insert an exclusion which is certainly not expressed in the settlement. m reconciled to the judgment on the ground that it probably more nearly hes what the testatrix really meant than any other result.

COWAN.—Two questions have to be considered by the Court in answer- queries submitted for our opinion in this special case—(1) The meaning ct of the legacies bequeathed to Lady Massy and her heirs, and appointed settled" on herself and her issue, with power to her of disposal in case sue, and failing issue and disposal by her, to return to her own heirs, ng those of her husband. These words appear to me to exclude the idea nited and absolute right to the fee of the legacy being conferred on Lady the amount being appointed to be settled on her and her issue, and fail- e, on her own heirs, excluding those of her husband,—unless, in the case sue, the power of the disposal conferred on her ladyship should be d. A right of succession is thus given to the issue of Lady Massy, she cannot gratuitously disappoint, although by her onerous deeds and e fund may be attached or spent and lost. This limited right in the issue will require to be kept in view in the settlement of the fund by tees; and further, the nature of the bequest, and the terms in which it is re such as to require that the jus mariti should be excluded. In the views y your Lordship, therefore, on this branch of the case, I entirely concur. he second question, it appears to me that the trustees are called upon and to settle this legacy upon Lady Massy in such terms and under such ns as to secure full effect to the protected succession of the possible Lady Massy; and I am of opinion that the form of settlement proposed respects suitable to the circumstances.
taining these views, I concur in the answers to be returned to the queries.

DEAS.—This is entirely a question of intention. It is clear that the testa- not mean the sum to go absolutely to Lady Massy, for that would have it to Lady Massy's husband, whose heirs are expressly excluded. The sum e settled by the trustees on Lady Massy and her children under certain ons, and the question is, what the testatrix intended these limitations to ne might have thought she contemplated a bequest to Lady Massy in and to her children in fee, had it not been that we see from the codicils May 1871 that when she intended a liferent and fee she knew perfectly w to provide for it. It might also have been inferred that the testatrix d that the money should remain in the hands of the trustees. But in e codicils we find that she expressly provided for this when such was ntion. I think therefore, upon the whole, that the limitations suggested Lordship come as near as possible to what must have been in the mind estatrix, and upon that ground I concur in answering the questions in proposed by your Lordship.

BENHOLME.—This case has given me a great deal of anxiety, all the as the conclusion to which the Court have arrived does not appear to rely to correspond with the intention of the testatrix. What she had in her as the protection of the shares of the children. She may have intended this on to be absolute, merely giving to Lady Massy the power to test upon vision in the event of her having no children, and withholding from her ver of disposal in the meantime. What occurred to me was, that the might hold the funds in their own hands, or might appoint other trus- hold them, until the contingency of children was out of the question. difficulty of such an arrangement is to say how long the trustees are to e funds, for the law of Scotland does not recognise any period at which possible for a woman to bear children. If any such period was recognised aw the trustees would be bound to retain the funds till it arrived.
if the testatrix desired to limit the right of Lady Massy she might have in the same way as she did as to her nephew John Dunbar, or as she has dealing with the residue.

No. 30.

Massy v. Scott's Trustees.

I think the judgment which your Lordship proposes goes as far as we are entitled to go. No doubt creditors may carry off the fund, but the testatrix might have protected the right if she had desired to do so.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMIDALE.—In the present, as in every case involving the construction of a testamentary writing, the important question is—what was the intention of the testatrix? for that intention ought to be given effect to so far as practicable.

The terms in which the legacy in question has been left are undoubtedly somewhat perplexing. I have no hesitation, however, in holding that by the expression, "to pay," the testatrix did not intend that the amount of the legacy should on her death be at once handed over to Lady Massy, to be at her absolute disposal without qualification or restriction. The whole terms of the bequest, when read together, and in connection with the deed of settlement generally, exclude such a construction. The expression, again, "to be settled," as it is not followed by a specification of any precise form of settlement, must be held, I think, to be a matter which the testatrix intended that her trustees should be left to carry out and give effect to in a mode sufficient to secure and satisfy the object of the testatrix.

What, then, must be held to have been the true object of the testatrix, as regards the legacy in dispute? It appears to me that her object was to give Lady Massy a right to the capital of the £5000, but subject to a certain restriction or limitation which it is the duty of her trustees to attend to.

Although Lady Massy had been for some time married at the date when the legacy in question was left to her, the testatrix says nothing about her existing or any future husband. I am not prepared, therefore, to hold that she intended that any restriction or limitation should be imposed as regards the right which might arise to him. But I think it is impossible to read the whole terms of the bequest, and especially the direction of the testatrix to her trustees to settle the legacy on Lady Massy "and her issue, with power to her of disposal in case of no issue," without being satisfied that the trustees were and are restricted from now paying the legacy to Lady Massy, irrespective of the contingent interest constituted in favour of her children. On the contrary, it appears to me that her trustees are bound to see that these contingent interests are so protected that in the event of their ever emerging they shall be given effect to. In this view, I am unable to arrive at the conclusion that the trustees are either bound or entitled now and at once to pay the legacy of £5000 to Lady Massy absolutely and unqualifiedly, or to give it to her in the form of a security expressed in terms of the bequest, with the addition, which, as I have already said, I can find no warrant for, of an exclusion of her husband's jus mariti. It appears to me that such a mode of proceeding, while it might create considerable trouble and expense, would offer no real protection to the contingent interests in question, for on Lady Massy obtaining right to the legacy in any such form as that suggested she would have it in her power, whenever she pleased, to convert it into money, and so to put an end to all semblance even of protection.

Although, therefore, I cannot assent to such a mode of proceeding as that to which I have just alluded, I think there is a mode by which the trustees may be enabled at once to discharge their duty by taking care that the contingent interests in question are sufficiently protected, and also to pay over the amount of the legacy to Lady Massy. I think that this may, in accordance with the principle which was recognised and given effect to in the case of Schenimes, 25th June 1828, 6 Sh. 1019, the case of Shaw there referred to, and the case of Blackwood, 11th June 1833, 11 Shaw, 699, be very well done by Lady Massy, as a condition of receiving payment of the legacy, finding caution or security that, in the highly improbable, although possible, event of her yet having children, their interests will be provided for. But of course, if such caution or security is not found the trustees must, I think, retain the legacy in their own hands or power, so long as there may be a possibility of the contingent interests emerging.

ith these explanations, I am of opinion, in answer to the three questions itted to the Court in the special case, that the trustees are bound to retain egacy in their own hands or power, so long as there is a possibility, in any nable sense, of Lady Massy having issue,—paying to her ladyship in the itime the income arising from the same; and it being always in the power ady Massy and her husband to obtain payment of the legacy on finding ion or security to the satisfaction of the trustees that the contingent interests r issue, in the event of her having any, will be duly provided for.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords of the Second Division, having, along with two Judges of the First Division and Lord Ormidale, one of the Lords Ordinary, heard counsel on the special case for Lady Massy and Others, find and declare, in conformity with the opinion of the majority of the seven Judges, in answer to the first question, that Lady Massy, party of the first part, is entitled to the fee of the legacy of £5000, bequeathed to her by the testatrix, subject to the qualification after expressed, but that she is not entitled to have a sum of £5000, or the proceeds of said legacy, now paid to herself absolutely: Find and declare, in answer to the second question, that the parties of the second part, trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of the testatrix, are bound to invest the proceeds of the said legacy of £5000, and to take the securities therefor to and in favour of the said Lady Massy in fee, exclusive of the jus mariti of her present or any future husband, and after her death to her children by the present and any future marriage, equally among them, also in fee, subject to the condition that the right of succession of the said children to a sum equal to the proceeds of the said legacy, on the death of their mother, the said Lady Massy, shall not be defeated or prejudiced by any gratuitous act or deed done or executed by her, whether inter vivos or mortis causa, with power nevertheless to the said Lady Massy, failing such children, to dispose of the proceeds of the legacy by any testamentary writing, and failing such children and the exercise of such power of disposal, then to the heirs of the said Lady Massy exclusive of those of her husband: Find, in answer to the third question, that the said trustees are neither bound nor entitled to retain the said legacy during the said Lady Massy's life, nor to invest the proceeds of the said legacy in securities taken in name of themselves or other persons, as trustees for behoof of the said Lady Massy in liferent for her liferent use allenarly, and her issue in fee: Find no expenses due to either party, and decern."

Sheriff-officer—Execution of Search—Notour Bankrupt.—Observations on the terms of execution of search by sheriff-officers as affording prima facie evidence of absconding so as to constitute notour bankruptcy.

Bankruptcy—Trustee.—Question, Whether a trustee in a sequestration can in litigation make admissions in points of law?

On 22d November 1870 Joseph Gracie, grocer, Dumfries, granted a trust-deed in favour of William Gordon for behoof of his creditors. Gordon entered into possession of Gracie's property.

On the 26th November 1870 Johnstone and Wright, wholesale grocers, Dumfries, used arrestments in the hands of Gordon, on the dependence of an action raised by them against Gracie, which resulted in decree in their favour, and again on 5th December 1870 on a protested bill due by Gracie to them. The two debts together amounted to about £38.

Johnstone and Wright having charged Gracie upon the extract registered protest to make payment of the bill, obtained warrant to imprison, in virtue whereof a search was made for him on 3d December 1870, by a sheriff-officer, who returned the following execution:—"Archibald Hyslop, sheriff-officer, passed to the dwelling-house and premises occupied and possessed by the said Joseph Gracie in High Street of Dumfries, and, holding the said warrant to imprison, in Her Majesty's name and authority, I made diligent and strict search for the said Joseph Gracie, by looking and searching carefully and attentively in and through every part, corner, and apartment of the said dwelling-house and premises capable of containing a person, and where it was possible he, the said Joseph Gracie, might be concealed, in order to have apprehended and incarcerated his person in terms of the said warrant to imprison, but, notwithstanding of the most strict, diligent, and minute search in and through the said places as aforesaid, he, the said Joseph Gracie, could not be found." The execution further bore that all this was done between the hours of eleven and twelve forenoon.

Gracie, who had gone to England, returned after a short period, and on 19th December 1870 he was apprehended and incarcerated under the warrant.

On the 18th April 1871 the estates of Gracie were sequestrated, and Robert Nicolson was elected and confirmed trustee thereon.

Johnstone and Wright lodged a claim in the sequestration to be ranked as preferable creditors for their debt of £38, 5s. 1d.

The trustee in the sequestration, on 1st September 1871, pronounced the following deliverance:—"The trustee admits this claim to the extent of £38, 5s. 1d. as an ordinary debt. The arrestments used by the claimants in the hands of William Gordon . . . . . being inept, and not having attached any funds belonging to the bankrupt in their hands, the balance of their claim, amounting to £10, 10s. 9d., is not chargeable against the estate. The arrestee, William Gordon, at the date of these arrestments, was not debtor to the bankrupt, and held no funds of his, but held the trust-estate of the bankrupt under a disposition in his favour qua trustee for behoof of the bankrupt's creditors, and was therefore accountable to them alone, and not to the bankrupt. . . . Alternatively, the trustee holds that the claimants, subsequent to using the arrestments, acquiesced in that trust-deed, and from their mora in raising the action of forthcoming are barred from acquiring a preference over the other creditors."

Johnstone and Wright appealed to the Sheriff. The trustee appeared.

The appellants in the inferior Court maintained that the date of notour bankruptcy was 3d December 1870, and pleaded that the voluntary trust-deed of 22d November, having been granted within sixty days of bankruptcy, was rendered null by the Act 1696, c. 5, and that no restments having been used within four months after the date of bankruptcy, so as to secure a pari passu ranking with their arrest- :hey had thereby secured an effectual preference.

trustee maintained that in point of fact the appellants had ac- l in the private trust-deed, and were therefore barred from ging. He also denied that notour bankruptcy took place on 3d ber. In answer to the appellants' averments on this point he -(Ans. 6.) "Admitted that the bankrupt was charged on the registered protest and decree referred to, and failed to make pay- terms thereof, and that a warrant of imprisonment was obtained extract registered protest. eaded, inter alia, that (the date of notour bankruptcy being assumed th December 1870, and the sequestration having taken place on ril 1871) the general arrestment effected by the sequestration was to be ranked pari passu with the appellants' arrestments.*
Sheriff-substitute (Hope) sustained the appeal, recalled the de- e of the trustee, and ordained the trustee to rank the appellants equestrated estate as preferable creditors to the extent of their ith interest.†

sec. 12 of 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, it is enacted that arrestments and s within sixty days prior to bankruptcy, or four months after it, "shall d pari passu as if they had all been used of the same date," &c. And 08 it is enacted that "the sequestration shall, as at the date thereof, alent to an arrestment in execution, and decree of furthcoming, and to ted and completed poinding."

TE.—The first question to be considered is, would the debt due to the s have been a preferable one on the estate if there had not been a rust-deed. The trustee says that it would not, on the plea that 'the the bankrupt having been sequestrated within four months of the notour bankruptcy the appellants cannot claim a preference. On what is founded the Sheriff-substitute has been unable to discover. He can ee reason in it, nor find authority for it. If the arrestments had been xty days prior to sequestration, then it might have been pleaded with hat the debt was not preferable, but that was not the case. The next is, what difference (if any) does the fact of the bankrupt having executed trust-deed for behalf of his creditors make.

trustee says that as the bankrupt had divested himself of his estate ie arrestments were used, and the trustee under the private deed held t belonging to the bankrupt but to the creditors, the arrestments were nd further, that 'the appellants having acquiesced in the foresaid trust rise, led the arrestees to believe that they were acceding creditors, and om prosecuting separate measures to obtain a preference over the other

' It appears to the Sheriff-substitute that none of these pleas would n good before sequestration, and that they cannot be any better now.

he first place, the private trust-deed, having been granted when the as insolvent, and within sixty days of notour bankruptcy, was null cible, and therefore could not place the debtor's funds beyond the reach acceding creditor's diligence; and, in the second place, there is not only nce in process of the appellants having acceded, but the averments on cts are not relevant and sufficient to be sent to proof.

The trustee appealed to the First Division.

After the parties were heard, the Court appointed the case to be before seven Judges.

It was then stated for the trustee that he consented that the case s be disposed of on the footing "that there had been no acquiescen Johnstone and Wright in the private trust-deed; that the true d notour bankruptcy was the 3d December 1870."

The trustee argued;—The private trustee, in whose hands the s ments were used, did not hold for the bankrupt, but for his cre The result of giving effect to the contention of the arrestees would give them a preference over the other creditors, whereas the intent the trust-deed was to make all equal. The object of the Act 169 to prevent preferences among creditors, and it cannot be pleaded so give a preference.[1]

The respondents argued;—The effect of notour bankruptcy is t down the trust-deed, and to leave the trust-funds still the property bankrupt; at all events, the trustee was bound to account to the rupt, and that is sufficient ground for diligence.[2]

At advising,—

LORD BENHOLME.—This case arises under the sequestration of Joseph a grocer and spirit merchant in Dumfries. It arises in reference to the m which certain arrestments, or rather the debts secured by the arrestments, be ranked in the sequestration. The trustee held that they are to be only as ordinary debts. The Sheriff-substitute has found that they are e to a preference. The question is, whether the one decision or the other correct one.

The facts of the case, as they ultimately appear on the admissions of are very few and simple. This man Gracie, when in a state of insolvenc cuted a trust-deed for the distribution of his estate among his creditors 22d November 1870. This trust-deed fell under the operation of the Act in respect that the granter was rendered notour bankrupt within sixty da its date. It was consequently voidable under that statute, and therefore took steps for having the estate sequestrated, with the view of defeati preference which the appellants were endeavouring to secure. If this s had any result at all, it has been favourable to the appellants, for it imme put an end to the trust-deed,—at least Mr Gordon has acknowledged this b ing over the estate, so far as undisposed of, to the trustee in the sequestra

"It seems to the Sheriff-substitute that if the trust-deed has been set a some effect, it must be set aside for all purposes; but whether that be so the trustee in the sequestration, under sections 10 and 11 of the Bank Act, is entitled to set aside either by way of action or exception 'all alie of property by a party insolvent or notour bankrupt which are voida statute, or at common law,' and, 'in so doing, shall be entitled to the be any presumption which would have been competent to any creditor.' It s to the Sheriff-substitute that if a trustee is entitled to do this he is also to do it in the interests of any creditor who might have done it himself t the sequestration; and therefore the trustee in this case ought to have effect to the appellants' contention, set aside the trust-deed and all its e way of exception, and ranked the claim preferably on the estate."

statute its nullity can be pleaded without a process of reduction. The was that the private trustee ceased to hold the goods for behoof of the rs who were intended to be benefited by the trust-deed, and held for the ipt and his creditors. The debts of Johnstone and Wright are not dis- and it is quite ascertained that the arrestments were duly used in the of the private trustee, one on 26th November, and the other on 5th ber. The question whether, in these circumstances, they are entitled to a nce, depends upon the date of sequestration in reference to the date of bankruptcy. The date of sequestration was 18th April 1871, four s and more after the date of bankruptcy (3d December), and less than onths after the other (19th December),—I allude to the contentions of in the earlier stages of this litigation. It seems that the bankrupt, after harged, and after the days of charge had expired, left the country. On ember 1870 a sheriff-officer made the usual and necessary search for him t success. Gracie returned after a short time, and was incarcerated on December. The 3d December has ultimately been admitted at the bar as e date of notour bankruptcy. Had it not been for this admission there have been some doubt as to this point, and some proof might have been d, the question being whether the execution of search, taking into con- ion the admission that the debtor had left the country, afforded sufficient ption that he had absconded to avoid the diligence of his creditors. But tter has been set at rest, for although proof might have been asked to hat there was no absconding the trustee has not asked to be allowed but has admitted that the date of bankruptcy was 3d December. In con- ce of that admission all doubt is removed, for the sequestration not having d within four months of notour bankruptcy it cannot be alleged that any arrestment which can compete with those of Johnstone and Wright's ents. Although they were used within sixty days of notour bankruptcy, tour bankruptcy was not within four months of the sequestration. Con- ly the equalisation of these arrestments with the general arrestment by the sequestration did not take place.

her material point has been admitted, viz., that these creditors had never ced in the private trust-deed, and were therefore not barred from plead- nullity.

refore arrive at the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substi- right. His decision is in terms of a provision of the bankruptcy statute, nerever a preference has once been obtained over any part of the bank- tate, that part of the estate passes into the hands of the trustee in the ration under burden of that preference.

COWAN.—The first point noticed in the note to the interlocutor of the regards the effect of the statutory provision equalising diligences within nths of the sequestration. The solution of this question depends upon e at which it is to be held the debtor was made notour bankrupt. That so by imprisonment on 19th December 1870 is admitted, and if this be e of the notour bankruptcy, the sequestration on 18th April 1871 was the four months. But diligence had been used against the debtor, under act registered protest and warrant, in virtue whereof a search was made on 3d December 1870, conform to execution of search in process. And recent debate it was admitted by the counsel for the trustee that the had been thereby effectually made notour bankrupt as at the date of the ecution of search. Hence it follows that the provision of the statute in n has no application, inasmuch as the date of the sequestration was more ur months subsequent to the notour bankruptcy.

this admission should have been made did not surprise me, having to the terms of the execution of search giving rise to the presumption of bankruptcy. That execution proceeded on the warrant of the Sheriff's and his fiat ut petitur issued in terms of the Personal Diligence Act, and d by a sheriff-officer, which is declared by that Act to have the same if the diligence had been used on letters of horning and caption. This being so, the execution contains all the essential facts to be found in those ex cutions of search on which the Court proceeded in the cases referred to by B Bell in his Commentaries (7th edition), vol. ii. p. 162. These executions a now before me, having caused an examination of the session papers to be ma in order to ascertain their precise terms. And Mr Bell lays down the doctri established by the decisions in these words—"The messenger's return of exec tion stating that after a thorough search the debtor could not be found, is go evidence, prima fronte, that he has absconded; and, unless opposed by contra evidence, is sufficient proof of bankruptcy." In this case the debtor was notou ously insolvent, having executed a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors; an although in the record notour bankruptcy was denied, and it was competent f the trustee to have asked for probation to redargue the presumption of absco ing afforded by the execution, yet, if it was found hopeless to attempt any su proof, the prudent and proper course for the trustee to follow was to avoid incu ring further expense by admitting the bankruptcy to be sufficiently establish by the execution of search.

The next question regards the effect of the arrestments used by the arresti creditors on 26th November and 3d December 1870. Is it to be held that the effect could be destroyed by the prior execution of the private trust-deed f behoof of the whole creditors on 22d November 1870? It is now admitted th there was no accession to the private trust by the arresting creditors. And th being so, their diligence was perfectly legal. But, assuming that the priva trust-deed took full effect, and that the trustee had obtained possession of t debtor's estate, an arrestment used by a non-acceding creditor in his hands su sequent thereto must have the effect only of attaching whatever residue shou remain with the trustee after full payment to the other creditors. This resu however, is obviated by the debtor in this case having been made notour ban rupt, as aforesaid, on 3d December 1870. The effect of this notour bankrupt was to render reducible the trust-deed under the Act 1696 as a voluntary de within sixty days. A reduction at the instance of the arresting creditors migh therefore, have been at any time instituted to the effect of setting aside the p vate trust, so as to enable them to make effectual their arrestments.

The arresting creditors have not instituted a reduction. The necessity f their doing so has been superseded by the sequestration of the debtor's estate April 1871. The effect of that proceeding is, as regards the administration the debtor's estate, to transfer it entirely to the statutory trustee, and to rend void the private trust-deed under the 10th section of the Act. The priva trust has been thereby brought to an end; and the whole effects of the debt remaining in the hands of the private trustee now belong to the statutory tr tee, and have been transferred to him. But, in asserting his right to these effe he can take them only subject to such preferences as have been created ov them by lawful diligence. And in this case the arresting creditors have attach by their diligence in the hands of the private trustee the effects of their debt which he held at the date of their diligence, and which the statutory trustee now entitled to have delivered to him.

This result appears to me to flow necessarily from the various decisions whi were referred to in the debate, and which culminated in that of Johnston, 17 D., App., "Bankrupt," No. 5.

On these grounds I concur in the opinion of Lord Benholme.

Lord Deas.—It appears that on 22d November 1872 the debtor, Jose Gracie, who is no party to this case, granted a trust-deed for the benefit of t whole of his creditors equally in favour of Gordon as trustee.. This deed w approved of by nearly all the creditors; was advertised in the newspapers; w allowed to be acted on; and dividends were paid by the trustee. Arrestmen had, however, in the meantime been used in his hands by Johnstone a Wright as creditors of Gracie, on the 26th November, and again on 6th Dece ber. On 3d December a search was made for the bankrupt, but he was n found, and he was not apprehended till the 19th. Sequestration was award on 18th April 1871.

esent the debtor. He represents the creditors in their just proportions, preferences by arrestment are excluded. A stipulation for a discharge, ; on a full surrender being made, although it will not void the deed, is, a final step to be considered only at the close, and in which non-acceditors may or may not then hold to be binding on them at their pleasure. agement of the trustee may be superseded by sequestration under the ot Statute, although more than sixty days have elapsed without the having in the meantime been made bankrupt, and in that case the nent of the trustee in the sequestration will supersede, from its date, agement of the voluntary trustee.

he other hand, bankruptcy within the sixty days, although there is no ation, will lay open the funds, in the hands of the voluntary trustee, to gence of creditors; and if, in the present case, the debtor was legally l bankrupt by the execution of search on 3d December 1870, the respon- rrestments will confer upon them a valid preference, that date being at e time less than sixty days after the date of the trust-deed and more ir months prior to the sequestration. But if there was no bankruptcy debtor was apprehended on 19th December, this of course leaves less ir months between the date of the bankruptcy and the date of the seques- (which was awarded on 18th April 1871), and gives rise to what appears o have been, hitherto, the only really formidable objection to the claim of ice made in virtue of the arrestments, which claim was rejected by the in the sequestration but sustained by the Sheriff-substitute.

objection was very distinctly raised in the Sheriff-court record. On the d, the arresting creditors stated that they had rendered the debtor bank- the execution of search of 3d December, at which time the debtor had ed from diligence (Art. 6), and further (Art. 10), that founding on their ents as used more than sixty days prior to the said bankruptcy, and on aving been no other legal diligence (meaning no sequestration) "within nths after the said 3d day of December 1870, so as to obtain a pari passu thereon, they lodged a claim to be ranked preferably in said sequestra- On the other hand, the trustee in the sequestration denied the alleged ling and the effect attributed to the execution of search of 3d December o Art. 6), and pleaded, inter alia, "7th. The estates of the bankrupt been sequestrated within four months of the date of notour bankruptcy ellants cannot claim a preference."

were made thus explicit to remedy an ambiguity which Mr Bell regretted (v ii. pp. 70 and 80) had been allowed to remain in the statutes in force when wrote his Commentaries, and which has been effectually removed in the pres statute by explicitly declaring, in so many words, that all arrestments with less than four months of the sequestration shall rank pari passu, and that t sequestration itself shall operate as an arrestment for behoof of all the credit equally.

It thus becomes a vital matter whether notour bankruptcy took place on December. The only proof offered is the execution of search by the she officer. There is no doubt that such an execution, if in full and regular for affords prima facie evidence that the debtor had absconded. But the executi here merely bears that the officer went to the debtor's dwelling-house betwe eleven and twelve o'clock in the forenoon, and looked through the house, a did not find him. A correct form is given in Darling's Office of a Messenger, p 179 and 180, and bears that the messenger "passed to the dwelling-house oc pied by the said E F, and to the shop, warehouse, and cellar occupied by him , and then and there," "made diligent and strict search for the s E F, by looking and searching carefully and attentively in and through eve part, corner, and apartment of each of the said dwelling-house, shop, warehou and cellars capable of containing a man, and where it was possible the said E might be concealed, in order to apprehend and incarcerate his person in ter of said letters. But notwithstanding the most strict, diligent, and minute sear at each of the said places, as said is, he, the said E F, could not be found, having absconded, as I believe, for his personal safety."

The execution must set forth facts which raise a presumption of flight absconding, and it is a grave question whether the execution at the dwellin house in this case contains anything sufficient to raise such a presumptic especially as at the time when the search was executed it was to be expect that the debtor would be at his shop or warehouse, and not in his dwellin house. Mr Bell (Com. ii. pp. 172, 173) says:—"Two questions may arise co cerning absconding—(1) The messenger's return of execution, stating that af a thorough search the debtor could not be found, is good evidence prima fac that he had absconded; and, unless opposed by contrary evidence, is sufficie proof of bankruptcy. But what facts will entitle a messenger to return such execution? In a man of good credit mere absence from home is nothing, but a debtor notoriously insolvent such absence is more suspicious, and indeed l been found to infer præsumptione juris an absconding under the statute 16 It seems reasonable, however, to require some other circumstance than m absence—as the lateness of the hour, or the apparent concealment or ignora of the domestics of what has become of the debtor. From such circumstan absconding may fairly be inferred." I have always understood this to be sou law. I am quite aware of the decisions in the books which appear to sanct a looser doctrine. But plainly enough Mr Bell did not approve of them. Th is no stereotyped or statutory form for such an execution, but an actus legitin which is to have consequences so important ought to be gone about with gr care and precision. In this case the execution sets forth nothing except th between the hours of eleven and twelve forenoon, the officer searched the debt dwelling-house, and did not find him. I do not think that fact was sufficient infer absconding, and the execution does not bear that the officer drew that ference from it. It is not said that he put any questions to the domestics or family. He did not even search the shop, and it appears to me very perilous hold that bankruptcy is to be inferred merely because a merchant, or indeed a other man, who happens at the moment to be insolvent, is not found in dwelling-house at or immediately before the hour of noon.

But at the close of all this litigation the counsel for the trustee has admit that notour bankruptcy did take place on 3d December. I agree with L Cowan's remark that such an admission ought to be in writing. I wo hesitate to accept it from a trustee for creditors if it is meant as an admiss in point of law. But if it is meant to be admitted that there was absconc in point of fact, it is conclusive.

LORD NEAVES concurred with Lord Benholme.

No. 31.

Dec. 6, 1872. Nicolson v. Johnstone and Wright.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have felt not a little difficulty in regard to this case, which is now presented in a very different manner from what it was when before the First Division. If it had not been for the admission now made at the bar by the counsel for the trustee, but not previously made, I should have had difficulty in holding that the 3d of December 1870, when a search was made for the common debtor Gracie, was the date of notour bankruptcy. There is no proof of absconding except what the search affords. Mere absence from home when sought for is not sufficient, and the execution of search does not state as a fact, and does not contain materials for clearly inferring, that the debtor absconded. The trustee on the record has distinctly denied that Gracie, the debtor, had absconded, or did on that occasion abscond from diligence. The execution of search does not bear that he had absconded, and there is no real evidence from facts and circumstances indicating that he did abscond, or even meant to abscond.

He was not apprehended till the 19th December, and the sequestration was on 18th April 1871, within four months of the date of that apprehension, which, if he did not abscond, was the date of notour bankruptcy. Taking these two dates as the date of notour bankruptcy and the date of sequestration, a question of importance, and not free from difficulty in regard to the effect of the sequestration on the arrestments would have arisen. It is enough for me now to say that, taking the dates according to that state of the facts, and as the case was argued in the First Division, and is presented on the record by the trustee who denied the absconding, I felt difficulty on that question of the effect of the sequestration on the arrestment, and I do not venture to express any opinion on it.

I understand it to be now admitted on the part of the trustee, though it was formerly denied, that Gracie had absconded when the search was made, and that therefore the 3d of December is the date of notour bankruptcy. That important admission in regard to the matter of fact changes the aspect of the case. We could not take an admission in point of law. Taking that view of the fact as it is now admitted I do not differ from the judgment which is proposed.

LORD MURE.—I concur with Lord Benholme and the majority of your Lordships, and, with reference to the main difficulty which has been raised, viz., the date at which notour bankruptcy took place, I wish to rest my opinion not so much on any admission which may be made at the bar, as on the execution of search coupled with the averments and admission made by the trustee on the record, that the bankrupt was absent from Dumfries at the time the search was made. Looking to these facts, and to this further fact, that there has been no proposal made to redargue the execution, I have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the date of notour bankruptcy was the 3d of December. There are several cases in which an execution of search has been held to be at least prima facie evidence of absconding, and which are, I think, those referred to by Mr Bell (Com. ii. 173, 5th ed.). There is the case of the Carron Company, 4th July 1775, D. 1110; of Ross, 25th June 1782, D. 1111; and of Spedding, 9th August 1785, D. 1113,—in all of which an execution of search, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, was held, in the case of an insolvent party, to afford sufficient evidence of absconding. It is true that all that appears on the face of the execution in this case is that the debtor could not be found at his house and shop, and it is said that it is possible he may have been in Dumfries. But it is averred on record that he had absconded from diligence, and the trustee admits that the debtor was absent from Dumfries at the time the search was made, and that when under diligence he had gone to Liverpool in search of work. No doubt he goes on to deny that the debtor had absconded. But we are here in a concluded cause, in which no proof has been asked by either party. And I see no reason why, when the trustee finds that he cannot redargue the presumption of absconding, which is held to arise from the fact that an insolvent party when under diligence has left the country, he should not be entitled to say that he does not stand upon that part of his case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are two questions before us, one of which has been

No. 31.

Dec. 6, 1872. Nicolson v. Johnstone and Wright.

argued at the bar, and the other has been suggested by my brother Lord I It is right that I should say a few words on each.

The first question is, whether the arrestments used on the 26th November the 5th December in the hands of Mr Gordon, the private trustee, are effec At the time they were used there can be no doubt that Gordon was in posse of the property of Gracie, and in fact that he was in actual possession of a l ber of shop goods which formed the chief part of Gracie's estate. No doul is said that he was in possession of these goods under a trust-deed for beho creditors. That trust-deed became ineffectual in consequence of the superve bankruptcy of the granter within sixty days of the date, whether the bankru took place on 3d December or on 19th December. It is suggested that were not good arrestments when they were used. This depends on the sen the word "good." They were undoubtedly competent arrestments, whethe trust-deed was good or bad. Their effect would depend on the goodness of trust-deed. If the trust-deed were good and not liable to be cut down, then arrestments would attach nothing but the reversion after exhausting the purp of the trust-deed. If the trust-deed became bad, the arrestments were effec to attach all the goods which de facto were in the hands of the trustee should have been inclined to arrive at this result on principle, but it has l made matter of express decision in a whole series of cases which have l quoted.

It is said, however, that the bankruptcy did not take place on 3d Decem but only on 19th December, and that occurring as it did on 19th Decembe arrestments used within sixty days before that date, or within four months a it, are to rank pari passu. One of these arrestments used within four months a the 19th December was the arrestment which is affected by the sequestrat and confirmation of the trustee. If the facts were before us it certainly wo be an important question whether the sequestration, which, according to a ferent section of the Bankruptcy Act (sec. 108) operates as an arrestment, is arrestment within the meaning of sec. 12. The question does not arise here, I mean to give no opinion on it. Upon the state of the case before us, not bankruptcy took place on 3d December, as matter of fact, and the effect is create a presumption of absconding, which may indeed be redargued, but whi until it is redargued, is conclusive proof of absconding. This has been laid do in a series of decisions in the Dictionary. In Young v. Grieve, 4th July 17 M. 1112, the circumstances of a debtor not being found at his dwelling-house a messenger ready to execute a caption against him, and of his family not giv information whither he had betaken himself, were construed to be an abscond under the statute. In Spedding v. Hodgson, 9th August 1785, M. 1113, it observed from the bench that the absence of a debtor from his dwelling-house a time when he is notoriously insolvent, will create a presumptio juris of absco ing; not being, however, a presumptio juris et de jure, it may be elided b contrary proof.

Now, it must be kept in mind that an execution of search is not a statut matter. There is nothing in the present Bankruptcy Statute or any other about the execution of a search. It is matter of decision at common law t the execution of a search is prima facie evidence of absconding, and that, un redargued, it fixes absconding as a fact. I agree with Lord Deas that an execut of search, like all other diligence, is subject to a strict construction. I infe from his Lordship's observations that there were some things about this ex tion which disentitled it to be regarded as prima facie evidence of abscond What the sheriff-officer certifies is,—"I, Archibald Hyslop, sheriff-officer, pa to the dwelling-house and premises occupied and possessed by the said Jos Gracie in High Street of Dumfries, and, holding the said warrant to imprison Her Majesty's name and authority, I made diligent and strict search for the Joseph Gracie by looking and searching carefully and attentively in and thro every part, corner, and apartment of the said dwelling-house and premises cap of containing a person, and where it was possible he, the said Joseph Gracie, mi be concealed, in order to have apprehended and incarcerated his person, in te of the said warrant to imprison, but, notwithstanding of the most strict, dilig and minute search in and through the said places as aforesaid, he, the said Joseph Gracie, could not be found." No. 31.

Dec. 6, 1872. Nicolson v. Johnstone and Wright.

It seems to me that this is a more than usually strict search, and that the execution goes far beyond most executions. I have an example of an execution of search which the Court found in the case of Spedding to be conclusive of the fact that the debtor had absconded. "Upon the 21st day of October 1879, I, Francis Short, messenger . . . passed to the said Thomas Bushby's house at Ardwell, where, after inquiring at his servants if he was at home, and being answered in the negative, I demanded and got access into the said house and searched, but could not find him." But it is said that it is open to the trustee to redargue the presumption of absconding. Quite true; but the trustee was compelled on record to make one admission, that the debtor had left the kingdom—a most pregnant circumstance in the question of absconding. It did not surprise me in the least that, through his counsel, he declined to stand upon this part of his case. It is said to be an admission not of fact but of law. I do not think so. Notour bankruptcy is a matter of fact, and to be proved by evidence of a particular description perfectly well known to legal practitioners and to trustees in sequestrations. Had it been an admission in point of law, is it so very clear that a trustee in a sequestration cannot give away a point of law? I should think that, if it were competent for any one, it would be competent for him. He is charged with the disposal of claims, and when he admits a claim he admits both fact and law. But here he is not giving up a point of law, but simply giving up a fact which he would otherwise have to prove.

I am of opinion that we should refuse the appeal.

THE Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In conformity with the opinions of a majority of the seven Judges present at said hearing, affirm the interlocutor appealed against, and refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the appellant liable in expenses; allow an account," &c.

Nuisance—Property.—Circumstances in which a farina manufactory was held to be a nuisance to a neighbour, in respect both of the discharges therefrom into a stream bounding his property, and of occasional and temporary annoyance from the smell of the settling tanks.

Nuisance—Landlord and Tenant.—An action was brought by A against B, a neighbouring proprietor, and C, his tenant, for declarator that they were not entitled to carry on at the premises occupied by C a manufacture whereby a nuisance was created to the pursuer. B, in the missives of lease between him and C, had stipulated that C should "not erect any buildings or others at the farina works carried on by him without the express permission of the proprietor in writing, and should not have anything about said premises that should be a nuisance to the property or to the public." Held that as B did not prevent the use of the water and the erection of buildings, &c. by C, and as he had appeared and defended the actions, on grounds implying the assertion of more serious rights than those claimed by the tenant, the findings as to nuisance and expenses must be directed against him as well as the tenant.

JAMES STEWART ROBERTSON was proprietor of the lands of Edradynate, in the parish of Logierait, in Perthshire, which were separated by Derculich

Burn from the lands of Derculich, in the parish of Dull, belonging to Stewart's Trustees and Alexander Robertson Stewart of Derculich.

About 1846 Donald Livingstone, who was tenant of the farm of Laigh, on Derculich estate, converted a lint-mill, situated on the east or Derculich side of the said stream, into a mill for the manufacture of farina from potatoes.

Mr Robertson's avenue lay along the other side of the stream, leading to the house of Edradynate, which was situate on the west side of Derculich Burn, at a distance of 300 yards from the mill. The avenue passed within 20 yards of the mill.

On 2d December 1871 Mr Robertson brought this action against said proprietors and tenant, concluding for declarator that they were not entitled to carry on the manufacture of farina or starch as presently carried on by them at the mill, at least that they were not entitled to carry it on in such a way as to cause injury to the pursuer, his property, or tenants, or so as to cause a nuisance, and for interdict against the defenders "carrying on the said manufacture of farina or starch at the said mill or other premises, at least from carrying it on in such way and manner as to cause injury to the pursuer, his property, tenants, and others as aforesaid, in their health, comfort, or otherwise, or so as to create a nuisance," and also for declarator that the pursuer had right to have the water of the burn maintained in a state fit for the use of man and beast, and that the defenders had no right to pollute it so as to render it unfit for the primary uses, and for interdict prohibiting the defenders "from discharging into the said burn or stream at any time from the said mill or other premises any impure water, material, or stuff of any kind, whereby the said water may be polluted or rendered unfit for domestic use, or the use of cattle, or for any of the primary purposes for which water is used as aforesaid, or its amenity in any way diminished." There was also a conclusion for declarator that the defenders were not entitled to divert the water of the stream from its natural channel further than it was in use to be diverted for the lead or cut to the lint-mill, and for interdict against the defenders making such further diversion.

The pursuer averred that the earth, refuse, dirt, and noxious or deleterious matters resulting from or used in the manufacture of farina were carried into and polluted the stream, which was formerly pure, and fit for the primary purposes; that a portion of the pulp, resulting from the grinding or crushing of the potatoes, was conveyed to extensive tanks, where it was allowed to remain till it fermented, when it sent forth intolerable smells; that a quantity of noxious matter drained from these tanks into the stream.

Stewart's Trustees and Mr Stewart admitted that Livingston had converted the lint-mill into a farina-mill, and averred;—"The present defenders, who have not resided at Derculich for many years, have no personal knowledge of the rest of the statements made in these articles, but do not admit their accuracy. They themselves have neither caused nor authorised any pollution of the burn, or any nuisance in connection with the said farina-mill. On the contrary, in the minute of lease, dated 8th June and 10th July 1861, between the late Stewart Robertson Stewart and the defender Donald Livingston, under which the latter holds his farm, the said Donald Livingston, inter alia, binds and obliges himself not to have anything about the farina works, or elsewhere, that shall be a nuisance to the property or to the public."

In reply to specific averments made by the pursuer with regard to the pollution of the stream, and the smell, they "denied that the present defenders performed any of the operations stated. If any offensive smells are caused by the said operations the present defenders are not answerable therefor." They also "denied that the present defenders have caused or authorised any pollution of the burn, or nuisance of any kind."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The manufacture carried on by the defenders at the foresaid mill being a nuisance, the pursuer is entitled to have the same stopped. (2) The said stream being the joint property of the pursuer and of the proprietors of Derculich, the said defenders are not entitled to pollute the same, or render it unfit for the primary purposes for which such water is used.

The defenders Stewart's Trustees and Mrs Stewart pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments as to an additional quantity of water having been diverted from the stream by the present defenders' tenant are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the relative conclusions of the action. (2) In virtue of their titles, and the possession which has followed thereon, the present defenders are entitled to use the water of the Derculich Burn in such quantities as they find necessary, from time to time, for manufacturing purposes. (3) The pursuer and his predecessors having recognised and acquiesced in the said use and control of the water of the said burn by the present defenders and their predecessors, the pursuer is barred from now objecting to such use and control being continued. (4) The present defenders not having caused or authorised any pollution of the Derculich Burn, or any nuisance in connection with the farina works, are entitled to absolvitor from the conclusions of the action relating to such alleged pollution and nuisance.

The defender Livingston pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's averments, in so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defender should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action. (2) The defender ought to be assoilzied, in respect that for time immemorial the stream in question has been used for secondary purposes. (3) The defender having used the water of the stream since 1845 in the same way as at present, and not having infringed or violated any right belonging to the pursuer, ought to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action. (4) The water of the said stream not having been diverted by the defender to any greater extent than it has for time immemorial been in use to be diverted, or so as to injure the rights of the pursuer, the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (5) The pursuer and his authors having acquiesced in the operations of the defender complained of, is barred from obtaining decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The substance of the proof is stated in the note to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 19th March 1872, by which his Lordship, "having considered the closed record, proof, and whole process, finds (first) that it is sufficiently proved in point of fact that for some time previous to the raising of the present action, and

* "NOTE.—The counsel for the landlords maintained that there was no relevant case stated against them, and that they ought not to be sent to proof. He urged that the whole allegations were directed against the tenant, and that it would involve needless expense to make the landlords parties to the proof. On the other hand, the pursuer maintained that his averments were directed both against the proprietor and tenant, both of whom, he alleged, concurred in the whole acts complained of, and both were liable therefor. Although the averments are somewhat indefinite, the Lord Ordinary thinks that he cannot safely dispose of the case on relevancy. Further, the action involves declaratory conclusions of right, to which the landlords, who resist these conclusions, must necessarily be parties; and still further, the landlords appear to join issue at least upon the question as to the amount of water which the pursuer is entitled to abstract and use. The proof, however, is allowed before answer."

in particular during the summer and autumn of the year 1871, the defender Donald Livingston so carried on the manufacture of farina or starch from potatoes at the mill occupied by him on the lands of Derculich as to cause a nuisance to the pursuer: Finds (second) that the said nuisance was occasioned both by smell or unpleasant and offensive odours emanating from the said defender's manufactory, and from refuse produced therein, and by the pollution of the Derculich Burn, occasioned by the said defender's operations: Finds (third) that the Derculich Burn is not a stream dedicated to manufacturing purposes, and that it has not for the prescriptive period been so polluted as to be unfit for the primary uses: Finds, in point of law (fourth), that the defenders are not entitled so to carry on the manufacture of farina or starch at the mill of Derculich as aforesaid as to cause a nuisance to the pursuer, either by offensive smell or by pollution of the said stream; and with these findings, and before further answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that the defenders, or either of them, may state whether, and how, they are prepared to abate the said nuisance in time to come, or that a remit may be made for ascertaining how the said nuisance may be abated, or for such further proceedings as may be necessary: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses up to this date, reserving for after consideration whether there should be any, and what, modification of said expenses in reference to the pursuer's plea as to the quantity of water diverted or abstracted by the defenders, and remits the account of said expenses to the Auditor of Court to tax the same, and to report."*

* "NOTE.—This case has been litigated with great keenness on both sides, and it has been very fully and ably argued both on the questions of fact and on the questions of law which it involves. Both in fact and in law the case is attended with difficulty and nicety.

"The Lord Ordinary has embodied the results at which he has arrived in the preceding interlocutor. The first three findings are findings in point of fact; the fourth is a finding in point of law. These findings will ultimately lead to the disposal of the action; but the Lord Ordinary cannot proceed further at present, because the defenders are entitled to suggest means by which the nuisance may be abated without abolishing or discontinuing their manufacture. For example—the offensive smells may perhaps be prevented by covering the tanks or receptacles from which the smells proceed, and the pollution of the burn may perhaps be prevented by making a settling pond, or by washing the potatoes in tanks, or in some other place than in the open mill-lade. Into these matters, however, the Lord Ordinary cannot at present enter, and he may probably require the assistance of a skilled reporter.

"I. The Lord Ordinary's first finding is that a nuisance has been caused to the pursuer by the mill in question.

"This is really a jury question, and the Lord Ordinary has dealt with it as such. There is conflicting evidence, and the Lord Ordinary is far from saying that there is no difficulty in weighing and deciding upon that evidence. It is certainly not a very strong case of nuisance. The nuisance is not constant, and in ordinary circumstances it is not very great. When the supply of diseased potatoes is small, when the weather is cold, when the wind is in a particular direction, or when the burn is in flood, very little annoyance, or no annoyance at all, may be caused to the pursuer; and even when there may be unpleasant odour or a polluted stream, feelings of good neighbourhood might induce persons in the pursuer's position to overlook the matter, and put up with what many would hold to be a very trifling inconvenience.

"Still the pursuer is entitled to insist in his absolute right, and the Lord Ordinary has found himself obliged to hold that at least sometimes, and in circumstances occurring more or less frequently, the defenders' mill has occasioned a nuisance both by causing offensive odours and by polluting the stream. In particular, it seems to be established that the nuisance was more frequent, more

Robertson v. Stewarts and Livingston.

The defender Livingston reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary, in making a remit, had followed the same course which was adopted in ontinuous, and greater in degree during the summer and autumn of 1871—that is, during the period immediately preceding the raising of the present action—than it had been during previous years. It may even be true that, but for the onsiderable failure of the potato crop in 1871, and the greatly increased manufacture at the defenders' mill that year, this action would never have been raised; nd it seems to be true that a large and offensive tank, which was in operation n 1871, has, since this action was raised, been removed. Still, if only in 1871 nuisance was caused, this would justify the action and entitle the pursuer to me remedy, or to some security that in future years the nuisance should not e repeated.

"The Lord Ordinary abstains from any analysis of the evidence of nuisance. rom the nature of the case the evidence is limited. The pursuer's mansion-ouse and lodge seem to be the only houses injuriously affected; for although r Livingston's house is near his work he cannot complain of his own manufactory. It was only on rare occasions too that the smell reached the pursuer's ansion-house; but the Lord Ordinary thinks that it amounts to a nuisance if pervaded with sufficient constancy or frequency the avenue, or approach there-. Then the pollution of the stream seems to have been not inconsiderable. fty cartloads of diseased potatoes for a considerable period were daily washed the lade, and this at intervals during the working day. It may be that the eam, after each washing, soon ran itself clear, but then it was very soon polted again by the next washing. The pursuer seems well entitled to complain f this.

"On the whole, although not a very clamant case, the Lord Ordinary thinks at during 1871, at least, the nuisance is proved.

"There is no dispute as to the particular mode in which the nuisance is aused,—viz., (1) By offensive smell; and (2) By pollution of the stream.

"A considerable part of the proof was directed against offensive deposits of anure made up of the refuse of the mill. There is no special conclusion as to hese, and they were treated simply as the mode in which the manufacture was onducted so as to cause offence. To some extent these deposits have now been emoved, or are in course of being removed, and it was stated that they would ot be renewed. This belongs, however, rather to the abatement of the nuisance han to the proof of its existence.

"III. The third finding in the preceding interlocutor raises questions of some icety both in point of fact and in regard to the legal effect of the alleged facts.

"(1) The defenders urged that they had absolute right to the water, to take ny quantity of it, and to use it for any purpose, in particular for manufacturing urposes. On this point the landlord of Derculich Mill relied on his titles, and n the past history of the stream. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that on a air reading of the titles they do not support the defenders' contention. No oubt the defenders, Stewart's trustees, have a grant of Derculich Loch and of he streams therefrom, but they have so only as proprietors of the meal-mill of Derculich, and of the mill lands thereof. The meal-mill and its lands are far urther up than the farina work, and have nothing to do therewith. All the ater from the meal-mill is restored to the burn long before it enters the lands n which the farina mill is situated, and which are held by different titles. The efenders cannot use the titles of one estate as giving them a right to divert or se the water for a different estate far further down the stream.

"(2) The defenders contended that Derculich Burn was dedicated to manufacturing purposes, and was no longer applicable to the primary uses. The efenders have failed to instruct this. No doubt there was at one time a waulk r dye mill about a mile further up the stream, but this only existed for a few ears, and it has been discontinued and in ruins for at least half a century. It oes not appear that even when it existed it created any nuisance or material ollution of the stream. The other mills upon the stream merely used the water

Rigby and Beardmore v. Downie,[1] but that was a much clearer nuisance than was presented upon the evidence here. In this ca the pollution of the stream and the smell from the works, if the be regarded as nuisances at all, or as unwarrantable uses of p were occasional and temporary. The works were less offensive t which had ever been held to be a nuisance; and were less so tha kiln on the verge of an estate, the erection of which had been he a legitimate exercise of the right of property, and not in æmulat neighbours.[2] Moreover, the mill had existed since 1846, and the and his father were barred by acquiescence.[3]

as a motive power, and did not in any way pollute it, for it is impo hold that the accidental escape of sawdust or of lint dressings into th would ever give any right permanently to pollute it, so as to unfit i primary uses.

"The only other ground upon which it was maintained that the st been dedicated to polluting manufactures was that at one time holes or steeping lint existed on or near the stream. But although a lint hole c a week or a fortnight an offensive smell, this occurred only once a acquiescence therein would not entitle the defender to carry on his prese facture, if it really causes a nuisance. If the water from the lint h returned to the stream it might pollute it, but probably only for an h that only once a year; and such as it was, the steeping of lint has bee tinued for about forty years. Such uses, it is thought, are quite insuf establish that the Derculich Burn is a manufacturing stream, and tha residing thereon have no right to insist that its water shall be applicat primary uses.

"(3) The defenders pleaded the pursuer's acquiescence as a bar to th action. It appears to be true that the pursuer and his father, from feelings, were very unwilling to take proceedings against the defe Livingston, and they appear to have submitted for a good many years they considered a grievance and an annoyance. But last year things worse than ever, and it would be most unfair, as well as most unfort hold that delay or reluctance to challenge an incipient and a growing will cut off altogether the right to challenge it to whatever height it carried. The cases regarding acquiescence in encroachments or building apply to a case like the present, where admittedly the pursuer has no stop the defenders from building what they please on their own land; Lord Ordinary thinks that the pursuer's forbearance in past years does vent him from vindicating his legal rights.

"The Lord Ordinary's finding in point of law needs no remark. If Ordinary is right in his findings in point of fact there cannot be much about the law applicable to the case.

"The Lord Ordinary has found both the landlords and the tenant the expenses hitherto incurred. No doubt the landlords did not direct the nuisance. But they appeared and resisted decree, although the pur concluded for expenses against such of the defenders as might appear a Still, further, the landlords raised very important questions upon the tit alia, claiming right to the whole water 'for manufacturing purposes.' pleas the landlords have been unsuccessful. There may possibly be som for modifying the pursuer's expenses in respect that he claimed too l right to stop the diversion of the stream otherwise than by the old lade the old purposes. This formed a very small part of the case, however, Lord Ordinary reserves its effect on the expenses till the account is s there is room for modification at all it will be very slight."

Robertson v. Stewarts and Livingston.

Argued for Stewart's Trustees and Mr Stewart;—The landlord was not sponsible for the nuisance, and ought to have been allowed to get out f the action when the record was closed.[1]

Argued for the pursuer;—There was clearly a nuisance here. The ndlord's stipulation in the lease was unavailing in this action, because o man can authorise another to commit a nuisance, and the object of the tion was to regulate the future use of the property, being one which rded not merely the nuisance alleged to be created, but the rights of e conterminous proprietors.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer of this action complains of a nuisance arising m a farina mill occupied and carried on by the defender Livingston upon property of the other defenders, and situated on a small stream which rides the pursuer's property from theirs. This nuisance consists partly of offensive odour which pollutes the air, and partly of offensive refuse ich flows from the manufactory into the stream, and pollutes the water. e object of this action is to secure to the pursuer protection against that isance in time to come, and so the conclusions are partly for interdict and tly for declarator. There is no conclusion for damages, and therefore the tinuation of the nuisance, and the length of time which it has endured, ne to be of comparatively little importance. In regard to the existence of nuisance, the Lord Ordinary has found it proved "that for some time pre- us to the raising of the present action" (2d December 1871), "and, in par- ular, during the summer and autumn of the year 1871, the defender Donald ingston so carried on the manufacture of farina or starch from potatoes at mill occupied by him on the lands of Derculich as to cause a nuisance to pursuer."

Now, it appears to me, my Lords, that it is almost impossible to dispute the ndness of that finding in point of fact. No doubt, this nuisance is not very at, and is very inferior in its effects and consequences to many others upon ich we have been called to decide. Still, it is indisputable that it is a isance both as regards smell and pollution of the water. No doubt it was se in the summer and autumn of 1871, and the defender has tried to main- n that it has been proved that there really was no nuisance until that time. lo not consider that the fair result of the evidence. If it existed, however, in 71, then the pursuer had the right to complain of it, and to raise this action. is a common thing for defenders in actions like this to say that the pursuer s made his complaint, and raised his action, either too late or too soon. But is pursuer, in my opinion, has hit upon the exact time when the nuisance was st; he did not cry out before he was hurt, but was prompt to take steps en the nuisance became too offensive. Therefore, I am of opinion that there a be no doubt as to the correctness of the Lord Ordinary's first finding. Then finds, in the second place, that the nuisance is occasioned by the smell and ise from the manufactory, and by the pollution of the Derculich Burn; and, the third place, that the Derculich Burn is not a stream dedicated to manu- turing purposes, &c., following up these findings in fact with a finding in int of law that the defenders are not entitled so to carry on their manufac- re as to cause the nuisance complained of by the pursuer. Now, these two st findings, numbers 3 and 4, are directed against both sets of defenders. The st two findings are findings against the defender Livingston alone, who is the rty who directly causes the nuisance. But the Lord Ordinary has found ainst the proprietors, the other defenders, that "the Derculich Burn is not a eam dedicated to manufacturing purposes, and that it has not for the prescrip- ve period been so polluted as to be unfit for the primary uses;" and that both of the defenders are not entitled "so to carry on the manufacture of f starch . . . . as to cause a nuisance to the pursuer." As far as fender Livingston is concerned these latter findings raise no new issue; was already settled by the first findings. But the other defenders ma that these findings should not have been directed against them. Th that they are not parties to the making of the nuisance. They say that the mill to the tenant, but gave him no authority to carry on this work create a nuisance. That would have been a satisfactory and conclusiv ment in a different state of this record and proof if these defenders h forward and disclaimed Livingston's proceedings, and said they were that the water should be preserved clean and fit for primary uses. H been their attitude they were not obliged to appear, because the conclu expenses is only directed against those defenders who appear to oppose clusions of the action. They, however, chose to appear, and opposed t suer's conclusions, and that upon grounds which are negatived, and rightly negatived, by this interlocutor which is now before us. In thei to the second article of the condescendence they say—"For manufactur poses the present defenders and their predecessors and authors have, fr immemorial, or at least for forty years, had exclusive possession and co the said burn under their titles. The water of the burn has, during th been used by the present defenders and their foresaids in driving vario after-mentioned belonging to them." Then their second plea in law i lows:—"In virtue of their titles, and the possession which has followe on, the present defenders are entitled to use the water of the Derculich such quantities as they find necessary from time to time for manufacturi poses." If that plea is not maintained to defend Livingston's proceedi difficult to see why it is maintained at all. That becomes plain too upon at the proof, because there it appears that they endeavoured in thei examination of the pursuer's witnesses to prove that Livingston does reality create any nuisance at all. I think that the finding of the Lord C against these defenders is not only right, but absolutely necessary to p the contention that the water has become dedicated to manufacturing p and so is lost for its primary uses, and that therefore they are entitled what use of it they please without considering the pursuer's right to a use of the water. On these grounds I consider the Lord Ordinary's inte right, both in fact and law. The Lord Ordinary concludes with—"A the cause to be enrolled, that the defenders, or either of them, may state and how they are prepared to abate the said nuisance in time to come, o remit may be made for ascertaining how the said nuisance may be abate I understand, neither of the defenders availed themselves of this—they desire to state any mode in which they were prepared to abate the nuisa were they prepared to have an inquiry under a remit. In consequence silence the Lord Ordinary pronounced another interlocutor, which is als us, and under review. By this interlocutor he "remits to Mr James lecturer on chemistry, Edinburgh, to inspect and examine the farina c manufactory carried on by the defender Livingston at the mill of Dercul water courses and works therewith connected, and to report whether th and effluvia emitted from the said manufactory, and the pollution of th of Derculich occasioned by said manufactory, can be prevented or aba in what manner." This was undoubtedly intended by the Lord Ordina an interlocutor in favour of the defenders, and was meant to give t opportunity of devising, with the help of a chemist, means by which the carry on their operations in an inoffensive way. They, however, object interlocutor as strongly as to the other, and, in fact, have a quarrel v Lord Ordinary on every point.

If your Lordships agree with me that the Lord Ordinary's interlo correct, then effect must be given to the conclusions of the action. I unc the defenders to say that they wish a judgment, aye or no, upon the que nuisance. They say the mill must either go on as it does at present o all.

Robertson v. Stewarts and Livingston.

But if they find that the Court agrees with the Lord Ordinary they may perhaps, even yet, if they desire it, get some such remit as was suggested and ordered by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—There are two questions here, one with the tenant, and the other with the landlord. As to the tenant, it is impossible not to sympathise to some extent with his position. But, looking at the proof, I cannot arrive at any other conclusion than that arrived at by your Lordship in the chair. The owners on each side of the stream are equally interested in the water, and any improper use made of it is, therefore, one to which the pursuer is quite entitled to object. I regret much that the tenant insists on a decision on the question of legal right, in place of consenting to a remit to ascertain how far the pursuer's objections may be obviated. This last is a course very commonly taken, and we should have been extremely willing to have adopted it here.

I agree with your Lordship that what took place in 1871 was of itself quite a sufficient ground for the judgment now to be pronounced. There is no doubt that there was a nuisance, and that that nuisance was much increased in 1871. It is not, however, very material what was the state of matters prior to 1871. The summons was brought in December of that year; and since a judgment on the legal point is insisted on we have no alternative but to find that there was a nuisance.

With regard to the position of the landlord, every case of this kind must be judged of by its own circumstances. It is true that in the third article of the lease Donald Livingston binds himself "not to erect any buildings or others at the farina works carried on by him, without the express permission of the proprietor in writing, and not to have anything about said premises or elsewhere that shall be a nuisance to the property or to the public." But the farina works had been erected by the tenant during the currency of a previous lease, and their existence is here recognised by the landlord, and was, of course, taken into view in fixing the rent. Then the last article of the lease bears,—"The tenant will be allowed to make such erections as he will find necessary (with consent of the proprietors as before mentioned) for carrying on a farina manufactory," and "to be allowed as at present the privilege of water from Derculich by shutting the sluice every night." If, therefore, the proprietor allows the erections to be put up, though without giving express permission, that, in a question with the adjoining proprietors, is much the same as if he directly sanctioned them. The right to the water is expressly given, and a power to make erections for a farina manufactory, although with a reserved right to the proprietor to regulate the extent of such erections, which he has not interfered to do.

Then we cannot overlook that in the record the landlord justifies and claims right for himself and his tenants to do all that has been done, and to use the water of the Derculich Burn for manufacturing purposes as he and they think proper. The answer to the second article of the pursuer's condescendence, and the 2d and 3d pleas in law for the landlord, assert these rights broadly, and his first plea in law goes even beyond what is pleaded by the tenant. On the whole I am afraid that there is no course open to us but that proposed by your Lordship, unless the tenant at the eleventh hour shall accept the proposal for a remit to ascertain whether the pursuer's objection cannot be obviated without discontinuing the works.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—There are some nuisances so serious—so intolerable—so plainly beyond the reach or hope of removal or diminution—that there is no doubt, and no alternative. The process which, in a situation not protected by prescription or dedication to manufacturing purposes, causes such a nuisance, must be put an end to. The law absolutely forbids it. But sometimes there occurs a case where, in the course of a manufacture not in itself unlawful, a nuisance has arisen, which, though sufficiently offensive to entitle a neighbour to complain, is not necessarily, and at all times, a nuisance, but to which mitigation or alleviation may be given by the skill and exertions of the manufacturer; and there may well be conceived a case where the ends of justice and the reasonable rights and interests of the complainers would be sufficiently protected b such mitigation reducing the nuisance to a point where the interposition of la is not appropriate.

It is not every slight pollution of a stream, nor every disagreeable odour, th is to be dealt with as a nuisance, and put down by authority of law. Th expression "abatement of nuisance" does not necessarily mean the entire a absolute removal of all pollution of stream, and all disagreeable odour, but su diminution of pollution and of smell as to render it such as ought fairly a reasonably to be submitted to.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in the view which he takes of the eviden I think that a nuisance to a considerable extent has been proved to be cau by the farina manufactory,—both as regards the pollution of the stream and regards the offensive smell. I think it clear that the stream has not be dedicated to manufacturing purposes, and that there has been no prescripti I do not refer to the detail of the evidence. I have read it all carefully, an have come to the conclusion that both the pollution of the stream and the off siveness of smell has been sufficiently proved to an extent amounting nuisance.

There is no prescription to protect against complaint, and neighbourly acq escence in an increasing annoyance seems to have reached its limits in 187 when it became (as some of the witnesses say) intolerable.

Many of the remarks made by the defenders' counsel would have great weig if accompanied by a bona fide effort to mitigate the nuisance; and any consid able mitigation obtained by earnest endeavour in a friendly spirit, though invol ing some expense, could not fail to produce a good impression, and, it may be, favourable result. I do not think that this is such a case of nuisance as wou necessarily have required the interposition of law at once to put down the farm manufactory, if reasonable mitigation thereof had been proposed. It is by n means a very serious or aggravated case of nuisance. It is not constant, it only occasionally that it reaches the mansion-house, and it is in certain perio and states of whether so slight as to be within the reach of reasonable forbe ance.

It has occurred to me, and I suggested it during the discussion, that a stren ous effort under skilful advice ought to be made to remove the nuisance if p sible, or so far to mitigate and alleviate it, both as regards the burn and t smell, as to leave no ground for reasonable complaints.

The defenders, however, have hitherto declined to act on this suggestion.

We are therefore under the necessity of dealing with the case as it stands the proof.

I am of opinion that a nuisance has been proved of which the pursuer is e titled to complain, and in respect of which the pursuer is entitled to demand abatement, and accordingly I concur in the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and the remarks which have been made by your Lordship.

On the separate pleas maintained by the landlord I am further of opin that, looking to the terms of the lease to the defender Livingston, and to t pleas maintained, and the course of examination pursued, by the landlord, must remain as a defender, and be dealt with as a defender, and that the L Ordinary has rightly dealt with him in this interlocutor.

I give no opinion as to a trifling diversion of the burn for ordinary purpo But in judging of the plea for the landlord we must bear in mind that t water of the burn was diverted for the special purpose of working the far mill which caused the nuisance.

If the other defender, the tenant, is correct in alleging that the nuisance unavoidable—inseparable from the working of the mill—incapable of mitigat or diminution—then the landlord who granted the lease, and authorised t working of a mill necessarily creating a nuisance, and who supplied the b water for the purpose of that working, cannot escape from responsibility.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard cou sel on the reclaiming note for the defender Donald Livingst against Lord Gifford's interlocutor of 16th May 1872, and as bringing under review also the previous interlocutor of 19th March 1872, adhere to both interlocutors, and refuse the said reclaiming note: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses since the date of the interlocutor of 19th March 1872; allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same when lodged to the Auditor to tax and report, and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed, with power to his Lordship to decern for the amount of said expenses when ascertained."

Entail—Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. c. 87)—Provisions to Younger Children—Deductions from Free Rent.—Held (diss. Lord Neaves, rev. judgment of Lord Ormidale) that in estimating the free rental on which provisions to younger children are to be fixed, under the Act 5 Geo. IV. c. 87, there falls to be deducted the interest of the provisions to which the younger children of a former proprietor may be entitled.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. R.

THE deceased Robert Nugent Dunbar, heir of entail of the lands of Machermore, by contract of marriage bound himself and the succeeding heirs of entail to pay certain provisions to his younger children at his death. At the date of his death £1147, 16s. of provisions to the younger children of a former proprietor remained unpaid. By the Aberdeen Act (5 Geo. IV. c. 87), sec. 1, it is enacted—"That it shall and may be lawful to every heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate under any entail already made or hereafter to be made in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, under the limitations and conditions aftermentioned, to provide and infeft his wife in a liferent provision out of his entailed lands and estates by way of annuity," the said annuity not to exceed "one-third part of the free yearly rent of the said lands and estates where the same shall be let, or of the free yearly value thereof where the same shall not be let, after deducting the public burdens, liferent provisions, the yearly interest of debts and provisions, including the interest of provisions to children hereinafter specified, and the yearly amount of other burdens, of what nature soever, affecting and burdening the said lands and estates, or the yearly rents or proceeds thereof, and diminishing the clear yearly rent or value thereof to such heir of entail in possession, all as the same may happen to be at the death of the granter." Sec. 4,—"That it shall and may be lawful to the heir of entail in possession of any such entailed estate as aforesaid to grant bond of provision or obligations binding the succeeding heirs of entail in payment, out of the rents or proceeds of the same, to the lawful child or lawful children of the person granting such bonds or obligations who shall not succeed to such entailed estate, such sum or sums of money, bearing interest from the granter's death as to him or her shall seem fit; provided always that the amount of such provision shall in no case exceed the proportions following of the free yearly rent or free yearly value of the whole of said entailed lands and estates, after deducting the public burdens, liferent provisions including those to wives or husbands, authorised to be granted by this Act, the yearly interest of debts and provisions, and the yearly amount of other burdens of what nature soever, affecting or burthening the said lands and estates, or the yearly rents or proceeds thereof, and diminishing the clear yearly rent or yearly value thereof as aforesaid to the heir of entail in possession—(that is to say)," for one child, one year's free rent; for two children, two years' free rent; for three or more children, three years' free rent. And sec. 6,—"Provided always, and be it enacted and declared, that where the powers hereinbefore contained of granting provisions to a child or children shall have been exercised by one or more heir or heirs in possession of any such entailed lands and estates as aforesaid, to the full extent of three years' free rent or value of the entailed estate as aforesaid, it shall not be in the power of any heir in possession of the same lands and estates to grant further provisions to his or her child or child

(3) In terms of the said Act no more than rs' free rents of the said entailed estate can be charged at one id the provision to the pursuers will fall to be restricted to a sum long with the foresaid prior provision to Misses Antoinetta and e Nugent Dunbar, of £1147, 16s., will not exceed three years' free he said estate.

arties were agreed that the annual rental of the estate, for the of this action, was £1261, 19s. 8d., subject to the deduction of— 11s. 6d. as public burdens; and (2) £200 as the annuity to the f the late Robert Nugent Dunbar; and it was contended by the s that in estimating the free annual rental a further deduction of . 5d. should be made as the annual interest at 4 per cent on the nce of £1141, 16s. The pursuers opposed this last deduction.

ord Ordinary (Ormidale) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds as stated by the counsel for both parties that they concurred in the Court to proceed on the footing of their being agreed that disputed question between them relates to the manner in which nce of a provision which had been made in favour of his children randfather of the defender, amounting, said balance, to £1141, 16s. e dealt with in ascertaining the amount at which the pursuers' s ought now to be fixed: Finds, as regards this disputed ques- t the said balance of £1141, 16s. falls to be deducted from three e rents of the estate belonging to the defender: Finds that the ere agreed that the annual rental of the estate in question, for oses of this action, is £1261, 19s. 8d., as per the state No. 9 of subject to the deduction of—(1) £79, 11s. 6d. as public burdens; £200 as the annuity to the widow of the late Robert Nugent ; and that it was contended by the defenders that in estimating annual rental a further deduction of £45, 13s. 5d. should be the annual interest at 4 per cent on the said balance of £1141, ds that the defenders are not entitled to the deduction of the said 45, 13s. 5d., and that the free annual rental of the estate for the of this action is to be taken as amounting to £982, 8s. 2d.: Finds circumstances that the sum for which the pursuers are entitled to

The defenders reclaimed. They argued;—The heir was entitled to deduction of the interest of the provisions to the younger children of t former heir in so far as unpaid. It was the interest of a debt which t statute said was to be deducted.[1]

The pursuers argued;—The 4th section of the Aberdeen Act could on mean the interest of the provisions to the widows of former proprieto It could not mean the interest of the provisions to the younger childr also. If so there would be a double deduction—first, of the capital of the provisions, and second, of the interest. The intention of the statute w that an heir might be burdened to the extent of three years' free rent, but no further extent. But if the pursuers' contention was upheld, a succee ing heir could never be burdened with three years' free rent as long as a part of the provisions to the younger children of a prior heir remained u paid, as he would be entitled to a deduction not only of the amount

* "NOTE.—The only question as to which the parties were not agreed in t case was whether, in ascertaining the sum to which the pursuers are entitl not only the £1141, 16s., being the amount remaining undischarged of a pro sion made by the grandfather of the defender, a former proprietor of the estate, his children, must be deducted from the three years' free rental of the estate, l also, as contended for by the defender, whether the interest of that sum should be deducted in estimating the free annual rental. The Lord Ordinary does think that this contention of the defender's is well founded. He is entitled, terms of the act 5 Geo. IV. cap. 5, to have the sum of £1141, 16s., the bala remaining unpaid of the former provision, deducted; but the Lord Ordinary c not see, either in the statute itself or on principle, any reason for holding t interest of that sum should also be deducted. The principal itself being o deducted, there cannot, so far as he can discover, be any room for allowing a duction in respect of interest, which indeed must be held to have been dispo of as an accessary along with the principal itself.

"The Lord Ordinary was referred, in the course of the debate, to the case Brodie v. Brodie, &c., 6th Dec. 1867, 6 Macph. 92, but the decision in that c proceeded on a specialty which does not occur here. It rather appears to t Lord Ordinary that the decision in the case of Brodie would have been in c formity with his views as now expressed, had it not been for the specia referred to.

"It has only further to be mentioned that the sums in the interlocutor n pronounced were adjusted and fixed on by the parties themselves.

"The Lord Ordinary has been unable to see any ground for refusing to t pursuers their expenses. The correspondence produced, which took place bef the action was raised, shews that the pursuers ineffectually endeavoured obtain from the defenders a rental of the estate in question, in order that th might know and settle upon what their just claim was. That rental (No. 9 process), however, was not forthcoming till produced with the defences, and t pursuers having been perfectly satisfied with it, there need have been no furth litigation; but the defenders then contended that they were entitled to a dedu tion not only of the capital sum of a former provision, but also of interest there In this contention, however, which they maintained to the last, the defenders ha been unsuccessful. If being therefore clear that the whole expense of the litig tion has been caused by the defenders, it is only right they should be subject in payment of them."

Dunbar and Others v. Dunbar.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case, or the point which has been argued to us, very meagrely stated on the record, but there is no dispute about the hich it depends. The controversy relates to the amount of a bond of granted by the last heir of entail under the Aberdeen Act, and depends stion, whether, in estimating the three years' free rent in terms of the 4th the Aberdeen Act, the interest of provisions granted under that sec-e statute by a prior heir, not yet extinguished, are to be deducted.
o other question.
rd Ordinary has found that such interest is not to be deducted, but on f the authorities, and on the words of the statute, I am unable to hat conclusion. It seems to me opposed to the words of the Act, e words of the Act were doubtful, to the whole current of authority ice.
e or canon for ascertaining the capital sum to which the statutory r whomsoever exercised, can apply, is contained in the 4th section of the Act, and in that section only. The question, how much of that capital an or available for provisions to the heir in possession for the time r the 6th section,—and the mode of recovering the rights of the heir a debtor in the provision, and the remedies open to the creditors, are by subsequent clauses. But no other clause in the statute deals with the rule under which the free rent of the estate is to be ascertained.
r concern the principal or capital sum, which consists, in whole or in ree times one year's rent, the amount of which can only be arrived at ng the rules laid down in the 4th section.
e so laid down is the following:—"That it shall and may be lawful to entail in possession of any such entailed estate as aforesaid to grant bond n or obligations binding the succeeding heirs of entail in payment, rents or proceeds of the same, to the lawful child or lawful children of n granting such bonds or obligations who shall not succeed to such state, of such sum or sums of money, bearing interest from the granter's to him or her shall seem fit; provided always that the amount of such shall in no case exceed" the proportions therein mentioned "of the y rent or free yearly value of the whole of said entailed lands and ter deducting the public burdens, liferent provisions, including those to husbands, authorised to be granted by this Act, the yearly interest of provisions, and the yearly amount of other burdens, of what nature ecting or burthening the said lands and estates, or the yearly rents or hereof, and diminishing the clear yearly rent or yearly value thereof id to the heir of entail in possession." Does the word "provisions" rovisions granted under this clause? This is an important question, if eal doubt about it. There must at this moment be many rights burdened estates, the amount and effect of which must have been regulated nstruction of the Act, whatever that may be, and the rights under them to be limited or enlarged according to the construction we may adopt.
words of the 4th section there can be no doubt that the expression is to include, and prima facie does include, provisions under the clause.
that there are no explanatory words to this effect adjected to this clause s in the first section in providing for the mode of ascertaining the free he widow's annuity, nor such as occur in the very line before, in this se. But this raises no inference sufficient to limit this general expresnot burden the estate, but it certainly does burden the rents and pro-he estate. The 8th section of the statute makes this certain, for it pro-t while the provisions granted by the Act shall not affect the fee, they shall affect the rents. The 9th section is also material. It provides that aft a year has elapsed from the death of the granter the creditor in the bond ma call up the amount, and the heir on payment may take an assignation, and kee up the debt. It also provides that the creditors may use all diligence again the rents, but may not adjudge the estate. The 10th section gives the heir privilege by which, on assigning one third of the rents, he frees himself fro diligence during his life, although of course the unpaid balance will remain o his death. Finally, under the 12th section, it is provided that in no case c the heir in possession be deprived of more than one-third of the free rent of t estate, and he is authorised to apply to the Court to restrict the burd accordingly.

No. 34.

Dec. 7, 1872. Dunbar and Others v. Dunbar.

Under these provisions of the statute there cannot, I think, be any dou that these bonds affect the rents, and therefore that the interest of them must deducted in estimating the amount of the year's rent three times, which the limit of the burden; and this I believe to have been the uniform understan ing of the profession, as I gather from our institutional writers. Mr Duff in h work on entails states that the interest of provisions to wives and children mu be deducted. Mr M. Bell in his lectures states it still more clearly. He say that the free rent is to be ascertained in the same way as that directed in th first clause as regards the widow's annuity. Now, it is a matter of express decisio in the case of Boyd, 13 D. 1302, that the interest on provisions granted unde the 4th section must be deducted in ascertaining the free rent in order to fix th amount of the widow's annuity. Mr Ross also states the law in the same way.

What thus seems to have been the practice is so far borne out by decisio that I have not found that it ever was questioned judicially. It was argued t us that the word "provision" did not even include provisions granted under th powers of the entail. But Lord Curriehill's opinion in the case of Lockhart, 15 D 914, is conclusive on this point,—and he lays down the contrary as the undoubte construction of the statute. On the question whether provisions under th 4th section do or do not affect the rents I think the case of Cochrane, 9 D. 173 sets that matter at rest. That case related to a provision which burdene neither the estate nor the rents, but had been found in the House of Lords t be a personal burden on the successive heirs of entail. The question whic arose in this case was whether the interest of this provision ought to be deducte in fixing the amount of free rent under a bond granted in virtue of the 4th sec tion of the Aberdeen Act. It was found that it should not; because, unlike pro visions under the Aberdeen Act, it was purely a personal debt, and did no affect the rents, and that the debt could not be kept up against the rents by th heir on payment as can be done under the Aberdeen Act. The opinions of Lor Justice-Clerk Hope, Lord Moncreiff, and Lord Cockburn clearly establish tha a provision under the Aberdeen Act does affect the rents, not merely becaus it is a personal debt of the heir of entail, but because vi statuti it is a burde on the rents into whose hands soever they may come, and therefore can be kep up against the succeeding heirs.

The Lord Ordinary seems to have thought that the provisions of the 6th sec tion might lead to an opposite conclusion; and that somehow the result of de ducting the interest in question would give rise to a double deduction of it. I think this is a mistake. The 6th section does not relate to the mode of ascer taining the free rent. It has no connection with that subject. It relates ex clusively to the capital sum after it has been ascertained under the 4th section and only applies in the special case of the bond of provision, along with sums al ready laid upon the estate under the 4th section of the Act, exceeding that sum It provides that no greater burden than the three years' free rent shall burde the rents or the heir in possession; and that therefore the last bond must be limited to the sum which will complete that amount until part of the prior bur den is paid off or extinguished. It has no other object or effect. It never comes into operation at all unless the margin has been exceeded, and when it has it only postpones the excess as a charge on the rents until they are relieved of the prior and existing burden. In cases in which it applies it cannot receive effect until the capital sum of free rent has been previously ascertained.

LORD COWAN and LORD BENHOLME concurred. No. 34.

LORD NEAVES.—I am sorry to have to express a difference of opinion in this case. The question is as to the construction of the 4th and 6th clauses of the Aberdeen Act. The view which I take is this: Suppose an estate has an invariable gross rental, it is in the power of the first heir to burden it to the extent of three years' free rents. If there are no provisions to wives or children there is no doubt how the matter would stand. You would deduct the public burdens and the yearly interest of real burdens, and you would then have the net rental. Having so found the net rental the successive heirs in possession for the time have power to keep the estate burdened to the extent of three years of that rental, and it seems to me to make no difference that the provisions have been granted by one heir after another so long as the three years' rent is not exceeded. Suppose the net rental of an estate to be £10,000 a-year, if the successive heirs in possession have never burdened it beyond £30,000 there is no ground of complaint. Then, let us look at the 6th clause; the first portion is negative,—"Where the powers hereinbefore contained of granting provisions to a child or children shall have been exercised by one or more heir or heirs in possession of any such entailed lands and estates as aforesaid to the full extent of three years' free rent or value of the entailed estate as aforesaid it shall not be in the power of any heir in possession of the same lands and estates to grant further provisions to his or her child or children till some part of the provisions granted, to the extent of three years' rent or value as aforesaid, shall have been paid or extinguished;" but "upon the payment or extinction thereof, or any part thereof, it shall be in the power of such heir in possession to grant provisions to his or her child or children to the extent of the provisions so paid or extinguished as aforesaid." Suppose the first heir lays on the whole £30,000; nothing more can be done. But if when another heir comes into possession £10,000 has been paid off, he is by the express words of this 6th clause empowered to grant provisions to his children to the extent paid off. He can put on the same amount as has been paid off, leaving a succeeding heir in no worse situation than if the original burden had not been partially extinguished. I cannot conceive that if an heir pays off £10,000 he cannot put on £10,000, but must submit to a new calculation, deducting £1000 annually for the interest of the £20,000 still remaining. Each succeeding heir seems to me to have the power to supplement the partial exercise of the right by the prior heirs so as to bring up the full amount which the first heir could have laid on had he pleased. The first heir puts on £20,000 when he could have put on £30,000. He leaves £10,000 to the second heir to fill up. I cannot see that in fairness it makes any difference to the succeeding heir whether the full amount of the burden has been laid on by one heir or by ten.

No doubt we are not to construe the 6th section alone. We must also take into view the 4th section. But I cannot believe that because £10,000 of the original £30,000 has been paid off there is to be a deduction of £1000 a-year as interest on the remaining £20,000, so that the succeeding heir would escape for £3000 less than if the original burden had not been partially extinguished. The 4th section is peculiar. It is not at all like the 3d clause as to widows' provisions; and it seems to me the true meaning is, if no provisions to children have been granted, when starting them, the "interest of debts and provisions" on the estate falls to be deducted, but when these burdens are once begun the 6th clause regulates subsequent exercise of the power.

There is no decided case to the effect that the interest of provisions to children 'burden" the rents. There are no doubt vague expressions in the books and apparent indications of opinion in the case of Cochrane, but it is not at all clear that the interest of a child's provision under the statute can be said to burden or affect the rents in itself. No doubt diligence may be used for it as it may be for any other debt, but in no other way can the interest be said to affect the rents than that the heir is due the money; and his rents, whether of the entailed estate or of any other estate belonging to him, may be attached in payment. The rents are not intercepted from the heir; he is entitled to them, but they may be taken in payment. I do not see anything in the 4th clause which supersedes the view involved in my opinion as to what seems the most equitable provision of the 6th. The estate can only be burdened to the extent of three years' free rents, but it makes no difference by how many or how few heirs the burdens are imposed.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor in so far as it finds that in estimating the free annual rental the sum of £45, 13s. 5d., being a year's interest on the sum of £1141, 16s., which is the balance of the prior bond affecting the entailed estate, should not be deducted from the free rental: Find that the said sum must be deducted: Find that the pursuers are entitled to decree in this process for the sum of £1168, 8s. 2d.: Find the pursuers liable in expenses since the date of closing the record, and remit," &c, Succession—Testament—Universitas—Heir.—A truster left his property "to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever in and through my mother, hereby excluding the relations by my father, and all others except through my said mother." Held (1) (diss. Lord Cowan) that the estate was not intended to pass as a universitas to his mother's next of kin, but that his mother's heir-at-law succeeded to the heritage and her heirs in moveables to the moveables; and (2) that although part of the property was conquest in the truster the mother's heir of line, not her heir of conquest, succeeded.

THE late Thomas Mitchell, Haddington, left three heritable properties, (1) a property lying in the town of Gilmerton, to which he had succeeded as nearest lawful heir of line and of conquest to Alexander Mitchell, his only brother; (2) a property situated on the north side of the Crossgate or High Street of Haddington, purchased by the testator and paid for by him with his own funds; (3) a property in Market Street, Haddington, purchased and paid for by the said Alexander Mitchell, but conveyed direct by the sellers to the testator, the same not having been disponed to Alexander Mitchell in his lifetime. He also left moveable property. By his trust-deed he left his heritable property to his son Thomas Mitchell, subject to a liferent of the property in Crossgate of Haddington, and in Gilmerton, to his widow, Mrs Wilhelmina Banks or Mitchell, during her widowhood. He farther left her a liferent of his household furniture. The remainder of his moveable property he directed to be conveyed one half to his son Thomas Mitchell, and the other half to his widow. By the sixth purpose of his deed he declared—"In case the said Thomas Mitchell should predecease me without leaving lawful issue, my trustees shall pay and apply the estate and effects before directed to be conveyed to the said Thomas Mitchell to David Mitchell, my father, and in case of his being then dead, to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever in and through the late Helen Waddell, my mother, hereby excluding the relations by my father, and all others, except through my said mother, in the same way as if the said Thomas Mitchell had been alive." The deed authorised the trustees to sell the heritage.

Thomas Mitchell and David Mitchell both predeceased the testator, whose trustees brought this action of multiplepoinding for the distribution of his estate.

Competing claims were lodged for (1) Thomas Waddell, the immediate elder and only surviving brother of the testator's mother; (2) Mrs Janet Waddell or Robertson, the only surviving sister of the testator's mother; (3) Mrs Agnes Waddell or White, the heir-at-law of the testator's mother, being the only child of the deceased David Waddell, her younger brother; and (4) George Archibald, who was the son of one of the three sisters of the testator's father, who were his heirs both in heritage and moveables.

Thomas Waddell claimed to be ranked and preferred equally with the said Mrs Janet Waddell or Robertson to the whole estate, heritable and moveable, left by the testator, subject to the rights of the widow; or otherwise, to the whole of the heritable portion of the estate which was conquest in the person of the testator, subject to the rights, if any, of the widow. He pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the deed in question the whole estate of the testator, heritable and moveable, subject to the provisions in favour of the widow, were appointed, in the event which occurred, to be paid to the testator's nearest relatives on the mother's side, and therefore fell to the claimant and Mrs Janet Waddell or Robertson as the surviving members of the family at the testator's death. (2) Or otherwise, the claimant being heir of conquest of the testator's mother, is entitled to the property which was conquest in the person of the deceased.

Mrs Janet Waddell or Robertson claimed to be ranked and preferred, equally with the said Thomas Waddell, to the whole estate, heritable and moveable, left by the testator, subject to the rights of the widow; or otherwise, to be ranked and preferred to the one-half of the moveable estate not conveyed to the widow. She pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the deed in question the persons standing in the relation of nearest of kin to the testator on the mother's side at the time of his death became entitled, subject to the rights of the widow, to the whole estate of the deceased, heritable and moveable, as personæ designatæ, notwithstanding the character of the property bequeathed, which accordingly falls to be divided between the claimant and her brother Thomas Waddell. (2) Separatim, or otherwise, the claimant, as heir in mobilibus, is entitled to the personal estate, in so far as the same is not conveyed to the widow.

Mrs Agnes Waddell or White claimed (1) the heritable subjects in Tolbooth Street or Market Street of Haddington, with the rents and proceeds thereof since the truster's death. (2) The fee of the heritable subjects in Crossgate or High Street of Haddington, and at Gilmerton, under the burden of the liferent of the truster's widow during her viduity. (3) Any other heritable estate of which the truster died possessed. (4) One-half of the moveable estate, including any interest accumulated thereon since the truster's death. (5) The household furniture, plenishing, and effects in the truster's dwelling-house, under burden of the widow's liferent during her viduity. She pleaded;—Being the truster's nearest heir in and through his mother she is, in virtue of the said settlement, entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of her claim.

George Archibald claimed as representing his mother, one of the heirs-at-law and next of kin of the testator. He pleaded;—(1) According to a sound construction of the sixth purpose of the said deed the whole heritable estate of the testator was disponed and conveyed in favour of his nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever. (2) Otherwise the said 6th purpose of the codicil is with respect to the heritable estate of the testator incapable of interpretation, contradictory in its terms, and void of meaning, and falls to be held pro non scripto. (7) According to a sound construction of the sixth purpose of said deed the half of the free residue of the t moveable estate and the whole of his household furniture was con his next of kin and nearest heirs in mobilibus. (8) Otherwise the s purpose is contradictory in terms, and falls to be held pro non scr

The Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) pronounced this interlocutor:- that the sixth trust purpose of the additional settlement of the Thomas Mitchell, of 22d June 1859, is not void from uncertainty; cording to the true construction of the said sixth trust pur claimant Mrs Agnes Waddell or White is entitled to the testato able subjects situated in Tolbooth Street or Market Street of I ton, and in the Crossgate or High Street of Haddington, and at Gi but subject, in so far as regards the said subjects situated in th gate or High Street of Haddington, and the subjects in Gilmerto liferent thereof conferred by the said additional settlement u Wilhelmina Banks or Mitchell, widow of the said Thomas Mitc under the conditions attached to the said liferent by the said a settlement; and that the claimants Thomas Waddell and Mrs Jar dell or Robertson are entitled to one-half of the free moveable e effects of the said Thomas Mitchell, and to the household furnitu ishing, and effects in the dwelling-house of the testator, subject s the liferent of the said furniture, plenishing, and effects conferred said Mrs Wilhelmina Banks or Mitchell, but with and under the c attached to the said liferent by the said additional settlement: R prefers the said several claimants upon the fund in medio accord

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the sixth trust purp additional settlement of the testator is not void from uncertainty, as m by the claimant George Archibald, and that there are no grounds on v testator's heirs-at-law can succeed. By that additional settlement th are directed to convey the testator's heritable subjects in Haddingtor merton to his son, Thomas Mitchell, on his attaining twenty-one years o under burden of the liferent over part thereof conferred upon his wid household furniture and plenishing is to be liferented by the widow, a death is to fall and belong to the said Thomas Mitchell; and one-h moveables is to be paid and applied to the widow, and the other half t Thomas Mitchell on his attaining majority. It is by the trust purpo additional settlement provided, that if the testator's son, Thomas Mitche predecease him without issue, an event which happened, the trustees sl and apply the estate and effects therein directed to be conveyed to hi testator's father David Mitchell; and in case of his being then dead, v happened, 'to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever in an the late Helen Waddell, my mother, hereby excluding the relations by r and all others, except through my said mother, in the same way as if Thomas Mitchell had been alive.' There is here not only an express of his relations by his father, but there is a direction to the trustees t apply his estate and effects to certain parties, in regard to whom there thought, be no doubt. The expression, 'my own nearest heirs and whomsoever in and through the late Helen Waddell, my mother,' is rate. But the intention of the testator, in regard to the persons who tended by that sixth trust purpose to favour, appears to the Lord Ordi clear. And he considers that these persons are the nearest heirs whon his mother.

Mrs Robertson reclaimed.

She argued;—There was no such term known in our law as an heir through a mother, and the testator meant his relations through his mother.[1]

Thomas Waddell so far adopted Mrs Robertson's argument, and further argued that if it was unsuccessful he was, as heir in conquest to the testator's mother, at least entitled to the heritable property, which was conquest in the testator.

Mrs White argued;—It was true that there was no such term in law as heir through a mother, but the persons whom the testator had in view were those who would have succeeded to the properties had they belonged to the testator's mother. The claimant was therefore entitled to the heritage as her heir-at-law. The claimant took as heir-at-law not of the testator but of his mother, therefore there was no distinction between the heritage and the conquest[2] and she was entitled to the whole.

George Archibald argued;—If the property, both heritable and moveable, was left to the testator's heirs and assignees, the sixth purpose had no meaning, and the testator died intestate.[3]

LORD BENHOLME.—The question for decision arises in an action of multiplepoinding and exoneration brought by the trustees of the deceased Thomas Mitchell. They have summoned various competitors, whose pleas appear to rest exclusively on the sixth purpose of the trust. I will not therefore trouble your Lordships by reading more than that sixth purpose, which is as follows:—"In case the said Thomas Mitchell should predecease me without leaving lawful issue, my trustees shall pay and apply the estate and effects before directed to be conveyed to the said Thomas Mitchell to David Mitchell, my father, and in case of his being then dead, to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever, in and through the late Helen Waddell, my mother, hereby excluding the relations by my father and all others, except through my said mother, in the same way as if the said Thomas Mitchell had been alive." Thomas Mitchell predeceased the truster, and the truster's father, David Mitchell, did the same, so the succession falls "to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever in and through the late Helen Waddell, my mother." It is obvious that this clause, scientifically considered, is meaningless, because a man can have no heirs through his mother. At the same time I cannot give effect to the heir at law's contention that there is here so much uncertainty as to create intestacy. I say no more as to his contention than that all relations through the father are expressly excluded.

quest could not therefore have any right. The heritable estate must be given according to the direction of the testator, and that direction being to the testator's nearest heirs whomsoever in and through the mother, must be held, the Lord Ordinary conceives, as designating her heir of line as the party entitled to the heritage—(Boyd, 28th June 1774, Dict., 3070; Miller, 9 Shaw, 295, and 7 W. & S., 1; Robison, 21 D., 905). The claimant Mrs Agnes Waddell or White has therefore been preferred to the fund in medio, in so far as it consists of heritage, as the heir of line of the testator's mother.

Whom, then, did the truster mean by his nearest heirs and assignees through his mother? He left a mother's brother, a mother's sister, and a mother's niece through a deceased brother. The father of the niece was the truster's mother's younger brother, the surviving brother having been elder than the mother. We must endeavour to find out which the testator meant. It has been contended that the testator having used the word "relations" in reference to his father must have meant relations also through his mother. I cannot agree to that. He uses different words "heirs and assignees," and while "relations" was most properly used when excluding those by the father, as it embraced parties who would have been entitled either to heritage or moveables, it cannot be transferred to the instituting clause, as the testator has shewn no indication that he intended the same parties to take both his heritage and his moveables. I cannot think we can interpolate the word "relations" for "nearest heirs" in the instituting clause.

When he uses the words "his own nearest heirs in and through his mother" it seems to me that he means that his mother's heirs should take; and that gives rise to the contention of his mother's niece. She is his mother's heir in heritage, being the daughter of a younger brother. Whether you are to distinguish between the conquest and the heritage is a different question. I am inclined to think we ought not, for a reason that has been given weight to in former cases. This lady will not take as the truster's heir but as the heir of his mother, who never had right to the subjects, and therefore, as appears to me, she must take the whole heritage.

Then there only remains the moveables to be disposed of, and they will fall to the mother's heirs in moveables, her surviving brother and sister.

LORD COWAN.—I have had some difficulty in this case. There are certain matters which require consideration before coming to the construction of the destination clause in question.

First, what are the subjects thus destined? On this part of the case I have formed a clear opinion that they comprise the whole effects left by the testator, whether heritable or moveable. The words taken by themselves, or in connection with other clauses in the deed, appear to me to forbid any other construction.

Second, what is the effect of the authority to sell contained in the latter part of the deed, as regards the supposed conversion into moveables? It will be remarked that there is nowhere in the deed either direction or power to sell in the usual sense, but merely an authority—the intention of the testator clearly being, that if in the course of the ordinary trust management the trustees found it expedient to sell the heritage they were to have authority to do so, but not to confer on them a capricious power of selling unnecessarily, so as to alter the succession of the testator. Starting, therefore, with the assumption that "the estate and effects" here mentioned is the whole universitas left by the testator, we come to the question, to whom is this estate destined. I confess myself much puzzled as to the sound construction of the terms used in this deed; at the same time I am satisfied that it is not a case for the heir at law to come forward and say there is such uncertainty and inexplicability as to require the succession to be dealt with as intestacy. The testator has stated clearly his intention to favour some person or persons other than his heirs ab intestato, and we must consider, and if possible construe, the expression of his wishes so as to give effect to his intention. My difficulty in reaching any satisfactory conclusion is, that the testator and the writer who drew his settlements do not appear to have understood the effect of the phraseology employed. They seem to have thought that "heirs in and through my mother" was a legal term of undoubted significance. That admittedly it is not, and I am driven to conclude that we have not in these words, taken by themselves, a sufficiently clear indication of the mind of the testator. I do, however, find a glossary for this construction in the words which follow, "excluding the relations of my father and all others, except through my said mother," i.e., the parties he desired to favour were his nearest relations by his mother. Looking at that expression, I cannot but hold that it is the parties standing in that relation to him whom the testator intended to favour, and that are to succeed to a universitas of his estate; but if the view I take is re- d by your Lordships, and assuming the views expressed by Lord Ben- e to be adopted by the Court, I think it right to say that I entirely acquiesce s Lordship's conclusion that as regards the heritage it is the heir of line, as eir at law pre-eminently, who is to be preferred, and the heirs in mobilibus are to take the moveable and personal estate.

ORD NEAVES.—There is no doubt that in this inconsistent clause technical ls are misapplied. It often happens that technical words are used by un- ed testators in such a way that more difficulty arises when we come to con- them than we would have if they had expressed their meaning in the ordi- language which they themselves understood. We are bound, however, in ases to try whether we can find out the meaning intended.
ow, here there are two conflicting views, one of which it seems to me must aken. First, that the estate is dealt with as a universitas, and therefore that testator intended to confer it on those who, though relations of the mother, py a position corresponding to the next of kin by the father. On this er I rather incline to the opinion expressed by Lord Cowan, that nothing h was done or authorised to be done by the testator after his death in any changed the character of the succession. If, then, the estate were to be n as a universitas, and to be disposed of as such, the term "nearest heirs in through my mother" would be held to mean to those relations of his mother hold the position corresponding to next of kin on the father's side. In that it is clear that Mrs White is excluded, as she is not in the same grade of ionship with the other parties, Mrs Robertson and Thomas Waddell. Now, not think that Mrs White was intended to be excluded. That such should he case appears to me entirely repugnant to the general scope of the clause. nsequently exclude this view, and pass to the second, which appears to me more likely alternative, namely, that the estate was not intended to pass as iversitas, but as a divided succession of heritage and moveables; in which I cannot but think that the words "nearest heirs" implies more than ations" merely. I think that the testator had this idea in his head that his ier should be taken as a kind of stirps from whom an order of succession to be deduced analogous to the legal succession through the father. I efore agree with Lord Benholme, and think that he has rightly removed difficulty that might have been introduced by the different succession to tage and conquest according to our law.

TEIND COURT. Teind Clerk.

Held that the titularity had been sufficiently represented, and that it was not a valid objection to the valuation that the bishop had not been called.

SEE ante, vol. x. p. 753.

Mrs Agnes Louden or M'Neill, widow of the late John M'Neill of Ardnacross and Glenmore and others, as trust-disponees of the said John M'Neill, were in the year 1862 proprietors (1) of the lands of Camusnanesran, or Over and Nether Camus, of the portions of the lands of Melford, called Tallich, Dowage, Glenmore, Ardcloisk, Glenbeg, and Barbea; (2) of the lands of Kilmelford and others,—all lying within the united parishes of Kilninver and Kilmelford in Argyleshire.

By the report of the Sub-commission for the valuation of teinds applicable to the said united parishes it was found and declared in the year 1629 that "the landis of Glenmoir, Glenbeig, Barbe, Duag, Tulliche, Over and Nether Camess, wt. the pertinents of parsonage and great teynd, the number of 23 bollis meall, and for the vicarage and small teyndes y^r^of threttie pundis money. The lands of Killmelphoirt perteining to the said Mr Colin Campbell, of parsonage teynd 3 bolls meall, and for the vicarage brockis and small teynds y^r^of 56 sh. money."

In an action of approbation of the said sub-valuation, which was raised in 1866, the trustees set forth that they were proprietors of the several pieces of land above mentioned, and recited that part of the report of the Sub-commission which related to the said lands of Glenmoir and others (being the lands No. 1) with the pertinents, and which found and declared the value of the parsonage and great teinds thereof to be "the number of 23 bollis meall," and that of the vicarage and small teinds thereof to be "threttie pundis money." They further stated, per incuriam, that the lands of which the teinds were so valued were the whole lands (No. 1 and No. 2) above mentioned, and concluded that the report of the sub-commission should be ratified and approved by the Court in so far as concerned the valuation of the pursuers' lands, meaning thereby the said whole lands in the said united parishes.

The action having been duly called, and no appearance being made for the defenders, decree in absence was, on July 4, 1870, pronounced in terms of the libel. That decree bore that the Lords Commissioners for Plantation of Kirks and Valuation of Teinds ratified, allowed, and approved of the report of the Sub-commissioners of the Presbytery of Argyll, in so far as concerned the valuation of the pursuers' lands libelled, and interponed their authority thereto, and in terms thereof found, declared, decerned, and ordained that the foresaid valuation of the said teinds, in so far as concerned the pursuers' lands libelled, and which was in the terms following, viz.—"The landes of Glenmoir, Glenbeig, Barbe, Duag, Tulliche, Ower and Nether Camess, wt. the pertinents of personage and great teynd, the noumber of twentie three bollis meall, and for vicarag and small teyndes y^r^ of threttie pundis money"—had been ever since the said report, was now, and should continue and endure in all time coming as the just worth and constant yearly avail of the teind, parsonage and vicarage, of the said lands.

A supplementary action of approbation relative to the lands of Kilmelford was thereafter raised, concluding that the portion of the said report which applied to the said lands should be approved of as the valuation of the teinds thereof, without prejudice to the above mentioned decree of valuation, but this action was dismissed for the reasons stated in the Lord President's opinion.

In these circumstances the present action was brought by the pursuers against the Officers of State, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and the Lord Advocate as representing the Crown, which is titular of the teinds of the said united parishes, and against the Rev. Colin Campbell, the present incumbent, to have the said decree of sub-valuation reduced, and to have the valuation of the several lands contained in the said report ratified and approved of in conformity with its true tenor.

As to the conclusion for reduction, it was pleaded by the pursuers;—The decree in absence above mentioned being disconform to the report of the Sub-commissioners, upon which the same proceeded, and being without warrant, the same was null, and reducible at their instance.

The minister, who alone defended, pleaded;—(2) No relevant or sufficient ground for reducing the said valuation was set forth by the pursuers, at least none was stated which could warrant the Lords Commissioners for Teinds in reducing the same. (3) The said decree of valuation having been pronounced by the Lords Commissioners for Teinds causa cognita at the request of the pursuers, and in conformity with the conclusions of their own summons, the same was a decree in foro quoad them, and they cannot now seek or obtain its reduction on the ground of the alleged error condescended on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have now to dispose of the reductive conclusions of the summons. The object of the reduction is to set aside a decree of approbation of a sub-valuation obtained in 1866, on the ground that it contains an error fatal to its validity, the decree of approbation being disconform to the report of the Sub-commissioners, on which it bears to proceed.

The pursuers are possessed of two different parcels of land in the parish, which, for shortness, may be described by the leading names of Glenmore and Kilmelford. The teinds of Glenmore were valued by the Sub-commissioners at 23 bolls of meal and £30 Scots money, the teinds of Kilmelford were valued at 3 bolls of meal and £2, 16s. Scots money,—thus making a total valuation of 26 bolls of meal and £32, 16s. Scots money.

The summons of approbation raised by the pursuers in 1866 set out the report of the Sub-commissioners, but unfortunately they committed this mistake: the summons set out these two sets of lands, and concluded that the teinds should be valued at 23 bolls of meal and £30 of Scots money, omitting to notice that this was the valuation, not of the whole lands, but only of that part which I have called Glenmore. But as the whole lands were set forth in the summons the decree of approbation made the valuation applicable not only to Glenmore but to Kilmelford.

Such is the mistake committed. It is said in condescendence 11, and said truly,—"The effect of this decree was to make the valuation of the teinds of the lands of Glenmore, Glenbeg, Barbe, Duag, Tulliche, and Over and Nether Cameas, with the pertinents, apply not only to those lands, but also to the lands of Kilmelford, Ardcloisk, Duchray, and Heisker Island. The teinds of the lands of Kilmelford are separately valued by said report, and the lands of Ardcloisk and Duchray and Heisker Island are not mentioned in it. The decree was thus erroneous, and disconform to the grounds upon which it proceeded, and to the report of the valuation by the Sub-commissioners, and was unauthorised, and was to the hurt and prejudice of the pursuers."

The defender seems to contend that the decree was not to the prejudice of the pursuers, because it valued the lands at less than the valuation contained in the report by the Sub-commissioners, and therefore, instead of being to the prejudice of the pursuers, was in their favour. But the prejudice to the pursuers was very distinctly developed in a previous process, in which they proposed "without prejudice to the decree of approbation," to set the matter right by having the valuation of the lands of Kilmelford brought in as an addition. The present defender then contended that it was impossible to set the matter right without a reduction. We intimated the same, and accordingly the pursuers consented to have the action dismissed, and have brought the present action of reduction.

No. 36.

M'Neill's Trustees v. Campbell.

Now, the defender says that the reduction cannot be obtained; that, in short, the error is irremediable, and that, by this mistake, the pursuers have lost the benefit of the sub-valuation. His plea on this point is,—"The said decree of valuation having been pronounced by the Lords Commissioners for Teinds causa cognita at the request of the pursuers, and in conformity with the conclusions of their own summons, the same is a decree in foro quoad them, and they cannot now seek or obtain its reduction on the ground of the alleged error condescended on." One cannot read this plea without having it suggested to one's mind whether this defender has any legitimate interest to maintain this plea or to defend this action at all. But it is needless to go on this. The error is an error committed in the framing of the summons by the pursuers. The decree was not one causa cognita. It proceeded as a matter of course, for there was no one to object. It would be a very strong thing if an error of this sort could not be rectified in any way. We are told that in cases where the Court have pronounced a decree against the pursuer in the absence of the defender this is a decree in foro against the pursuer. But the present is not a decree against the pursuer. It is a decree of his own seeking. I have no difficulty in advising your Lordships to give effect to the conclusions of reduction.

Lord Benholme.—In no legal sense can it be said that the defender has an interest to oppose the reduction. I can see that he has an actual though an illegitimate object, an interest which, however, we cannot recognise or support. His object is to prevent the pursuers getting the due benefit of their sub-valuation. He says that there shall be no remedy for the error which has been fallen into in the action of approbation; that, in short, the mistake affords a sort of jus quæsitum to him although he was no party to the process of approbation. The Court cannot give effect to this contention. A proper mode has been followed for rectifying the mistake, and the defender has no legitimate interest to oppose it.

The other Judges concurred.

In regard to the conclusions for approbation of the sub-valuation, the defender founded upon the terms of the Sub-commissioners' report, as shewing that the valuation had been made by rental bolls, without the consent of the bishop, who was titular of one-fourth of the teinds, while by the sub-commission the consent of all who had interest in the teinds was required to a valuation according to rental bolls.*

Argued for the pursuers;—The bishop's interest was sufficiently represented by the parson, who was titular of three-fourths and tacksman of the bishop's fourth. The point had already been decided in a question between Harrison, Ainslie, and Company,[1] heritors in the same parish, in 1869.

Lord President.—The objection now taken to this report is that it was not competent for the Sub-commissioners to give effect to the whole rental bolls except by consent of the heritors and titulars, and that it is demonstrated ex facie of the report itself that such consent was not given. Now, if that should be made out it would be undoubtedly a good defence to this summons of approbation. But we must examine the report with some minuteness. It "Finds and declares that the landes underwrettin perteining to the personnes afterspe'it within the said parochyne of Kilmelphoirt, hes payed in tyme bygane, payes p'ntly ar woirth and may pay for the p'sonage and great teynd thereof as ane constant rent yeirlie in tyme coming the particulare rentalled teynd bolles after spe'it and that the vicarage broks and small tynds of the samen have beine taking up sometymes ipsa corpora and sometymes in a small silver rentall and ar woirth nd may pay as a constant rent yeerlie heireftir the particulare soumes of money underwrittene as is speciallie and particularlie after mentionat viz: . . . . . The landes of glenmoir glenbeig barbe Duag tulliche ower and nether Camess st the pertinentis of personage and great teynd the noumber of twentie thrie ollis meall, and for vicarage and small teyndes yroif threttie pundis money." Then follows the ground of judgment—"Because the foirsaides personage and great teyndes have beine rentalled as is befoir spei't and the samen rental in use to be payed yeirlie attor the space of fourtie yeiris immediately last bypast qh we find to be att the availl." Here it is important to observe that the report is more exact than was required by the Act 1633, c. 19, since it states that the preceding valuation was not merely near the avail but "att the availl." Then comes the course of procedure—"and becaus the said Archbald Lord Lorne patroun of the said Kirk of Kilmelphoirt and the said Mr Colline Campbell p'soun and vicar yrof and titular of thrie q'rteris of the teyndis of the samen appertaining to the said laick patronage and tacksmane and possessor of the fourt q'rter of the samen teyndes, called the bishop's quarter, and the saids personnes heritoris above nameit compeirit all personallie befoir us quha and ilk ane of thame sw'descendeit and aggreit to ye foirsaids rentalled teynd bollis for the saides personage and great teyndes except the sd. Neill Campbell of Kendmoir and because we took trew tryall and informao'une anent the sowmes gerss and holding of the saides landis and alse because the saides heritouris were lawlie summond to have sw'peirit befoire us at ane certaine day to have hard and seine the saids vicarage and small teyndes valued in maner abovewrettine." Now, we have here represented, in the first place, the heritors, except Mr Neil Campbell, all consenting to this system of valuation, and in the second place, the parson of the parish, who is titular of the teinds, except one-fourth thereof, which belongs to his bishop. Now, it is said that because the bishop is not called and does not appear the titularity is not fully represented, and that without the positive consent of everybody interested as titular this system of valuation is not justified by the terms of the report.

Now, I think it would be sufficient for the decision of this case to rest on Harrison Ainslie and Company, which is a judgment directly in point, as between a heritor and the present titular of his parish. We there held that this was a good valuation by rental bolls. But I am unwilling to seem to attach too great importance to that decision, although I believe there are no less than four Judges present who concurred in it. I think it was well decided. It seems to me that the titularity of this parish was sufficiently represented. The interest of the minister as parson was precisely of the same kind as that of the bishop quoad his fourth part. It is not to be supposed that there was a division of the lands among the titulars; they really held a pro indiviso right to the teinds of the whole parish; their rights were identical except in extent, for the parson here was interested as titular to the extent of three-fourths, while the bishop had the same interest in only one-fourth, so that it was not unreasonable in the Sub-commissioners being satisfied with the parson's consent, particularly as he in point of fact possessed and drew the teind belonging to the bishop in the shape of rental bolls, and was himself quite satisfied. I think it would be unfortunate if, this report having been acted on for so many years, the bishop should not be now held to have acquiesced.

The other Judges concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the reasons of reduction, and decern in the reduction accordingly: Further, in the approbation, find, decern, and declare in terms of the conclusions of the libel in all respects, and find expenses due to the pursuer, occasioned by the defences, from the date thereof down to the 28th October last: Appoint an account thereof to be lodged, and remit," &c.

2D DIVISION. R.

JAMES ALLAN, sometime manager of Govan Colliery, Glasgow, died the 12th February 1861, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, d 30th December 1854, whereby he conveyed his whole estate, herit and moveable, to the first parties and others in trust for the purp therein mentioned.

By the second trust-purpose the truster directed his trustees to h and apply the residue of his trust-estate for the liferent use of M Watson or Allan, his spouse,—"And, in the third place, I direct appoint my said trustees, upon the decease of the said Mary Watso Allan, to divide and pay over the fee of the said residue to and am the whole of my children who may survive me, and the issue of suc them as may predecease leaving issue, including among them my gr daughter, Mary Jane Watson Michie, share and share alike, the issu each case taking the share which their respective parents would h received, equally among them, when more than one, payable, the sh of the sons, on their attaining majority, and of the daughters and gr daughters on their attaining that age, or being married, whichever of t events shall first happen . . . . . ; declaring that the provisions he made in favour of females shall be purely alimentary to them, not ali ble or assignable, and shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and righ administration of any husband they or either of them have or may h and shall not be affectable by their own or such husband's debts or de or the diligence of their own or his creditors, all which are hereby cluded and debarred; and declaring that the receipts of such fem without the concurrence of their husbands, shall be sufficient for t said provisions."

The truster's widow died on 23d October 1871, and a question ha arisen between Mr Allan's trustees and his three daughters, two of w were married, as to the import of the said third clause in Mr All settlement, a special case was presented for the opinion and judgmen the Court, upon, inter alia, the following questions:—"Does the t settlement of Mr James Allan impose upon his trustees, the first par the duty of continuing their possession of that part of the residue of trust-estate which is destined to the truster's daughters during their l respectively? or, Is it competent to the first parties to discharge th selves of their trust by assigning shares of the trust-funds and estat the truster's daughters, parties of the second part, respectively, by a d of assignation containing a declaration to the effect that the es assigned is alimentary, and held exclusive of the jus mariti and righ administration in terms of the foresaid provision of Mr Allan's t settlement; or, Are the truster's daughters, parties of the second p itled to payment or assignation of their shares respectively simpliciter, the parties of the first part?" No. 37.

Dec. 12, 1872. Allan's Trustees v. Allan and Others.

Argued for the trustees, the first parties;—This case was ruled by that Lady Massy.[1] The direction to pay did not necessarily mean to pay in h; in Scotland,[2] as in England,[3] a trust was the only means of protect- a wife's separate estate from alienation or diligence.

Argued for the daughters, the second parties;—The trustees were nd to divide and pay as directed by the trust-deed.[4] Further, the claration that the fund should be alimentary was ineffectual.

At advising,—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The question in this case is divided into two parts. e first raises the point, whether the trust-settlement imposes on the trustees duty of continuing to act, in respect of this provision to the truster's daughs being qualified with certain conditions. It is, I think, conceded by all conned that it does not. The second point raised is, whether the trustees can charge themselves by paying or assigning to the beneficiaries, taking discharges m them containing a declaration of the conditions under which the provisions re left by the truster.

The clause in the trust-settlement is in some respects peculiar as regards the ovisions to the truster's daughters. Having in the third purpose directed his ustees "to divide and pay over" the fee of the residue to and among his hole children, including his daughters, the truster afterwards added this clause, "And declaring that the provisions herein made in favour of females shall be ely alimentary to them, not alienable or assignable, and shall be exclusive of e jus mariti and right of administration of any husband they or either of them ve or may have, and shall not be affectable by their own or such husbands' bts or deeds, or the diligence of their own or his creditors, all which are here- excluded and debarred."

I think that is a clear instruction to the trustees, first, to pay; and, second, take a receipt from the beneficiaries for the whole capital sum of their provions; and that being the case, the question is, under what conditions this yment is to be made and receipt given. Now, the fund is declared alimentary d inalienable, and if that had been consistent with the other direction to pay er I do not say but that the Court might have taken steps to enforce the ster's intention. If this condition had related to a sum payable annually it ould perhaps have been proper that the Court should exercise its equitable risdiction for the purpose of carrying into effect such an intention. But in the resent case I do not think this is practicable. The testator has attempted to o two inconsistent things. He has ordered his trustees to pay over, while he as endeavoured to limit the full right of property in the payees, and that without a trust, and without creating a separate or resulting right in any one else.

The case of Lady Massy was quite different. There a separate right of credit was reated in the issue of Lady Massy. Here there is nothing of the kind. The two rovisions are inconsistent one with the other, and therefore the beneficiaries are ntitled to simple payment without the conditions to which I have referred.

But the exclusion of the jus mariti is a different matter. I think that may e excluded by a truster, and in any receipt to be taken this exclusion should e expressed. What effect that exclusion may have I do not say, but I can see hat some effect it may have, and I therefore think that a clause to this effect hould be inserted in the receipts.

Lord Cowan.—This is a very delicate question indeed. Mr Bell, in his Commentaries, and other writers, lay it down that effectual protection for a fund left

I am not aware of the Court having ever exercised such pow think we are not entitled to authorise the trustees to do otherwise than th tator has directed, which is to pay the money directly to the beneficiaries. is no ulterior destination, as there was in Lady Massy's case, which requi be protected. The declaration that the funds, when paid over to the dau should be inalienable, is quite impossible of being carried into operation cannot be regarded as of any legal effect, unless under the protection of a which is not created by this deed, and which the Court cannot call into ence. I am not, however, satisfied that in the narrative of the receipt granted to the trustees there should not appear the declaration that the are declared alimentary. In many settlements funds are declared to be su far, at least, as regards annuities, and funds which are only available in the of yearly proceeds; and the declaration, though probably inept as regard principal, may have effect as regards the yearly produce. I quite agree your Lordship that the exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administr must be introduced into the receipt.

LORD BENHOLME and LORD NEAVES concurred.

THE COURT found ". . . . . that the trustees of the said J Allan, the first parties, are entitled and bound to make pay to the testator's daughters, parties of the second part, of shares of the trust-estate on their own receipt, containing a c excluding the jus mariti and right of administration of the spective husbands," &c.

nder that trust, the provisions left unsatisfied being £20,000, part of the ovisions to the two younger children of the truster's second marriage, nd £14,000 due to Earl James of the sum of £16,000 directed to be cumulated for five years. In order to meet the deficiency so far as anted the younger children's provisions, Earl James, under the Entail endment Act, charged the entailed estates with the sums of £8000
d £12,000 contained in two bonds of provision in favour of the Hon. rge Frederick Boyle and Lady Diana Boyle or Pakington. Earl James inquished all claim to the remaining sum due to him under the trust-d.

n 1859 the executors of Earl George conveyed to Earl James, as duary legatee, the whole residue and remainder of the executry estate, isting in all of £1692, 15s., and, on the other hand, he granted to m a full discharge of all their intromissions.

Earl James died on 14th March 1869, having executed in 1858 a eral trust-disposition of his whole heritable and moveable estate, ept the entailed estates. He was succeeded in the earldom and ailed estates of Hawkhead, and also in the entailed estates of Kel-ne, Kilbirnie, Glengarnock, and Crawford-Lindsay, over which the two bonds of £8000 and £12,000 were granted, by his brother con-guinean, the Hon. George Frederick Boyle; and in the entailed estate hal, which was still liable, as directed in the trust-deed of 1825, for debt of £18,000, by his sister Lady Augusta Boyle or Fitzclarence.

n the death of Earl James it was found that debts of £17,000, secured r the estates of Thirdpart, and Baidland and Brodochlie, were still in istence, and that so, while the trustees under the deed of 1825 were dead, and the trust had lapsed, the purposes were not all fulfilled.
Mackay, and afterwards Mr James Hope, the party of the first part, e appointed by the Court trustees under the said trust-disposition; and Mackay, as trustee, sold the lands of Thirdpart to the present Earl of gow, at a valuation, for the purpose of applying the price in payment he said debts.

his special case was brought for the purpose of determining to whom trustee should now account for the balance of the price of Thirdpart aining in his hands, and to whom he should convey the lands of dland and Brodochlie remaining unsold. These were claimed (1) by first party, for the purposes of the deed of 1825; (2) by the present
l of Glasgow, as heir-at-law of his father, on the ground that no valid had been made up by Earl James; (3) by Earl James's trustees, on ground that the deed of 1825 was ultra vires of Earl George, being to prejudice of the rights of the heir of the marriage under the contract 789.

he questions of law submitted for the opinion and judgment of the rt were,—"(1) Whether the residue of the trust-estate created by and executors and residuary legatees of the said deceased Jame Glasgow, have a preferable right to the said residue, or to any pe of? (4) Whether, in the event of the said residue falling to b as aforesaid, upon the said George Frederick Rosse Earl of Glas the heirs of entail entitled to succeed to the said lands and Hawkhead, the first party is bound to settle the same upon George Frederick Rosse Earl of Glasgow and the said heirs of en ject to all the fetters of a strict entail, and to procure the deed to be executed by him for that purpose duly recorded in the R Tailzies, and also feudalised? (5) Whether the said trustees an tors of the said James Earl of Glasgow are entitled to receive o said residue payment of the foresaid debts, amounting to £16,(by the trustees and executors of the said George Earl of Glasgo his executry estate at Martinmas 1843, or any part thereof? (6) the said George Earl of Glasgow, as heir of entail in possessio entailed estate of Kelburne, and of the entailed estates of Kilbi of Crawfurd-Lindsay, and Glengarnock, is entitled, out of the r the said trust-estate, to have the said entailed estates disburdene and what part of the foresaid sums of £8000 and £12,000 cont the said bonds and dispositions in security granted by the sai Earl of Glasgow on 18th July 1850?"

It was argued for the first party (Earl George's trustee);—No j was conferred on the heirs of the marriage by the deed of 178 destined the lands to the granter and "the heirs whatsoever to created of his body, and his and their assignees." This was ec to a mere destination to the granter and his assignees. If no j was given to the heir of the marriage the deed of 1825 was not as being in fraudem of his rights. But even if it were, it was causa deed, and formed part of the general settlement of Earl under which Earl James had taken benefit, and was thereby bar challenging the deed.

The second party (the present Earl of Glasgow) argued tha conveyancing operations for political purposes had evacuated the tion in the marriage-contract.

The trustees of Earl James (third parties) argued;—Earl Geor not gratuitously defeat the jus crediti conferred on the heirs of riage by the antenuptial contract of 1788. The deed of 1825 been homologated by Earl James. If he took any benefit under of 1843 it was very small, and it was taken in ignorance of of 1825. Had he known of that deed he would have been pu election; and his representative was still entitled to reduce tl on renouncing what he had taken under that of 1843.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case is somewhat complicated in its det though the questions are framed so as to dispose of the contentions a of the parties, yet some of them require a great deal of attention, bec comprehend a number of subordinate questions.

The main point under the first question is, whether the deed of effectual; which raises (1) the question whether the maker had powe it; and (2) if he had not, whether the deed is still effectual because th his son James to challenge it is cut off on various grounds.

The power of George Earl of Glasgow to make the deed depends a g on the terms of his marriage-contract in 1788, and the right thereby c favour of the heir of the marriage. The entailed estate of Hawkhea belonged to Earl George's mother, was settled by that marriage-contract, existing entail not being effectual a right was reserved to Earl George al entail. Therefore, although the estate was settled subject to the s of the then existing entail it was no breach of the provisions of the contract to make a new and valid entail. But besides Hawkhead re settled by Earl George's marriage-contract other fee-simple lands.

ds he, "in further contemplation of this intended marriage," "provides, and conveys to and in favour of himself and the heirs lawfully to be d of his body, and to his or their assignees, whom failing," to Lady Boyle, and a series of heirs afterwards named. The question is, nder this clause the heir of the marriage had any right vested in him rl George was not entitled to defeat gratuitously. The peculiarity of is in the words "his or their assignees," and it is contended that the nfer on him a power to assign, which means that this is neither more han a conveyance to him in fee-simple without any restriction. That a very strange provision in a settlement of this kind, and the last con-one would be disposed to adopt unless driven to it by the clear lan-he deed. But looking to the whole scope of the deed I have come to sion that it cannot be read as a mere conveyance to himself, so as to as free to dispone as before. The words, "to his or their assignees," ink, be held to mean only that in the event of there being no heirs of ge, Earl George and his assignees should be preferable to any other er this deed. I am not disposed to say that there is any preferable i given to any other heir or the heir of any other marriage than that y Augusta Hay. That is the first point, and it advances us thus far George is restrained from gratuitously alienating these lands to the of the heir of that marriage.

xt point is, whether the trust-disposition granted by him in 1825 is a alienation of these lands; and it requires a careful examination of the t first sight it certainly looks like a deed for the advantage of the nd his eldest son; for unquestionably it is a deed for the purpose of
for the repayment of money raised for the payment of the son's debts.
t as its consideration, "I, the Right Honourable George Earl of Glasidering that I stand bound in sundry obligations for money borrowed se of my eldest son, James Lord Viscount Kelburne, which are as fold then various sums are mentioned. Now, this narrative shews that er was personally bound for payment of all these sums. It does not at Earl James, whose debts had been paid, was personally bound for of these sums. In short, the arrangement seems to have been that ge borrowed this money and paid off his son's debts; and the result he was the sole debtor in these sums. The deed proceeds further,— order to provide for the liquidation of the foregoing debts and of any ts and engagements which I may come under on account of my said at any time hereafter, so as that my personal estate and executry may y be relieved thereof, and the lands contained in my new entail as pidated thereby as possible, I have resolved to grant the trust-deed tten." Here we must observe that after the marriage-contract, and be-, Earl George had made a new entail of Hawkhead in 1819, and that se which he set before him here is to keep the lands so entailed as free e from all incumbrances. For this purpose he proceeds to convey a lands to trustees, and one of the parcels of lands mentioned is Stanlie, part of the estate of Hawkhead, and which he appears very anxious to en in preference to the other lands conveyed, for the purpose of the nerally to pay these debts, and after fulfilling that purpose the trustees nude in favour of his eldest son or of the heir of entail of the estate of d for the time. After full directions with respect to these purposes ds to recommend the sacrifice of Thirdpart and other lands before con-as in any event to save the lands of Stanlie, if that were possible.

deed were made for the purpose of paying the granter's debts by the f certain lands so as to save his executry, and if the only other purpose
e the remaining lands in entail on the heirs of Hawkhead, the question er that is not a gratuitous alienation. I am of opinion that it is. It is a taking of the lands settled, and selling them for paying the debts of the granter. That is a deed in prejudice of the right of the heir created in the marriage-contract. If Earl James, the heir of the marriage, had taken benefit directly by the settlement of 1825, he might have been barred from challenging it. But so far as we see he takes no benefit. Only one part of the deed is founded on to shew that he took benefit, viz., the clause declaring that the £18,000 secured over Etal shall remain ultimately a charge on that estate. It is said that the £18,000, like the rest of the money, was originally borrowed to pay debts incurred by Earl James, and that this clause relieved him of all liability. But that is not sound. The £18,000 was an existing burden on Etal, which did not then belong to Earl James, but to his father, and it was for the latter, the granter of the deed, to say that it should remain a perpetual burden on Etal, which Earl James received as heir of entail, but under the burden of the £18,000. On the whole matter, it is clear that the deed of 1825 is in fact a gratuitous alienation of the lands settled in 1788, to the prejudice of the heirs of the marriage.

But it is maintained that Earl James's right to challenge it has been cut off by the negative prescription. It is difficult to understand that argument. One circumstance in the history seems to bar the plea of negative prescription, because in 1843, immediately after his father's death, Earl James made up a title to all the lands conveyed by the deed of 1825 as heir of provision under the marriage-contract. No doubt it was said that that title was incompetent, in consequence of some conveyancing for political purposes which had made it impossible to take up the estate as heir of provision under the marriage-contract. But an examination of that conveyancing shews that the title was left, and was meant to stand, exactly as it was before.

But another consideration with regard to the deed of 1825 is of a much more serious character. It was to certain effects a conveyance inter vivos, but it was also a mortis causa deed. This is made plain by certain clauses which make it a deed of settlement. If it be a mortis causa deed unrevoked, and if it, with other deeds, constitute the testamentary settlement of Earl George, and if Earl James takes benefit under any of these deeds, he may be barred from challenging any one of them. There was another deed by Earl George in 1843, the only other unrevoked, by which he disposes of his executry estate; and it seems probable that when he made it he had very much forgotten the deed of 1825; for though the trustees were infeft under that deed they never entered into possession, and never sold any of the lands or fulfilled any one of the purposes of the trust. At the same time, if the deed of 1825 stands unrevoked, it must form part of Earl George's testamentary settlement. It is contended that in the deed of 1843 there is a clause of revocation. It is a peculiar clause, viz., "And in order that these presents may receive the more full effect I hereby direct that the trustees appointed by any separate deeds executed by me shall account for and pay over to my present trustees, for the purposes hereof, any sums which may come into their hands in virtue of such separate deeds, in order that the same may be applied as aforesaid; and, under these explanations, I hereby revoke and recall all other or prior settlements, bonds of provision, or other deeds granted by me in favour of my said younger children of my first and second marriages, or any of them, which may affect my estate, or be contrary hereto, those in favour of my daughter, Lady Fitzclarence, in regard to the property derived by me from the late Admiral Boyle, being always excepted; declaring, however, that the bonds of provision granted by me in favour of my younger children under my powers as heir of entail shall subsist and be effectual until the whole of the provisions hereby granted in their favour shall be paid, when the said bonds shall become null and void, it being my wish and intention they shall hereafter only be valid to the effect of being a security to my said children for payment of their said provisions." The words of revocation are "revoke and recall all other or prior settlements, bonds of provision, or other deeds granted by me in favour of my said younger children of my first and second marriages." I do not think these words can apply to the deed of 1825. The meaning is to recall all deeds in favour of younger children, and nothing else.

So far as there was any previous settlement of his general estate, it was sufficiently recalled by implication. I cannot, therefore, say that the 1825 deed is revoked by that of 1843, which, on the contrary, leaves it a subsisting deed, and one of the deeds of settlement of Earl George.

Now, if Earl James took benefit under the deed of 1843 that may bar him from challenging the deed of 1825. He is made residuary legatee, but undoubtedly under the burden of a number of large provisions to younger children, amounting to £46,000. After certain provisions the fourth purpose proceeds thus,—"Being desirous to preserve in my family the ancient estate of Hawkhead, I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees to procure the entail thereof, which was some years ago executed by me with consent of my said eldest son, duly recorded in the Register of Entails, and a proper feudal investiture completed therein: Further, as the said estate is charged with a considerable amount of debt, contracted by my said eldest son, for which I joined in the securities over the said estate, it is my wish that, after fulfilling the other objects before mentioned, the residue of my said personal estate shall be applied in purchasing up the said debts, to the effect the same may be extinguished, and particularly those affecting the old estate of Hawkhead, the interest of these debts being to be kept down by the interest arising out of any residue of my said funds: And lastly, when these purposes are fulfilled the sum of £16,000 sterling shall be set apart, and be lent out by my said trustees upon good securities, real or personal, and the interest thereon to be received by my said trustees, and added to the said fund, and so continue for the space of five years after my decease, at the end of which period £6000 shall be paid to my said two younger children of my second marriage in equal proportions, and the remainder of said funds, with any additional money that may arise out of my said executry, after fulfilling the objects aforesaid, shall be accounted for and paid over to my said eldest son, whom I wish to be considered as my residuary heir and executor; and he shall then be bound, on the termination of the said trust, to discharge the said trustees, and do every other thing which they may consider to be necessary for carrying out my wishes."

We have it stated that the purposes of this deed were accomplished by the trustees to a certain extent. The debt on Hawkhead and £20,000 of the provisions to the younger children were paid. The executry was not able to pay more,—that is to say, after paying off the burdens on Hawkhead and a part of the younger children's provisions, the balance was very small. It was necessary therefore to throw the rest of these provisions on the proper entailed estates; and, therefore, £20,000, which ought to have been paid out of executry, was laid on these entailed lands, by Earl James as heir of entail applying under the Entail Amendment Act for authority to grant bonds and dispositions in security.

This having been done, the only remaining purpose of the trust was to set apart £16,000 to be accumulated and then divided. But there was not money enough. If there was any balance Earl James was entitled to it. In fact there was a very small balance, and as it was quite inadequate to the last special purpose, it was paid over to Earl James, and he discharged the executors. Now, it is said that he thus took benefit under the deed. Certainly he took very little, if any, because the sum was no more than £1692, 15s. But in a question of this kind the amount of benefit is of very small moment. If a man under any deed takes benefit to the extent of £1 he cannot reprobate the deed.

Then it is said that he interposed to create against himself a much greater liability by consenting to lay the burden of the deficiency of £20,000 on the entailed estate. This is true, and it may be that the interest of that debt is greater than anything he got as residuary legatee. But these bonds of provision are available against the entailed estate without his interposition, not as heritable securities affecting the estate, but as provisions affecting the rents. The way to test whether Earl James took benefit or not is to suppose that the younger children's provisions and the residue taken by Earl James were of the same amount. Then the matter would stand thus,—in place of allowing the executors to pay the residue he would take that in money, and give in place of it a security over the entailed estate. That would be taking a benefit, for it would be taking cash and only giving a security in return. What did take place was in effect the same; because he took the £1692, 15s. which ought to have been applied pro tanto in satisfaction of the younger children's provisions, the distinct intention of the testator being that these provisions should not be laid on the entailed estate. I am therefore of opinion that Earl James took benefit to the extent of £1692, 15s. under the deed of 1843, and is thereby barred from challenging that of 1825.

But the case does not end there, because the circumstances under which Earl James took benefit are peculiar. There is no doubt that he did so in entire ignorance of the deed of 1825. With him during his life no trustees under that deed ever interfered in any way. In consequence of this ignorance, Earl James during his life would have been entitled to go back on what he had done, and say, "I shall restore what I took under the deed of 1843, and challenge the trust of 1825, as being in fraud of the marriage-contract." But he died without exercising any such right, simply because he was not aware that it was open to him, or that any such deed stood in the way of his exercising his full rights under his father's marriage-contract of 1788. Hence the only other question is, whether his trustees and executors are not entitled now to make an election under the deed of 1843, and either to adhere to what has been done under that deed, or to renounce and restore the benefit, and to open the way to a challenge of the deed of 1828. I am of opinion they are still entitled to do so, and therefore the first question must be answered alternatively. I propose to find and declare in answer to it that, in the event of the parties of the third part electing to abide by Earl James's approbation of his father's testamentary settlements, the residue of the trust-estate under the deed of 1825 falls to be settled on the party of the second part, the present Earl, as heir of entail in possession of Hawkhead; but that, in the event of their electing to repudiate the settlements, the residue does not fall to be so disposed of.

The other questions require no such detailed explanation, depending very much on what has been said in regard to the first. The second question, viz., whether the present Earl, as heir-at-law of his father Earl George, has absolute right to the said residue, must be answered in the negative in any event. If the deed of 1825 is to receive effect the residue devolves on the heirs of Hawkhead; and if not, the present Earl has no right to these lands or residue. But under the third question the executors of Earl James will be entitled to a conveyance of everything remaining under the deed of 1825, if they elect to repudiate and restore.

The fourth question asks whether, in the event of the residue being settled on the present Earl and the heirs of entail of Hawkhead, the first party is bound to settle the lands upon them under the fetters of a strict entail. I propose to find that, in the event of the executors not repudiating, the residue must be so settled, the intention of the testator being very clear.

The fifth and sixth questions may be considered together. Both of them proceed on the assumption that the trust of 1825 is to receive effect. If it does receive effect there is a sum of £16,000 paid off under the deed of 1843. Taking the deeds of 1825 and 1843 as forming one settlement, this was directed to be paid out of the estates conveyed by the former deed. But it has been paid out of executry, and therefore the executors have a claim against the trustees under the trust of 1825 to be reimbursed. But then the present Earl, as representing the entailed estates of Kelburne and others, says that he is entitled out of the £16,000 so brought back to the executry estate to have the entailed estates relieved of the charges laid upon them for the younger children's provisions. The manner in which the figures stand seems to be this:—There were children's provisions to the amount of £46,000, of which £32,000 was paid or provided for, leaving £14,000. But £16,000 is more than sufficient to pay £14,000, leaving a balance of £2000, and the question is how that is to be disposed of under the deed of 1843. Under that deed the purpose unfulfilled was the setting apart £14,000 for five years, and at the end of that period the payment of £6000 to each of the two younger children and of the balance to Earl James. The sum of £2000 remains, upon which the parties are preferable ari passu. The result is that out of the £16,000 the heir of entail gets £14,600 and Earl James's executors £1400. No. 38.

Earl of Glasgow's Trustee v. Earl of Glasgow, &c.

The other Judges concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"In answer to the first question (First), Find that by the antenuptial marriage-contract made between George Earl of Glasgow and his spouse, Lady Augusta Hay, in the year 1788, the lands therein specially described were conveyed by the said Earl, and so settled as to confer on the heir of the marriage a jus crediti, which the said Earl was not entitled to defeat or prejudice by any gratuitous deed; (Second), Find that James Earl of Glasgow was, on the death of the said George Earl of Glasgow, his eldest son, and as such heir of the said marriage; (Third), Find that the trust-disposition executed by the said George Earl of Glasgow in 1825 was a conveyance of portions of the lands settled by the said antenuptial contract as aforesaid, and was a gratuitous deed made in fraudem of the said antenuptial contract of marriage, and to the prejudice of the right of the said James Earl of Glasgow, as heir of the marriage; (Fourth), Find that the said James Earl of Glasgow took no benefit by the said trust-disposition of 1825, and was not personally aware of its existence during his own lifetime, the trust-disponees having been infeft, but not having taken actual civil possession of any part of the lands conveyed to them; (Fifth), Find that the title of the said James Earl of Glasgow, during his life, and the title of his trustees and executors, parties of the third part, after his death, to challenge and set aside the said trust-disposition of 1825, as being made in fraudem of the said antenuptial contract, and in prejudice of the right of the heir of the marriage, was and is not cut off or lost by the operation of the negative prescription, for this, among other reasons, that the said James Earl of Glasgow, in the year 1843, and after the death of his said father, made up a title in his own person, as heir of provision under the said antenuptial contract, to the lands contained in the said trust-disposition of 1825, under which he obtained and held possession of the said lands until his death on the 11th March 1869; (Sixth), Find that the trust-disposition of 1825, besides being a trust-conveyance inter vivos for payment of certain specified debts, was also, as regards its ultimate purposes and the disposal of the residue of the trust-estate, a mortis causa deed; (Seventh), Find that the said trust-disposition of 1825 was not revoked, either expressly or by implication, by the trust-disposition and settlement executed by the said George Earl of Glasgow on the 24th March 1843; (Eighth), Find that the said trust-disposition of 1825 was (subject to a right of challenge by the said heir of the marriage or his representatives) part of the testamentary settlement of the said George Earl of Glasgow, and the said trust-disposition and settlement of 1843 and the said trust-disposition of 1825 were the only unrevoked testamentary deeds left by him, and, taken together, contained a complete disposal of his estate, heritable and moveable; (Ninth), Find that the said James Earl of Glasgow was nominated by the said trust-disposition and settlement of 1843 to be the 'sole residuary heir and executor' of his father, and in that capacity received from the trustees and executors acting under that deed certain sums of money and moveable estate, amounting in all to the value of £1692, 15s., in consideration of which he discharged the said trustees and executors of their whole intromissions, and bound himself to relieve them of all claims against his said father's estate; (Tenth), Find that the said James Earl of Glasgow thus took benefit by the trust-disposition and settlement of 1843, and might have been thereby barred from challenging any part of the testamentary arrangements of his father, and in particular from challenging the said trust-deed of 1825; but (Eleventh), Find that, having taken benefit under and approbated the testamentary settlements of his said father, in ignorance of the existence of the trust-disposition of 1825, and of his right to challenge the same, the said James Earl of Glasgow would have been entitled, if now alive, and his trustees and executors, parties of the third part, are now entitled, to a right of election either to abide by his approbation of the testamentary settlements of the said George Earl of Glasgow, and to allow effect to be given to the provisions of the trust-disposition of 1825, or to repudiate the said settlements and set aside the trust-disposition of 1825 upon condition of renouncing the benefit taken by the said James Earl of Glasgow, and restoring the funds and property received by him as 'sole residuary heir and executor' under the trust-disposition and settlement of 1843: Therefore find and declare that, in the event of the said parties of the third part electing to abide by the approbation by James Earl of Glasgow of his father's testamentary settlements the residue of the trust-estate created by the said trust-disposition of 2d December 1825 falls to be settled upon the party of the second part, George Frederick Rosse Earl of Glasgow, as heir of entail in possession of the said lands and estate of Hawkhead, in the case mentioned, at the period when the purposes of the said trust-dispositions were fulfilled, and upon the heirs of entail entitled to succeed to the said lands and estate, under all the conditions, restrictions, and declarations of the existing entail of Hawkhead: But find and declare that, in the event of the parties of the third part electing to repudiate the said settlements, and to renounce and restore the benefit taken by James Earl of Glasgow as aforesaid, the residue of the said trust-estate does not fall to be so settled and disposed of. In answer to the second question, find and declare that the party of the second part, the present Earl of Glasgow, has not in any event, as heir-at-law of his father, the said deceased George Earl of Glasgow, absolute right to the said residue, or any part thereof. In answer to the third question, find and declare that, in the event of the parties of the third part, as trustees and executors of James Earl of Glasgow, electing to repudiate, renounce, and restore as aforesaid, they have a preferable right to the said residue. In answer to the fourth question, find and declare that, in the event of the said residue falling to be settled on the party of the second part, the present Earl of Glasgow, and the heirs of tailzie called to the succession of the estate of Hawkhead, as found alternatively in the answer to the first question, the party of the first part is bound to settle the same upon the said second party and the said heirs of tailzie, subject to all the conditions and fetters of the now existing entail of the estate of Hawkhead, dated 24th November 1819, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies the 20th July 1843, and to procure the deed of entail to be executed by him to be duly recorded in the Register of Tailzies, and a proper feudal investiture of the said lands under the conditions and fetters of the said tailzie to be completed in the person of the said party of the second part. In answer to the fifth question, find and declare that, in the event of the said trust-disposition of 1825 receiving effect, the trustees and executors of James Earl of Glasgow, parties of the third part, are entitled to receive out of the said residue payment of the sum of £16,000, being the amount of debts paid out of the executry estate of the deceased George Earl of Glasgow, the payment of which was specially provided for out of estates conveyed by the trust-disposition of 1825. In answer to the sixth question, find and declare that, in the event of the said sum of £16,000 being paid to the parties of the third part by the party of the first part, the party of the second part is entitled to have the said sum of £16,000 applied to the extent of £14,600, but no further, to disburden pro tanto the entailed estates of Kelburne, Kilbirnie, Crawford-Lindsay, and Glengarnock, of the sums of £8000 and £12,000 charged on the said entailed estates by two bonds and dispositions in security executed by the said James Earl of Glasgow on the 18th July 1850; and decern and direct the expenses incurred by the parties to the case to be paid by the first party out of the funds in his hands, as the said expenses shall be taxed by the Auditor of Court."

Observations on the cases of Gordon of Carleton, M. 14,366—14,368; and Peacock v. Glen, 4 S. 742.

THIS special case was presented by Allan Hutchison of the first part, as immediate younger brother of the late Robert Hutchison, and as such his heir of line, and David Hutchison of the second part, the immediate elder brother of the late Robert Hutchison, and as such his heir of conquest.

The following facts were set forth in the special case:—By mortis causa settlement John Gilmour disponed his heritable estate to his mother in liferent, and "to and in favour of the heirs of my own body, equally among them, share and share alike; whom failing, to and in favour of David Hutchison, Robert Hutchison, Allan Hutchison, and James Hutchison, my brothers uterine, equally among them, share and share alike and their respective heirs, under a certain burden of a liferent annuity of £90 . . . . in fee and property."

The deed remained undelivered in the granter's repositories till his death, which took place on 21st November 1861.

The said John Gilmour died without heirs of his body, never having been married. He was survived by his mother, Mrs Barbara Gilmour or Hutchison, who is still alive, and also by the said David Hutchison, Robert Hutchison, Allan Hutchison, and James Hutchison.

On 8th January 1872 a service was expede in favour of the said David, Robert, Allan, and James Hutchison, as heirs of provision in general to the said deceased John Gilmour, but prior to the service Robert Hutchison had died abroad (in April 1871). He died without issue, and intestate.

The heir of line to the said Robert Hutchison was his immediate younger brother, the said Allan Hutchison, the first party. His heir of conquest was his next elder brother, the said David Hutchison, the second party. At the date of Robert Hutchison's death no title had been completed to the lands.

The question submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court was whether the first party or the second party was entitled to the pro indiviso share of the lands which was destined to the deceased Robert Hutchison and his heirs.

David Hutchison argued;—No one ever existed who could have taken under the deed before the brothers, and therefore there was no need of service. The deed operated as a direct conveyance of the personal right which vested in Robert Hutchison. There was no conveyance to the granter himself, and on his death the beneficiaries took as disponees, and not as heirs.[1]

Allan Hutchison argued;—The granter of the deed was fiar, and the others merely substitutes. Robert Hutchison not having served, no right vested in him, and on his death the succession opened to his heir of line under the destination.[1]

The Court appointed the case to be argued before seven Judges.

The hearing took place before the First Division, and Lords Cowan, Benholme, Neaves, and Mackenzie.

At advising, the opinion of the Court was delivered by the LORD PRESIDENT.—The facts of this case admit of being very shortly stated. John Gilmour by mortis causa deed disponed the fee of his heritable estate to "the heirs of my own body, equally among them, share and share alike; whom failing, to and in favour of David Hutchison, Robert Hutchison, Allan Hutchison, and James Hutchison, my brothers uterine, equally among them, share and share alike, and their respective heirs" (under a certain burden), "in fee and property." The deed remained in the granter's repositories, undelivered, till his death. He died without ever having had heirs of his body, and was survived by his four brothers uterine. A service was expede in their favour as heirs of provision in general to the deceased, but before the service was carried through Robert Hutchison died, without issue and intestate, and the service, so far as his right was concerned, was therefore inept.

Robert Hutchison having died without making up any title, a competition has arisen between his heir of line and his heir of conquest, and the question to be determined is, whether the said Robert Hutchison took the fee of the said one-fourth part as heir or as disponee.

The heir of conquest maintains that the only persons called before the four brothers Hutchison, viz. the heirs of the testator's body, never having come into existence, the disposition took effect on the testator's death directly in favour of the Hutchisons as conditional institutes and disponees. But the heir of line maintains, on the contrary, that the effect of the conveyance to the heirs of the granter's body, as the first branch of the destination, was to make the granter himself the institute in the destination, and all the other parties called heirs-substitute to him in any event.

Apart from authority, and dealing with the question as depending on legal principle only, the considerations in favour of the heir of conquest seem greatly to predominate. A mortis causa deed remaining undelivered in the hands of the granter produces no change on the title of the property conveyed. The granter being infeft remains the undivested proprietor in fee, and the usual clause in such deeds reserving the granter's liferent is intended only to provide for the contingency of the deed being delivered during his life. The other usual clause, dispensing with delivery of the deed, though found undelivered in the granter's repositories after his death, makes it a delivered deed, or gives it the effect of a delivered deed immediately upon his death. Though therefore the disposition is in form a conveyance de præsenti, as every conveyance of heritage (but for a recent statute) must be, still, if it remains undelivered, it is ambulatory, revocable, and absolutely inoperative as much as a testament nominating an executor, till the granter's death gives it the effect of a delivered deed. During his own life the granter of such an undelivered deed plainly takes nothing as his own disponee, his original title being entirely undisturbed and unaffected. Just as little can he take anything in that character after his own death. No doubt, if the granter conveys to himself nominatim as the first member of a destination, the well settled rules of conveyancing have fixed that any one who takes after him takes as his heir of provision, and this is not an unreasonable construction of such a disposition, which is read as equivalent to a resignation in favour of himself and a series of heirs. But it seems a violent and unnatural extension of that rule to say that the only disponee must still be the granter himself, where the conveyance is simply from him to another party, whether that party be a person named or the heirs of his own body, or any other class of heirs nascituri. It may also be possible in particular dispositions, where the granter does not expressly name himself as disponee or first member of the destination, nevertheless to construe the words used as importing the same thing, and expressing the intention of the granter that no person or class named in the destination shall take otherwise than as heirs-substitute of provision to him. But it seems impossible, according to sound principle, to put such a construction on a destination directly to the heirs of the granter's body, non-existent but possible, whom failing, to A, B, and C, where there is nothing else in the deed to lead to such a construction.

It must now be held as settled for all practical purposes that, when by a mortis causa undelivered disposition the conveyance is directly to A nominatim, whom failing to B, and A predeceases the granter, B takes as conditional institute and not as heir either of A or of the granter. If this be so, it is difficult to understand how the circumstance that instead of a person named, the heirs of the granter's body are first called, should vary the character of the person called in the second place in the destination, when upon the granter's death it is found that no heirs of the body ever existed, and there is no one to stand between the person second named and the estate conveyed.

This case derives its chief importance from the prevalence of an opinion among conveyancers and writers on the practice of conveyancing that the law applicable to such a destination as here occurs is so unsettled and uncertain that it is necessary in prudence so to complete the title of parties standing in the position of the brothers Hutchison as to be valid on either supposition, that there are heirs of the granter or conditional institutes. Some writers have stated the law to be as contended by the heir of line in this case. Among others, Professor Bell in his Principles says (sec. 1839) "When the disposition is to the granter's heirs-male or heirs of the body, whom failing to A, whom failing to B, and the granter survives such heirs and A predeceases, it has been held that the fee is still in the granter, and that B's title is to be made up by service as heir of provision to the granter." This doctrine (which is repeated by the late Professor Menzies in his Lectures on Conveyancing, p. 795, 3d ed.) is founded entirely on the authority of two cases, Gordon of Carleton's Creditors v. Gordon, M. 14,368, and Peacock v. Glen, 4 S. 742, both of which have been a good deal misunderstood.

Kilkerran's report of Gordon of Carleton (though it is more accurate in the statement of the facts than Falconer's) is unfortunately rather meagre. All that can be safely gathered from it is that the deed having disponed the lands to the heirs-male of the granter's body, whom failing to John, whom failing to Nathaniel, and the granter having died without heirs-male of his body, and John having predeceased him, and Nathaniel having served heir of provision in general to the granter, it was objected, in a competition, that he should have served not to the granter but to John, whom the objector called the institute. The decision was that the title was good, because "plainly there was no right ever in John, the first substitute, that could be carried by a service." So far only Kilkerran's report carries our knowledge of the case, and leaves it in doubt upon what ground the Court held the title to be good, as made up by general service to the granter, though it leaves no doubt that the ground of objection urged against the title was bad, viz., that Nathaniel ought to have served heir to John.

As might have been expected, this judgment has been variously interpreted. In the case of Colquhoun v. Colquhoun, 8th July 1831, Fac. Coll., the consulted Judges (Lords J.-C. Boyle, Glenlee, Cringletie, Meadowbank, Corehouse, Mackenzie, Medwyn, Moncreiff, Newton, and Fullerton) state that in the case of Gordon of Carleton "Nathaniel served to the entailer, and that was held sufficient, not certainly because the service transmitted any right from the entailer to Nathaniel, but because it afforded evidence that both the entailer and John Gordon had died without male-heirs, and consequently that the conditional institution in favour of Nathaniel had taken effect." Had this exposition of the ground of judgment in the Carleton case been confirmed, or had it passed unquestioned, it would probably have been held to settle the law adversely to the doctrine laid down by Professor Bell and Professor Menzies. But within less than a year—in the course of the arguments in Anderson v. Anderson, June 22, 1832, 10 S. 701—there was brought to light for the first time, by the research of Dean of Faculty Hope, a note by Lord Drummore, on his session papers in the case of Carleton, in the following terms:—"In this case the Lords thought the case the same as if the disposition had been to himself, and failing him by his decease, to his heirs-male. The fee in both cases was absolutely in the disponee, and the decision was unanimous." As to the value of this note, it must be observed, in the first place, that Lord Drummore was on the bench at the date of the judgment, and probably took part in it; and, in the second place, that he was omnium consensu, an acute and able Judge, worthy to be the son of the President Sir Hugh Dalrymple, and the grandson of Lord Stair. Generally speaking, no great importance is to be ascribed to loose notes on session papers, even if proved to be in the handwriting of eminent Judges, because there is seldom any reliable evidence that they express the ultimate opinion of the writer, and they may well be either a statement of the result of a first judgment, afterwards altered on reclaiming petition, or notes preparatory to an advising, which may never have taken the form of an opinion, and may, after farther consideration, have been discarded as unsound. But this note of Lord Drummore bears internal evidence of being something much more valuable. It is unmistakably a statement of the import of a unanimous judgment of the Court, and it appears from the session papers of Lord Drummore himself, as well as from those in the Arniston Collection, that there were, presumably at least, no further written arguments on this branch of the Carleton case, and therefore (as we may safely infer from the practice of that time) no attempt to reclaim against or disturb the unanimous judgment. This contemporary authority is preferable to the conjectural explanation of the case given in Colquhoun v. Colquhoun, notwithstanding the great weight of the names subscribed to the opinion of the consulted Judges. Accordingly, in the later case of Fogo v. Fogo, 2 D. 681, the whole Judges, who referred to the case of Carleton, preferred the explanation of Lord Drummore to that of the consulted Judges in Colquhoun v. Colquhoun.

But it does not by any means follow that the Carleton case establishes as a universal or even general rule that a destination to the heirs of the granter's body, whom failing to a person or persons named, is equivalent to a destination to the granter himself nominatim, and the heirs of his body, whom failing to a person or persons named. There is nothing in the report of Lord Kilkerran or in the note of Lord Drummore to warrant this sweeping conclusion; and a careful examination of the deed, upon the construction of which the judgment depended, leads to an opposite inference.

The disposition by James Gordon of Carleton, which is, or is intended to be, a strict entail, proceeds on a recital of "the love and favour I bear to the heirs-male lawfully to be begotten of my own body, and the heirs-male a stirpe in stirpem successive, whilk failing to the persons after mentioned, my friends and relatives, whom I hereby nominate and appoint to succeed as heirs of tailzie and provision to me in my land and estate under-written, after my decease." The destination is "to and in favours of the heirs-male lawfully to be gotten of my own body, and their heirs-male a stirpe in stirpem successive, whilk failing to the persons after mentioned, whom I hereby nominate and appoint to succeed to me as my heirs of tailzie and provision therein to me, and their heirs-male lawfully gotten, or to be gotten, of their own bodies, whilk failing to any other person or persons I please to nominate and design under my hand at any time during my lifetime ac etiam in articulo mortis, and the heirs-male gotten or to be gotten of their own bodies, to succeed as heirs of tailzie and provisioun to me therein," &c. There then follows a procuratory of resignation, which authorises resignation to be made in favour of "the heirs-male lawfully to be gotten of my own body, and their heirs-male a stirpe in stirpem successive, whilk failzeing, to John Gordon, third lawful son to umquhile Mr William Gordon of Carlestoun, whom I specially burden with this provision, that Nathaniel Gordon of Gordonstoun be sole tutor to him during his minority, and have elected and nominated him to that effect; and appoints the said Nathaniel Gordon the next substitute in this tailzie failzeing the said John, whilk failzeing to John Maitland," &c.

It seems by no means an unreasonable construction of this deed to hold that there was no intention on the part of the granter to make any party a disponee, and that the effect of the deed is to create merely a succession of heirs without any such conveyance as will have the usual effect of converting a substitute into an institute in the event of the institute and the other prior members, if any, of the destination predeceasing the granter. The dispositive clause does not name any persons, but conveys the estate only to the heirs-male of his body, and failing them, to persons who are most carefully and anxiously described more than once as "heirs nominated and appointed to succeed to me." There is no precept of sasine. Any feudalisation of right conferred by the deed must therefore be by resignation, and it is particularly to be noted that in the procuratory of resignation Nathaniel (whose right to the estate was sustained in respect of his general service as heir of provision to the granter) is mentioned only under this form of expression, after John Gordon, "and appoints the said Nathaniel Gordon the next substitute in this tailzie failzeing of the said John." Without mention of his name in the dispositive clause, and with this very peculiar mention of him in the procuratory of resignation, and with no precept of sasine which he could in any event use, it was not wonderful that the Court should deal with Nathaniel as a party who could in no event occupy the position of an institute or disponee, particularly as the only objection taken to his service as heir of provision to the granter of the deed was that he ought to have served to John Gordon as the first party called nominatim in the destination—an objection unfounded in the circumstance of the case, but indicating that the objector considered himself precluded by the terms of the deed from representing Nathaniel as in any sense or in any event a conditional institute or disponee.

This seems the most reasonable and consistent explanation of the judgment in the case of Carleton, and it derives much support from the information and suggestions contained in an opinion of Lord Craigie in Colquhoun v. Colquhoun—an opinion in many respects of great weight in this branch of the law. His Lordship says—"It had been provided by the entail of Carleton that the person there called nominatim might be served heirs of tailzie to the entailer; and Lord Kilkerran's interlocutor, to which the Court adhered, appears to be chiefly rested on that specialty. The judgment is not recited in the report, probably because the collection was not originally intended for publication, but it is in the words—'Having advised the minute of debate, and considered the disposition and tailzie, finds the title properly made up by Nathaniel Gordon to James Gordon the maker of the entail.'"

For the reasons now stated and explained, the decision in Gordon of Carleton cannot be held to establish that a party called nominatim under a destination after the heirs of the granter's body, and without any disposition or other conveyance in favour of the granter himself, does not on the death of the granter without heirs of his body become institute and disponee. In certain exceptional circumstances, and according to the terms of such a deed as the Carleton entail this result may be produced; but nothing short of such exceptional circumstances and expressions of the deed can interfere with the general rule that the first substitute becomes institute upon the institute predeceasing the granter without heirs, or with the application of that rule to such a destination as occurs in the present case.

The other case relied on by the heir of line, Peacock v. Glen, has been also the subject of a good deal of criticism, and also of a good deal of misunderstanding.

In the first place, it must be observed that in Peacock v. Glen the whole controversy regarded the completion and validity of a feudal title, while in Gordon of Carleton the question turned on the vesting of a personal right of fee in Nathaniel Gordon, to enable him to dispone to his eldest son. The finding of the Court was by a majority that "there was no proper feudal title in the per-of William Beatie junior at the date of the bond in security in question," therefore they reduced the bond and infeftment thereon.

In the second place, the defect of the feudal title of William Beatie junior existed in the imperfection of the sasine in his favour, in respect of failure to comply with the requisites of the Act 1693, c. 35. This is the only ground of judgment stated by Lord Glenlee, and Lord Robertson, who concurred with him. Lord Alloway dissented from the judgment, holding the feudal title of William Beatie junior to be unobjectionable. The Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Pitmilly no doubt proceeded to a certain extent on the supposed authority of the case of Carleton. The destination in Peacock v. Glen was to the heirs of the granter's body, whom failing to William Beatie his nephew, and on the death of the granter without issue, William Beatie took infeftment on the precept of sasine contained in the disposition, without service or any other preliminary to connect himself therewith. The two Judges last named held that this title was bad for want of such service, proceeding on what may now be assumed to be a misunderstanding of the case of Gordon of Carleton. But this was certainly not the opinion of the majority of the Court. The case of Peacock v. Glen cannot therefore be relied on as either following the case of Carleton, or as a case in which the principle of that case was accurately ascertained and understood.

The cases of Gordon of Carleton and Peacock v. Glen are not authorities for the heir of line, and authorities of undoubted weight and application as understood and expounded by Professor Bell and Professor Menzies, the whole intention of the heir of line fails. It is based on a rule of construction supposed to be established by these cases, which is in the highest degree artificial and which, by ascribing a non-natural sense to words of plain meaning, would convert a de præsenti conveyance of lands into a mere nomination of heirs, with executory clauses for completing the titles of those heirs who may invest themselves therewith by service. This is a perversion of all the ordinary rules of construction of such deeds, and is calculated, as it has been found in practice, to introduce great confusion and uncertainty in the operations of conveyances.

The Court are of opinion that when one by mortis causa conveyance in the ordinary form dispones to the heirs of his body, or the heirs-male of his body, whom failing to a person named, the person so named (there being no heirs of the body then existing) is conditional institute; and if no heirs of the body of the granter come into existence, or existing, predecease him, the condition is purified, and the person named is, on the death of the granter, without qualification or condition, disponee, and as such is entitled to use the executory clauses of the disposition for the purpose of feudalising his right as disponee without service or declarator.

The judgment must therefore in this case be pronounced in favour of the heir of conquest and against the heir of line of Robert Hutchison.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"In conformity with the opinion of all the seven Judges present at the said hearing, Find and declare that David Hutchison, the heir of conquest to the deceased Robert Hutchison, his brother, has right to the pro indiviso share of the lands of Walton, Malletsheugh, and others destined by the disposition and deed of settlement in the case mentioned, to the said deceased Robert Hutchison and his heirs, and decern; and find no expenses due."

Arbiter—Process—Defence—Contract—Clause of Reference.—Held that an action raised by a contractor against his employer for payment due under a building contract, and for damages from his employer having, as he alleged, illegally taken possession of machinery and materials, was not excluded by a clause of reference in the contract, in respect (1) that it was not clear that the clause of reference gave the arbiter authority to give decree for payment of money; (2) that certain of the questions raised did not fall within the reference; and (3) that the arbiter could not assess damages.

Observed, that if questions arose in the course of the action falling within the reference, the aid of the arbiter must be invoked.

1st Division. Lord Mure. M.

IN August 1869 Charles Tough, contractor, Govan, entered into a contract with the Dumbarton Water-Works Commissioners, by which he undertook to construct a reservoir, and execute other works in connection with the water supply of the burgh of Dumbarton. This contract contained the following clause of reference:—"And in the event of any doubts, disputes, or differences arising concerning the said works, or relating to the quantities or qualities of the several materials to be employed, or to any additions, deductions, alterations, or deviations made in or from the said works, or any part or portion thereof, or concerning the true intent and meaning of these presents, or any of the plans, drawings, or instructions hereinbefore referred to, or in any other matter or thing connected therewith, either during the progress of the works or after the completion thereof, all such doubts, disputes, or differences, shall be, and the same are hereby, submitted and referred to the amicable decision, final sentence, and decree-arbitral, of the said James Morris Gale, whom failing, &c.: Declaring that although the said James Morris Gale may continue and remain the said first parties' engineer, such connection shall not disqualify him from acting as arbiter in the premises, and his decision shall be as unchallengeable as if he were solely unconnected with the said first parties or the said works; and declaring that this submission shall not expire by reason of the lapse of year and day before the decision, interim or final, to be pronounced herein; but that notwithstanding this declaration the arbiter shall have power to prorogate the same from time to time as he may think proper; and the whole parties hereto consent to the registration hereof, or of any interim or final decreet-arbitral that may follow upon the submission herein contained, for preservation and execution."

The contract also contained the following clause:—"Fifteenth, Should it appear at any time to the first parties, upon the representation of their engineer, that the second party is not performing the several portions of the work in a satisfactory manner, or is not using sufficient diligence in carrying on the works so as to have them completed by the time stipulated for, or should the second party become bankrupt or insolvent, then, on giving seven days' notice to him, or any of his foremen, the first parties shall have the option and power of taking possession of the whole or any part of the work, and of carrying on and completing the same, and for that purpose to take and use the plant, tools, and materials of the second party, and to sell and dispose of the same as the absolute property of the first parties." Mr Gale was engineer for the Water-Works Commissioners.

In October 1870 Mr Tough entered into a second contract with the commissioners for removal of peat from the bottom of the reservoir. This contract contained no clause of reference.

In June 1872 the present action was brought by Mr Tough against the mmissioners for recovery (1) of £152, 7s. 3d. as the balance of the contract price of the work alleged to have been executed by him under the ntract of 1869; (2) of two sums of £79, 16s. and £742, 1s. 2d. due to him in connection with the contract for removal of peat entered to in October 1870; (3) of a sum of £500 as damages for alleged improper appropriation of the plant belonging to the pursuer; and (4) of other sum of £500 as damages said to have been occasioned by the ilure of the defenders to give the pursuer immediate access to the ound, according to the fair meaning of the contract.

With reference to his claim for damages, the pursuer averred,—(Cond. The defenders' answer to this article was,—(Ans. 7.) "Denied, and ference made to defenders' statement. The pursuer voluntarily resigned s contract."

The defenders stated,—(Art. 8.) "In the early part of June 1871 it came apparent that the means the pursuer was taking for disposing of e peat were insufficient, and on the 28th of that month the commissioners received a letter from Mr Gale dated that day, which is herewith oduced, stating that the pursuer had failed to implement his contract removing the peat, and that at the rate at which the pursuer was proding there was no prospect of the reservoir being in a state to be used en to a partial extent during the then approaching winter, and that it ould be necessary to take the work out of the pursuer's hands, and to ake new contracts for its completion. In consequence of this communication the commissioners arranged a meeting with the pursuer, which ok place in Glasgow on 1st July 1871, and the result of that meeting s that on 4th July 1871 the pursuer addressed a letter to the commissioners voluntarily renouncing both contracts." (Art. 9.) "The said letter m the pursuer was considered at a meeting of the commissioners held 7th July 1871, when they agreed to accept of said renunciation, reving the rights of both parties, and under an express denial of an egation made by the pursuer that he was able and willing to proceed th the contracts in terms thereof, or that he had hitherto complied with e terms of the contracts. This resolution was communicated to the purer by letter of Mr Denny, clerk to the commissioners, dated 8th July 71. The pursuer's letter, and a copy of Mr Denny's reply, are herewith oduced. When the pursuer gave up the contracts he had a considerable rtion of the work under the first contract to perform, and the execution it has been contracted for by another contractor, at a cost of between 00 and £1000. The inability of the pursuer to complete his contracts s occasioned serious loss to the commissioners, both on account of the lay caused, and the greatly increased price of labour. At the completon of the works, there will be a large sum due by the pursuer to the mmissioners."

The pursuer further averred,—"It was part of the contract between e pursuer and the said commissioners that the former should execute e work within fifteen months from the date of the acceptance of his fer, and he entered into the contract on the faith of his being able to et immediate access to the ground. According to the fair meaning of e contract the pursuer was entitled to immediate access to the ground, t the defenders wrongfully failed till April 1870, a period of upwards f seven months from said acceptance, to give the pursuer access to the round, other than that on which the filter had to be constructed. pursuer was thereby prevented from taking up the work simultaneously, and from getting the work done in the winter months necessary to prepare the ground for the embankment being completed in summer. In consequence of the delay, the work was thrown into winter which should have been done in summer, when it could have been done at much less cost."

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The action is excluded by the clause of reference in the said contract, and ought therefore to be dismissed.

On 16th November 1872 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the first plea in law for the defenders has been obviated by the addition made to the summons at the debate: Finds, with reference to the second plea in defence, that the action is not excluded by the clause of reference in the contract, No. 10 of process, in so far as the action relates to claims arising out of the contract entered into between the parties in October 1870 relative to the removal of peat from the reservoir; and, before further answer, sists process for ten days, that parties may ascertain whether Mr Gale is prepared to accept the submission made to him by the contract, No. 10 of process, in relation to the other claims sued for; and, upon that being done, appoints the case to be put to the roll for further procedure, reserving all questions of expenses."

* NOTE.—(After narrating the sums claimed by the pursuer as above)—"With reference to all these claims it is contended, on the part of the defenders, that the action is excluded by the clause of reference founded on in defence, which provides that 'all doubts, disputes, or differences arising concerning the said works, or relative to the quantities or qualities of the several materials to be employed, or to any additions, deductions, alterations, or deviations made in or from the said works, or any part or portion thereof, or concerning the true intent and meaning of these presents, or any of the plans, drawings or instructions hereinbefore referred to, or in any other matter or thing connected therewith, either during the progress of the works or after the completion thereof, shall be, and the same are hereby, submitted and referred to the amicable decision, final sentence, and decree-arbitral of the said James Morris Gale, whom failing by death, non-acceptance, resignation, or otherwise, of any arbiter to be named by the Sheriff of Dumbartonshire, upon the application of either party, as sole arbiter in the premises, whose decision and valuation and award shall be final.'

"(1) This clause is one of a very broad and general description, and it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the decision of the question raised, relative to the final of the sums sued for, is covered by its terms. The sum is claimed as the balance of what is said to be due for work done under the original contract, and the defence, as the Lord Ordinary understands it, is that the work stipulated to be done by the pursuer, and for which the contract price was to be paid, was not completed at the date when the pursuer agreed to give up the contract, that the defenders had to get another contractor to complete the work at a cost of about £900, and that, under the provisions of the contract founded on, they were entitled to set off that sum against the sum now claimed by the pursuer as the alleged balance of the contract price. The dispute, therefore, is one which relates to the execution of the work, and the true intent and meaning of the contract, in the strictest view which has been taken in the reported cases of clauses of reference of this description, and as to which, therefore, the jurisdiction of this Court has, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, in this case been excluded.

"(2) But the question raised relative to the removal of peat is in a different position. This was not part of the original contract in which the clause of reference occurs, but was made matter of separate agreement in October 1870, under the specification and letters of offer and acceptance, Nos. 14 and 15 of process, and the Lord Ordinary has been unable to adopt the view contended for by the defenders, that it was a mere extension or alteration of the original contract, and as such subject to the same regulations and provisions. For in the specification to which the pursuer's offer relates no stipulation is made that the

The Lord Ordinary, having regard to the decision in the case of Pearson, ruary 1859, has felt the question relative to the claims of damage to be l with considerable difficulty, but as the clause of reference in the present nuch more comprehensive in its terms than the clause founded on in the Pearson, and is framed so as to cover not only all disputes or differences oncerning the works, or the true intent and meaning of the contract, but those which may arise concerning 'any other matter or thing connected' e contract, the Lord Ordinary has come to the conclusion that it is so as to exclude the jurisdiction of this Court relative to the damages here ; because, 1st, the question raised relative to the alleged illegal taking on of the plant depends upon the application of the 18th section of the con- id upon whether the progress and condition of the works at the time was to render it necessary and proper for the defenders, on giving due notice to uer, to take possession of the works and of the plant with a view to their ion in terms of the contract; while, 2d, the claim of damage founded on ged delay in getting possession of the ground is, it is thought, one which be regulated by the provisions of the contract relative to the extension ime for its completion. And both of these are questions relative to the of the contract and its execution which it is not unreasonable to sup- parties would intend, by such a clause as that here in question, to refer uperintending engineer.

ore, however, pronouncing any finding to the effect that action is to any xcluded, the Lord Ordinary has thought it right to sist process in order ain whether the referee named is prepared to accept."

NOTE.—As the sum claimed as the balance for work done under the contract is slumped up in the conclusions of the summons with the sums under the contract for removal of the peat, the Lord Ordinary has it better not to dismiss the action relative to those items of the pursuer's which he considers covered by the reference till he is in a position to finally of the question raised relative to the removal of the peat."

done, the Court might have remitted to the arbiter, but there was no such question here, but merely a claim for a debt due, which was a matter for the decision of the Court alone.[1] (2) The arbiter had no power to assess damages, unless such power was expressly given him in the reference.[2]

Argued for the defenders;—The subject-matter of the action was within the clause of reference, as all matters connected with the contract were there referred to the arbiter.[3] The defence to the pursuer's claim for £152 under the first contract was that he had broken the contract, and it was certainly for the arbiter to say whether he had broken the contract or not. As to the claims for damages, they were also for the arbiter, for the clause of reference was very wide, and included anything done in reference to the contract.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the pursuer, Mr Charles Tough, sues the Dumbarton Water-Works Commissioners for various claims arising out of two contracts which they entered into with him, one for the construction of a reservoir, and the other for the removal of a quantity of peat from the basin of the reservoir. The first contract was entered into in August 1869, and the other in October 1870. The first of these contracts, that for the construction of the reservoir, contains a clause of reference. The second contract, being made merely in the form of a specification, with letters of offer and acceptance, contains no such clause. When the case first came before the Lord Ordinary, his Lordship on 16th November 1872, found that the action was not excluded by the clause of reference, in so far as the action related to claims arising out of the contract entered into between the parties in October 1870 relative to the removal of peat from the reservoir, and before further answer sisted process for ten days, that the parties might ascertain whether Mr Gale was prepared to accept the submission made to him by the contract, in relation to the other claims sued for. Mr Gale intimated that he was quite willing to go on with the arbitration. In consequence, the Lord Ordinary, having again heard parties, pronounced an interlocutor on 3d December 1872, in which he "finds that the action is excluded by the clause of reference, in so far as regards the £152, 7s. 3d. claimed as balance due under the original contract price of the works, and the two sums, each of £500, claimed in name of damages under the summons." But he did not dismiss the action, and he explains his reason, that he thought it better to have a proof, in order to see how much of the claims fell under the first contract, and how much under the second; and he accordingly allowed the parties a proof of their averments applicable to the removal of peat from the reservoir.

I am not able to agree with the Lord Ordinary in the course which he has taken. I do not think that this action is excluded by the clause of reference in regard to any of the claims. It may be that questions may arise in the course of the action, which may fall under the scope of the reference, and if so, the aid of the arbiter must be invoked. It is only to that extent that the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals is excluded. This contract does not arm the referee, as scarcely any such contracts do, with sufficient judicial powers finally to adjudicate on the claims of parties. The clause of reference is in these terms:—"And in the event of any doubts, disputes, or differences arising concerning the said works, or relating to the quantities or qualities of the several materials to be employed, or to any additions, deductions, alterations, or deviations made in or from the said works, or any part or portion thereof, or concerning the true intent and meaning of these presents, or any of the plans, drawings, or instructions hereinbefore referred to, or in any other matter or thing connected therewith either during the progress of the works or after the completion thereof, all such doubts, disputes, or differences, shall be, and the same are hereby, submitted and referred to the amicable decision, final sentence, and decree-arbitral of the said James Morris Gale, whom failing, &c.: Declaring that although the said James Morris Gale may continue and remain the said first parties' engineer, such connection shall not disqualify him from acting as arbiter in the premises, and his decision shall be as unchallengeable as if he were solely unconnected with the said first parties or the said works; and declaring that this submission shall not expire by reason of the lapse of year and day before the decision, interim or final, to be pronounced herein; but that notwithstanding this declaration the arbiter shall have power to prorogate the same from time to time as he may think proper; and the whole parties hereto consent to the registration hereof, or of any interim or final decreet-arbitral that may follow upon the submission herein contained, for preservation and execution." There is no express power given to the arbiter to decern for a sum of money. Whether that power might be implied it is not necessary to determine. Undoubtedly there is no power given to the arbiter to assess a claim of damages betwixt the parties. The clause is of such nature, that, even supposing the whole merits of a dispute to be for the arbiter, it may and probably will require an action at law to give effect to such claims. It appears to me therefore very unsafe to find that the arbitration clause excludes an action.

When we come to the nature of the claims by the pursuer, the unsoundness of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is still more apparent. The first claim is for a balance of £152, 7s. 3d., for work alleged to have been actually performed by him under the original contract, which contains the clause of reference. If the answer were that the work was not done, that would probably be a question for the referee. If any question arose as to the manner of its performance that might also be for the referee to decide. But in order to raise a question of that kind some such defence must be stated. I cannot find any objection to payment of this balance, except on the ground of a counter claim of damages on the ground that the contractor deserted his contract and left the defenders to finish the work at an expense of £900 or £1000. That is the only defence, so far as I can see, stated against this claim. Unless the question can be raised so as to bring the defenders' counter claim for loss and damage within the reference I do not see how the claim for £152, 7s. 3d. by the pursuer can be disposed of by the referee.

In regard to another small claim for £79, 16s., it is impossible to say that this falls within the reference, and the Lord Ordinary does not consider it to be so.

Then comes a claim for £742, 1s., which is plainly within the second contract, and cannot fall under the reference.

There remain the two claims of damages for £500 each. I observe, in the first place, that even if the grounds of damages were for the referee, and he alone was entitled to affirm or negative these grounds, the assessment of damages would not be for the referee, and so the action would not be excluded.

But one of these claims is plainly not within the reference. In the 7th article of his condescendence the pursuer avers,—"In or about July or August 1871 the defenders, without any reason, and without any legal authority whatever, seized the pursuer's plant, appropriated it to their own purposes, and have retained possession of it ever since; and at said date they also took the contracts out of his hands. The said seizure and breach of contract were wholly wrongful and unwarrantable. The pursuer has suffered loss, injury, and damage thereby to the extent of £500 or thereby."

The answer is a denial, under reference to the defenders' statement. It is important to notice what that statement is. In the 7th article of their statement the defenders complain that the pursuer was not carrying on the works under the original contract in a satisfactory manner. Nevertheless, according to their own shewing, they made a new contract with him in October 1870. They must, at that date, have been of opinion that he was to go on with the original contract. In the 8th article the defenders continue,—"In the early part of June 1871 it became apparent that the means the pursuer was taking for disposing of the peat were insufficient, and on the 28th of that month the commissioners received a letter from Mr Gale dated that day, which is herewith produced, s ing that the pursuer had failed to implement his contract for removing the p and that at the rate at which he was proceeding there was no prospect of reservoir being in a state to be used, even to a partial extent, during the t approaching winter, and stating that it would be necessary to take the work of the pursuer's hands, and to make new contracts for its completion. In sequence of this communication the commissioners arranged a meeting with pursuer, which took place in Glasgow on 1st July 1871, and the result of meeting was that on 4th July 1871 the pursuer addressed a letter to the com sioners voluntarily renouncing both contracts."

That letter was received by the commissioners, and they agreed to accep his renunciation. It is plain that this is not a proceeding under the claus the contract of 1869 which authorises the commissioners to take the work of the hands of the contractor. This was a proceeding by which they took contracts out of his hands,—the result, according to the defenders, being the pursuer voluntarily abandoned both contracts, and that is the justific which they plead in answer to his complaint that they illegally seized his p not in one contract only, but in both. It appears to me that this is not a c falling under the clause of reference at all. If the pursuer is right the defen proceedings were illegal and unwarrantable, and not under any clause of c contract. If the defenders are right that the pursuer voluntarily abandone contracts, just as little can the dispute be brought within the clause of refer Their contention makes the question turn on a new agreement embodied in letters of July 1871. On no possible supposition can this claim of damage made the subject of reference under the clause in the contract of 1869.

In regard to the other claim of damages for £500, for failure to give the suer timeous access to the ground, it may be very doubtful whether this is wi the clause of reference. A great deal will depend on the circumstances. It depend on the meaning of the contract, and in that case it will be necessar go to the arbiter. But in any event this claim of £500 cannot be given e to by the referee, and can only receive effect in this or some other Court.

For these reasons it appears to me that the action is not excluded in regar any of these claims by the clause of reference, though it may be that in the secution of these demands under this action questions may arise which fall w the scope of reference.

I am of opinion that we should recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordin and find that the action is not excluded by the clause of reference, and remi his Lordship to proceed in the cause. It may be necessary to add, for his L ship's instruction, a reservation in case of any question arising fit for the ref

hn Boyd (I.) died about the year 1765, and was succeeded by John portioner of Seabeggs, his eldest son and nearest and lawful heir, in that character made up a title to said subjects by precept of clare t, dated 25th December 1765, granted by Major Chalmers of Came- iferent superior, and John Pringle, W.S., the commissioner for Sir ence Dundas, to whom the said William Don had sold the supe- y of the said lands of Seabeggs in the year 1762. Upon this pre- the said John Boyd (II.) was infeft in 1766.

hn Boyd (II.) died in or before the year 1814, and was succeeded by Boyd (III.), portioner in Seabeggs, his eldest son and nearest and l heir, who made up titles to said subjects by precept of clare constat, l October 10, 1814, granted by the Right Honourable Thomas Lord las (afterwards Earl of Zetland), superior of the lands and barony of eggs, upon which the said John Boyd (III.) was infeft in 1814. In of these precepts of clare constat there was a clause professing to ve the mines and minerals to the superior. The clause, which was antially the same in both writs, was expressed in the precept of in the following terms:—"Excepting and reserving always to us, ding to our respective rights and interests of liferent and fee above ioned, the haill mines and minerals within the ground of the fore- lands, with power to set down sinks, drive levels, and work and win ame as we think fit, the said John Boyd, his heirs and successors, g always payd of what damages shall be sustained by them in work- he same, as shall be determined by two neutral persons."

Boyd v. Bruce and Others.

Before raising the action the pursuer obtained service as nearest and lawful heir in general to John Boyd (I.)

The defenders stated, inter alia, the following pleas:—1. The action should be dismissed, in respect that the pursuer has not set forth, and does not possess, any sufficient title to sue. 2. The defenders should be assoilzied from the whole conclusions of the action, in respect (1) that the superior was entirely divested of the dominium utile of the lands libelled, including the mines and minerals therein, by the unqualified infeftment in favour of John Boyd (I.), the original feuar; (2) that the attempted reservation of mines and minerals in favour of the superior in subsequent renewals of the investiture was wholly unauthorised and inept, and had not the effect of making the mines and minerals an estate separate and distinct from the dominium utile of the surface; (3) that in virtue of the renewals of the investiture by the successive precepts of clare constat and sasines in favour of the son and grandson of the original feuar, the whole dominium utile of the said subjects, including the mines and minerals, was effectually transmitted to and feudally vested in John Boyd (III.), the grandson of the original feuar; and (4) that the same, in virtue of the transmissions above set forth, was now completely and feudally vested in the present defenders.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, and considered the closed record and productions, Finds that the pursuer has not instructed any sufficient title to insist in the present action: Therefore dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, of which appoints an account to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax, and report." *

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has felt the question of title to sue here raised to be attended with considerable nicety, and if the object of the present action had been to reduce infeftments which stood in the way of the pursuer establishing a claim to the minerals in question he would have had difficulty in holding that a general service was not a sufficient title to sue, because although the decisions in such questions are in some respect contradictory—Horne, Nov. 6, 1741, D. p. 16,117, as contrasted with M'Callum, Feb. 21, 1793, D. p. 16,15—it appears to have been held in the later case of Carmichael, Nov. 15, 1826, that a general service is a sufficient title to challenge an investiture flowing from the party to whom the general service was expede, although there does not appear to have been in that case, any more than here, any objection to the party founding upon the general service entering as heir in special to the ancestor. The present, however, is not an action of that description. It is one of declarator, in which the pursuer seeks to have it declared that the minerals in the property belonging to the defenders, in which it is alleged that the deceased John Boyd, younger in Lochgreen, was last vest and seised, belong to the pursuer as heir of John Boyd; and the title in respect of which the pursuer seeks to have this declared is a service as heir in general of that John Boyd. Now, the Lord Ordinary understands it to be an undoubted rule of law that a general service is inept to carry to the party served right to any lands in which the ancestor died infeft—Ersk. iii. 8, sec. 63. In such circumstances a special service seems to be essential to transmit the right, and as the object of this action is to have it declared that the pursuer is now the actual proprietor of the minerals in which John Boyd, the younger, died last vest and seised, and which are said to have ever since remained in hæreditate jacente of John Boyd, the Lord Ordinary does not think that a general service can be held to be a proper title on which to found such an action.

"But there is another ground on which it appears to the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer's title is objectionable. This action proceeds upon the assumption that the minerals are still in hæreditate jacente of John Boyd, younger of Loch-

Boyd v. Bruce and Others.

The pursuer reclaimed, and before the reclaiming note was heard he obtained service from the Sheriff of Chancery as nearest and lawful heir in special of John Boyd (I.) in the mines and minerals in the said lands.

Argued for the pursuer;—Although the exception and reservation in the precept of clare constat, under which John Boyd (II.) made up a title, was insufficient to confer upon the superior any right to the minerals which, under the original contract, had been conveyed to John Boyd (I.), yet it was sufficient to limit the infeftment of John Boyd (II.) to the lands alone.[1] This being so, the right to the minerals remained in hæreditate jacente of John Boyd (I.), and special service to him gave the pursuer a good title to insist in the action.

Argued for the defenders;—The mines and minerals were not in hæreditate jacente of John Boyd (I.), having been transmitted as an integral part of the lands. The mines and minerals, not being reserved in the original feu-contract, could not be so by the precept of clare constat.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has found that the pursuer has not instructed any sufficient title to insist in the present action. He has pursuer, who died in or about 1765. For it assumes that the precepts of clare constat under which the investiture was renewed in 1765 and 1814 were insufficient, notwithstanding the reservation in the superior's favour of the minerals therein contained, to confer upon the superior any right to the minerals which, under the original feu-contract, had admittedly been conveyed away to John Boyd of Lochgreen. And in this latter assumption it is thought that the pursuer is correct; because it appears to have been deliberately settled in the case of Graham, January 27, 1842, that such a reservation in a charter of progress, as which was not in the original titles, was altogether ineffectual to deprive the owner of the dominium utile of his right to the minerals, or of any other part of the subject originally feued, unless it distinctly appeared from the deeds by which the investiture was renewed that there had been a new transaction then entered into, under which the parties intended so to alter the investiture. But it is not alleged that there was any such transaction entered into at any of the renewals of the investitures in this case, and the deeds themselves, which are produced, do not bear that there was. Now, these precepts are founded on by the pursuer, in the record, as shewing that the minerals in question are still in hæreditate jacente of John Boyd the first, who died in 1765. On a sound construction, however, of the precepts, they appear to the Lord Ordinary to disprove that fact. For if the reservation is ineffectual to entitle the superior to re-assert a right to the minerals as in a question with his vassal—and it was so ruled in the case of Graham—then the minerals must, it is thought, be held to have been ere transmitted, in respect of the infeftment which followed upon the precepts of clare constat referred to in the condescendence, first, to John Boyd the second in 1765, and afterwards to John Boyd the third in 1814, by whom the property was sold in 1825. Whether the conveyance then granted in favour of Mrs Munro, and the subsequent transmissions, are apt to carry the minerals to the parties from whom the property was subsequently acquired by the defenders, or whether the minerals are still in hæreditate jacente of John Boyd the third, appear to the Lord Ordinary to be the main questions raised upon the merits in the present action. But the defenders cannot, it is thought, be called on to discuss these questions, or to defend the titles on which they rely, in an action at the instance of a party whose only title is a general service to John Boyd the first of Lochgreen, who was not, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, the heir last vest and seised in the minerals."

therefore dismissed the action. This interlocutor is based on two grounds. His Lordship held, in the first place, that as the pursuer had only a general service to the person in whose right he claimed to stand, this was not a good title to sue. The second ground is more important and more special to the present case that by means of this service the pursuer has not connected himself with the subjects which he claims. The first ground has since been obviated. The pursuer has obtained a special service, and we must deal with the case on the footing that the pursuer is served heir in special to John Boyd (I.) in the mines and minerals contained in a feu created by feu-contract in 1729.

The question comes to be, whether by this proceeding the pursuer has so connected himself with these minerals that he is entitled to insist in the declarator that they belong to him against the defenders, who are infeft in the feu without any reservation. The estate created by the feu-contract of 1729 consisted of a parcel of land, without any reservation of minerals, with teinds and other pertinents, to be held of the party who was superior in feu-farm, and for payment of a certain feu-duty. The feudal estate being once created, it was not in the power of the superior to make any alteration on the subjects, the holding, the reddendo, or any other of the essentialia of the holding, by merely inserting a reservation in a precept of clare constat or a charter by progress. Any such attempt would be simply nugatory, and of no avail to alter the value of the estate. No doubt such things may be done by way of transaction between the superior and vassal, but that comes pretty much to the creation of a new feu. What actually happened was this: John Boyd (I.), the original feuar, having died, his son, John Boyd (II.) made up a title by obtaining a precept of clare constat from the superior, and took infeftment thereon. In that precept there was inserted after the description of the subjects the words—"Excepting and reserving to us, according to our respective rights and interests of liferent and fee above mentioned, the haill mines and minerals within the ground of the foresaid lands, with power to set down sinks, drive levels, and work and win the same as we think fit, the said John Boyd, his heirs and successors, being always payd of what damages shall be sustained by them in working the same, as shall be determined by two neutral persons." Now, that exception and reservation inserted in the precept of clare constat was, in a question with the party who took infeftment upon it, absolutely inept. If the superior had proposed to work the minerals, he could have been interdicted, and any attempt to found on the precept of clare constat would have been of no avail. If the vassal had worked the minerals, the superior could not have prevented him. Not only was the reservation beyond the power of the superior, but it was positively of no effect. Consequently John Boyd (II.) was infeft in the feu just as completely as his father was before him. The superior could give no precept except to infeft in the entire feu. This makes it very clear that the notion of the minerals remaining in hæreditate jacente of John Boyd (I.) cannot be entertained. The mines and minerals, which have never been separated from the estate, are not a separate subject. They may be made a separate estate, but till they have been formally separated the lands and the minerals constitute one subject, and one only. There is no parallel between this case and that where a distinct subject is reserved. The feu was one and indivisible. Either John Boyd (II.) was infeft in the feu, as one and indivisible, or he was not infeft at all. I apprehend that he was infeft in the feu, as it stood in the person of his father.

The case of the pursuer rests entirely on the ground that the minerals were in hæreditate jacente of John Boyd (I.), and are so to this day. To this I cannot give effect, and propose that we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Deas.—This question involves principles of feudal conveyancing, but principles well settled, and about which there can be no doubt. In the original feu-contract, under which John Boyd (I.) held the lands of Seabeggs, there is disponed to him "all and heal that part and portion of the lands and barony of Seabegs and Muir yrof as the same is presently meithed and marched off to him, being a part of the room and mealling of land possest by Robert Hender

m, with the teinds of the samen parts and pendicles, and pertinents yrof lying ithin the barrony of Seabegs, parioch of Falkirk, and shire of Sterling." Now, here is no doubt that a disposition of lands includes mines and minerals if they re not specially reserved, and there is no special reservation here. On this feu-ontract John Boyd (I.) was infeft. He died in 1765, and then his son, John oyd (II.), was infeft upon a precept of clare constat granted on 25th December 765. In this precept there was a reservation of minerals. Then John Boyd (II.) ied in 1814, and his son John Boyd (III.) obtained a precept of clare constat, ated 10th October 1814, upon which he was infeft. In this precept also there as a clause reserving mines and minerals. Now, the question is whether the st John Boyd is to be held to have stood infeft in mines and minerals. There s no doubt that he did, unless the reservation of minerals contained in the pre-epts of clare constat was effectual, which it clearly was not. An entry in lands s an entry in the minerals, unless there is a valid reservation of them. There as no valid reservation in this case. In the original feu-contract the minerals ere not reserved. There was no new transaction in regard to them, and, herefore, the reservation of them in the precepts of clare constat was utterly ept.

As the case stands, therefore, I am of opinion that the pursuer has not in-tructed any title to sue.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

whole interest of £6000 until the youngest son of my brother Dr Andrew Hill attains the age of twenty-one years complete, and at this period the said £6000 shall be divided as follows"—(Then follow directions as to the disposal of the capital of the £6000).

The testator, David Hill, died on 10th November 1860, and his brother Robert Hill, implemented the conditions imposed on him, and drew the interest of the £6000 until Martinmas 1863. He died on 28th February 1864, and was survived by his widow, Mrs Elizabeth Todd or Hill, and an only child, Robert Hunter Hill. Shortly after the death of Robert Hill a multiplepoinding was brought to have it established to whom the right to the interest of the £6000, which might accrue after the said Robert Hill's death, had passed. The Court, on 8th November 1866 (ante, vol. v. p. 12), found that the future produce of the sum had descended to the executors of Robert Hill, and the interest was accordingly paid to the factor loco tutoris of Robert Hunter Hill to the term of Whitsunday preceding his death, which occurred on 22d July 1871. The said Robert Hunter Hill was a pupil at his death.

On that event, Mrs Hill, as mother of the pupil, claimed to have right under the Moveable Succession Act to one-third of the future interest of the £6000. This claim was opposed by James Hill, the pupil's uncle, and heir-at-law and executor-dative of his nephew, on the ground that the right to the interest extending over a tract of future time was a heritable right in the person of the pupil.

A special case was presented by James Hill and Mrs Hill for the opinion and judgment of the Court upon the following questions:—"(1) Does the interest on the said fund of £6000 from the date of the death of the said Robert Hunter Hill till the majority of Dr Andrew Hill's youngest son form part of Robert Hunter Hill's moveable estate, and is the said Mrs Elizabeth Todd or Hill entitled to participate thereof until the period fixed for division of the capital? Or (2), Is she entitled to participate only in that part of it which had become due at the date of her son's death?"

It was argued for the first party that the estate of interest was a right bearing a tract of future time, and was therefore heritable. The payment of interest from year to year was not payment of a definite sum by instalments, for interest was an estate to arise in the future, to the existence of which a future tract of time was necessary. So this bequest being of a right having a tract of future time it was heritable and not moveable.[1]

It was argued for the second party that the right to interest formed part of the moveable estate of the deceased Robert Hunter Hill.[2] The interest was the yearly profit of a fixed capital sum, and the rights which were heritable because they had a tract of future time were rights which carried a yearly profit to the creditor while they subsisted, without relation to any capital sum or stock.[3] Besides, the bequest in this case was of the "whole interest" until a certain event occurred, and this was to the same effect as if the trustees had been directed to accumulate the interest and pay it in a slump sum when the said event occurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This question arises under the trust-disposition of Mr David Hill, in which he makes a kind of bargain with his brother Robert Hill in the following terms—"I declare and enjoin that my brother Robert shall

ıds to my trustees for paying all my just and lawful debts, deathbed l expenses, and the expense of the executry, including the stamp of ›ry of my personal estate, &c. Second, my trustees shall make over ther Robert the lease of Hallyards for the whole remaining years d also my whole crop, stocking, household furniture, and moveables and my other moveable means and estate, wherever situated, and also es, except what is hereafter specially disposed of, at the sum of £3500 hich he shall be required to pay over to my trustees as soon after my ə and they arrange, and at least within six months; and as this sum, 0 I have now in the bank, will form a capital of £6500, which will l money-fund under the trust, I direct this amount of capital to be f in manner following, viz., my brother Robert shall have the whole £6000 until the youngest son of my brother Dr Andrew Hill attains twenty-one years complete." Now, it was held by a previous judg- his Court that there was here given to Robert Hill a legacy of the the £6000, and that the right thus given to him did not expire at but went to his representatives, and so the interest of the sum was the guardians of Robert Hunter Hill, and applied for his benefit. ert Hunter Hill died in pupillarity, and this event has given rise to ›n whether the accruing interest is heritable or moveable. If it is he first party to this case takes the whole of the accruing interest, but veable, then one-third must go to the mother of the pupil.

naintained for the first party that the right which was in the pupil nter Hill was heritable, because it bore tractum futuri temporis. This ıestion in a somewhat forgotten region of law. It is certain that some ch bear a tract futuri temporis are in law heritable, although in their ›veable. Lord Stair enumerates these rights as reversions, pensions, and I do not think there is any authority for carrying the rule further. ys down the correct principle upon which the rule is founded. He ights which have a tractus futuri temporis are also heritable. These of such a nature that they cannot be at once paid or fulfilled by the ıt continue for a number of years, and carry a yearly profit to the hile they subsist, without relation to any capital sum or stock, e.g. a ıuity or pension for a certain term of years." Now, it is clear that the ımerated by Stair as heritable answer to this description, that they ıt relation to any capital sum or stock,—that is, either belonging to the the creditor in the obligation. The only authority which throws any this position is Bell in his Commentaries, vol. ii. p. 4. He there says, s having a tract of future time, though of a personal nature, and un- with land, are heritable. The precise character of such a right is, periodical and future, the payments not being the mere fruits and s of a capital or principal debt vested in the person who holds the falling to the creditor as periodical payments, independent of each right to each vesting only at the elapse of the successive terms of A right of annuity is a proper example; so is a liferent of a sum; sband's interest in a bond due to his wife, of which the capital is hers, sts only as they accrue being his." Now, Bell here seems to extend the and the case of a husband's interest in a bond due to his wife is very kind of right we are at present considering, viz., interest on a capital ıt Bell is in error in supposing that it has ever been decided that the interest in his wife's bond is a right bearing a tract of future time, itable right. The case of Clunie's Creditors, quoted by Bell, does not ıat. In his Principles, however, Mr Bell expresses himself more In paragraph 1480 he says,—"Rights having a tract of future time ble; such are liferents; also debts giving a periodical right without ılation to a capital sum or principal, as an annuity. It has been sug- at patent rights and copyrights, as having a tract of future time, seem itable. But this has never been decided." Now, in the first part of ge Mr Bell varies the language of the Commentaries, and uses the same as Erskine. The reference to patent rights is not material to the present case, although light is thrown on the subject by the statement of t law in the case of the Advocate-General v. Oswald, 10 D. 969, in wh was decided that patent rights are moveable, and that all accruing pro patent go to the executor. Now, what is said to be heritable in this c the interest of a capital sum, and I am clearly of opinion that it is i of the nature contemplated in the rule. This being so, the second pa case is entitled to one-third of the interest of the £6000.

LORD DEAS.—Without going into the somewhat obscure and abstr of law which relates to rights having a tract of future time, it appears a sufficient solution of the present question is to be found in the ter deed. The testator declares and enjoins that his brother Robert sh funds to the trustees for paying all his (the testator's) just and law deathbed and funeral expenses, and the expense of the executry, inc stamp of the inventory of his personal estate. The deed further pro Robert shall pay over to the trustees £3500, on getting an assignati agricultural lease held by the testator, with the crop and stock and o able estate, and in consideration of what is thus to be done by Robert t directs that Robert shall have the whole interest of £6000 until the son of his brother Dr Andrew Hill attains the age of twenty-one years Accordingly, Lord Jerviswoode, in his interlocutor in the former cas 1866, ante, vol. v. 12) finds with, as it appears to me, entire accur under a sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of th David Hill it was the intention of the truster to bequeath or direct t to make over the whole interest of the sum of £5000 from the term mas 1863, being the term immediately preceding the death of the tru the youngest son of Dr Andrew Hill shall attain the age of twenty-on the now deceased Robert Hill, brother of the truster." Then he "finc said Robert Hill did, in terms of the provision contained in the first the said trust-disposition and settlement, provide funds to meet th debts and others mentioned in the trust-deed to the extent of £1101, or thereby, and paid or arranged for payment of the whole sum of £3(he was required by the truster to pay over to the trustees of the l finds, with reference to the above findings and to the terms of the tru tion and settlement above set forth, that the legacy or provision of t of the sum of £6000" vested in the said Robert Hill on his survival truster. It was with the representative of Robert Hill, and not wi Hill himself, that the question there occurred, and so Lord Jerisw that the whole interest fell to Robert Hill and his executor. I am nc to that judgment as res judicata, but to the grounds of the judgment consider to be those applicable to the present question. In his Jerviswoode goes on to explain,—"It has appeared to the Lord Ord under the sound construction of the deed, when read in relation to tl stances which must be held to have been within the contemplation of in executing it, he intended to make a remuneratory bequest to h Robert, so as in some respects to operate as a compensation to him for den or risk as he might have to undertake in providing funds unde and second purposes of the deed. It is true that there is no declar the interest of the £6000 is to fall to Robert's heirs, but that intere as a whole to Robert, until Dr Andrew Hill's son shall attain twenty special and remuneratory bequest, which Robert was entitled to assign with as his own." Similar views were stated in the Inner-House, p by Lord Ardmillan and myself, and to a certain extent by the Lord There was a de præsenti bequest of the whole interest of this £6000; the whole of that interest immediately became part of Robert's perso and descended to his son. This is conclusive of the matter, without e all into the subject of rights bearing a tract of future time.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have felt much interest in this curious questic I agree with Lord Deas that there is in the deed, looking to the co pon it by the previous decision, enough to guide us, it may perhaps not be o put the case entirely on that footing. I am quite satisfied that by the there was separated from the principal sum a remuneratory bequest of the a interest to Robert; and by the whole interest I mean the right to the s of each periodical payment as it became due, and also the right to the s periodical payments. That is a bequest of the fruits of a principal sum; his it is which brings out a clear difference between this case and that of nuity or pension or other obligations having a tract of future time, without nce to any principal sum. I think it is an obscure and difficult question is the true theory on which these rights and obligations are held to be able, and I am against extending the operation of that rule without nity.

ur Lordship has referred to the case of a patent—Advocate-General v. ld, 20th May 1848. Though the decision is not directly applicable, still ect of rights having a tract of future time was raised in that case. Lord y uses this very clear and plain language,—"Whatever arises de anno in m, as matter of emerging substantive right—without reference to a stock pital—as for example, pension or annuity—has been treated as heritable. where there is a fundamental right of property—if moveable in itself—out e use or application of which profits may or may not be realised, it matters or what length of time such profits may continue to be levied—the herit- or moveable character of the subject is to be settled with reference to the ct itself." Undoubtedly, in this case, the £6000 remained moveable, and nk that its fruits partook of its character, and remained moveable also. nere separation of the interest as a remuneratory bequest to Robert did not e the character of the subject. It is true that interest is not an instalment e principal sum, but where interest is given as a whole, and the whole is ated as having a certain value given as a remuneratory value, I am not that each periodic payment of interest may not be regarded in the light of stalment of that entire sum.

the whole, I think it safest to decline to extend to this case the rule which certain rights having a tract of future time heritable.

RD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the interest on the fund of £6000 disposed of by the settlement of the late David Hill, from the date of the death of Robert Hunter Hill till the £6000 becomes divisible, forms part of Robert Hunter Hill's moveable estate, and that the said interest falls to be divided between the parties to this case in the proportion of two-thirds to the party of the first part and one-third to the party of the second part, and decern: Find the party of the second part entitled to expenses," &c.

TEIND-COURT.
Teind-Clerk.

THE Court, on 18th March 1872, granted authority to the minister the parish of Galashiels to feu certain portions of the glebe at certa minimum rates of feu-duty, and approved of a draft feu-charter.

Within thirty days thereafter Mr Rutherfurd and two other conte minous proprietors, in terms of the 17th section of the Glebe Lands A 1866,* lodged minutes intimating their willingness to purchase certa parts of the glebe adjoining their respective properties, being the wha ground authorised to be feued, at such prices as might be fixed by t Court. The case was, as usual, sent to the Lord Ordinary for inqui and his Lordship remitted to Mr Maitland Wardrop, architect, on wha report the minimum rates of feu-duty had been fixed. Mr Wardrop r turned a report suggesting, not only the prices to be paid by the seve purchasers, but also a number of conditions under which he thought t purchasers should be laid for the minister's benefit. The conditio related to access, water supply, prohibitions against building within certain distance of the new manse, and the like.

To this report the proposed purchasers lodged a note of objections, i which, besides objecting to the conditions in detail, they contended th they were entitled to acquire the subjects without any conditions wha ever, excepting those contained in the draft feu-contract. The Le Ordinary (Gifford) ordered the report and note of objections to be print and boxed, and reported the cause to the Court, expressing an opini adverse to the general contention of the objectors. † ls of the purchasing heritors contend that they are entitled to purchase hout any conditions whatever, excepting those contained in the draft feu-tract.

The Lord Ordinary does not think that this contention is well founded. thinks that the Court have full power to impose on the purchasers any con-ns necessary or proper for the use, comfort, or amenity of the manse, just as minister might have done for himself in laying out the ground extrajudicially feuing and in settling a feuing plan.

But there is considerable difficulty as to the special conditions which it may uld reasonable to impose. The conditions relate—

(1) To a private access proposed to be reserved for the minister through the nd now to be sold to the conterminous heritors.

The Lord Ordinary thinks that this right, though not absolutely necessary, ht fairly be made the subject of arrangement. The proposed private road or n might run between the proposed purchases by the heritors, and would not judice or injure them.

(2) Such private path would be available for drains, and gas, and water s to the new manse, which the reporter explained must almost necessarily through some part of the ground in question.

(3) Right to sink wells in the ground sold for the use of the manse.

The Lord Ordinary thinks that this wide right ought not to be reserved as inst the purchasers. It might seriously prejudice them, and is not necessary the manse, so far as the Lord Ordinary can gather. The utmost which the d Ordinary would be disposed to give would be a right to the manse to draw er from the existing well by which it is at present supplied.

(4) Restrictions against building on the ground to be sold within a certain ance of the manse and manse garden.

The reporter explained that some restriction against building, immediately he north of the new manse, was really necessary for its amenity, and the d Ordinary thinks that a condition to this effect should be imposed on the chaser of the ground immediately to the north of the new manse.

It may be fairly assumed that the minister, in feuing, would take care to serve the amenity of his manse by not feuing for building too close to it, by special conditions. The minister should not be in a worse condition r that the ground is to be absolutely purchased by the conterminous pro-tors.

The Lord Ordinary has only to add, that if the proposed purchasers are to the ground offered for by them respectively free from the conditions sug-ted by Mr Wardrop, then, in fairness, the prices suggested by Mr Wardrop uld be increased, as Mr Wardrop has estimated the prices as fair prices for land burdened with the conditions specified by him. Immunity from these ions will enlarge the value of the lands.

Throughout the discussion the minister very fairly expressed his readi-s to concur in any arrangement which might be thought proper by the rt."

that all conditions and restrictions should be fixed before the conterminous proprietors exercised their right of pre-emption, and this was necessary in order that they might know what they were buying.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The objectors, who are conterminous proprietors, proceeding to exercise the right of pre-emption conferred upon them by the 17th section of the statute, contend that they have bound the minister in a personal contract of sale, just as a railway company binds a heritor by serving a notice upon him under the Lands Clauses Act. I am of opinion that that argument rests upon a false analogy. A sale under the Lands Clauses Act is peculiar. It is self-acting, and does not require the intervention of the Court, nothing being required but the fixing of the price, which is done by the Sheriff and a jury, or by a Court of arbitration. Here the initial step is taken by the minister presenting a petition, and the Court are armed with wide powers, because the minister may have views inconsistent with the ultimate interests of the benefice. On the other hand, conterminous heritors may at any stage appear and object, and besides that, they have the right of pre-emption. But section 17 was not intended to conclude, by the mere lodging of a minute, a contract which might injure the benefice. The heritors' right, therefore, is not absolute, and up to the time when the decree of sale is pronounced it is in the power of the Court to intervene for the protection of the benefice.

LORD BENHOLME.—The objectors here plead their right of pre-emption far too high, especially when they contend that the conditions in the draft feu-charter are to regulate the sale, sale being one thing and feuing another.

LORD NEAVES.—The substitution of sale for feuing requires that the conditions shall be reconsidered. If the minister had been exercising his authority to feu, he must have done so substantially in accordance with the terms of the draft feu-charter, but it is for the Court to say what conditions are applicable to the case of a sale.

LORD JERVISWOODE and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT continued the case for the purpose of allowing parties to consider the terms on which the sale should take place.

2D DIVISION. Lord Mure. I.

The present action was brought by the trustees of the late John uncan, D.D., against Miss Isabella Shand for payment of the sum of 100, and for which sum the defender granted a promissory-note to e said John Duncan, dated 2d February 1869. The note was in the llowing terms:—"Edinburgh, 2d February 1869.—I promise to pay on mand the sum of one hundred pounds sterling, value received.—ISA-BELLA SHAND." The Lord Ordinary ordered a proof before answer as to e possession of the said note, but the Court, on 19th July 1872, held at the note not having the name of the payee was not a valid docu-ent of debt, and pronounced an interlocutor recalling the Lord Ordi-ary's interlocutor, and finding that the debt sued for could be proved ly by the writ or oath of the defender. In consequence of this finding proof was taken before the Lord Justice-Clerk on the 30th of Novem-r, and was confined to writ.

Among the documents put in were the following:—The pretended omissory-note libelled on. A letter sent by the pursuer James Balfour, .S., to the defender on 5th February 1869, in which he says,—"I beg remind you of the arrangement made yesterday, in terms of which you omised either to pay me £50 of the £100 which you got from Dr uncan, or to find security to my satisfaction for the payment of the first 50 within a month, and the second £50 within two months, and this is to be done not later than Monday morning at eleven. We shall lay taking any proceedings against you till that hour." The defender's ply of the same date,—"I called for Mr Barbour to-day to ask him to come my security to Dr Duncan, but unfortunately he was out. Mrs rbour assured me that I should see him to-morrow, when I hope to me to some arrangement with you. I have received your note." The xt document after this was dated 28th December 1871, and was a mand by Messrs Edmonds and Macqueen, the agents for the beneficiaries der the settlement of Dr Duncan, who was then dead, for payment of e promissory-note.

Miss Shand replied on 10th January 1872,—"I am in receipt of your tter of 28th December regarding the £100 I got from Dr Duncan on the d February 1869. Dr Duncan owed my mother and myself a large m, which he called his debt of honour, viz., for aliment and outlay on his behalf for many years when he was entirely without means and in a te of indigence and starvation; this debt Dr Duncan often said he would repay, but he never did so. I wish now to lay my claims before e trustees, and will thank you to do so, or inform me who they are. I uld well go to Dr Duncan and ask a favour, and I assure you I received it as a matter of right and in a spirit of love and friendship, which could nly be understood between two friends in such circumstances. After at passed between Dr Duncan and myself on the subject of this old bt, I request to be informed who handed my promissory-note to the trustees, as Dr Duncan informed me that, to his great grief and surprise, it was removed from his secret repository without his knowledge or con-nt, and handed to Messrs James and Robert Balfour, W.S., who ttempted to seize the £100 from me the day after I received it, and this, of course, without Dr Duncan's knowledge. Dr Duncan also informed me that the £100 I got from him was a deposit for a student, and never would belong to his children or grandchildren, and that I could keep it r ever if I chose to do so, as it would be only a fraction of what he was e to me." On the following day Messrs Edmonds and Macqueen wrote n these terms,—"We received your letter of 10th inst. Had you received rit or oath. A proof by writ has now been led, and the question we have to nsider is whether or not it is sufficient.

The correspondence which has been put in evidence may be explained quite mpetently by the writing referred to, but cannot of itself have the effect of tting up that writing as an obligatory document; and it is incumbent on the nsuers to prove out of the letters so explained some acknowledgment or obli tion in regard to this sum.

I have come to a clear opinion that there is no such proof. The letters int to a very different state of matters. The money was paid to Miss Shand the 2d of February 1869, and on the 5th Mr Balfour, Dr Duncan's agent, rites to her, reminding her of a meeting which had occurred the day before, nd at which she had promised to find security for repayment of the loan. On e same day the defender replies that she had attempted to find a cautioner. ow, Mr Balfour's letters cannot, in a proof by a writ of the defender, be garded as evidence except as explanatory of the defender's letters. But it ems plain that Dr Duncan himself had no intention of taking any security om Miss Shand, and that although Mr Balfour was desirous of changing this satisfactory state of matters apparently Dr Duncan interfered to put a stop to y alteration, for the security was never obtained, and we hear nothing more r the space of nearly two years.

After that time, and after Dr Duncan's death, we find a correspondence be een the defender and the pursuers' agents. Now, the observation which must made on these letters is, that any acknowledgment of receipt of money from Duncan must be taken along with the qualifications which the letters them ves contain. Further, they prove nothing as to the original footing on which Duncan and the defender stood as to alleged loan; and even though they ght instruct a waiver or new obligation to repay on the part of Miss Shand, at is of no consequence here, for that is not the medium concludendi. More er, I am of opinion that there is no proof of any waiver, or of a new obliga n. The defender has confidence in Mr Edmond, who advised her that she s legally bound by the alleged promissory-note; and she accordingly inti ates to him her willingness to pay, "notwithstanding the fact that Dr Duncan id her more than double the sum, and acknowledged that he did so." These alifications take this case out of the category of the authorities cited in the cent case of Spiers. The only proof of receipt of money is by these letters, t they also contain statements that it was received on another footing than at of loan; not indeed in payment of a legal obligation, but in satisfaction of debt of honour, fairly entitling Miss Shand to retain. I think the pursuers ve failed to make out their case.

LORD COWAN.—It is material to remember the position in which the case nds. By interlocutor of 19th July 1872 your Lordships, in reviewing the terlocutor of the Lord Ordinary allowing a proof at large, recalled that inter cutor, and found that "the debt sued for could only be proved by 'writ or ath' of the defender." Therefore we are tied up to the question, whether the leged loan has been proved by the writ of the defender, there having as yet en no reference to oath. This being the only question before the Court, I nnot give much weight in this case to the decisions cited by Mr Trayner,— homson v. Geikie,[1] and Brodie v. Muirhead.[2] The principle established in these ses is that where a writing is produced by the claimant in his favour, to the fect of shewing that money passed from the one party to the other, that, in the sence of explanation, will raise a presumption of loan. But what is the result hen this view is taken of the writing founded on? Parole proof is allowed, to ve the defender an opportunity of rebutting that presumption and the circum nces in which the writing had been given and received. The cases on this int were all before us in the case of Spiers. There the majority were of inion that the document founded on was not of a kind which came under the inciple laid down in Thomson v. Geikie; that, in short, there was no docu-

But these principles have no application to the present case. Had yo ships found that there was a presumption of loan arising from the d produced the case would have been that of Thomson v. Geikie. Wh Lordships found was that the document founded on by the pursuers v and void as an acknowledgment of debt, and therefore, although the C tained the summons, it was held that the alleged loan could only be est by the writ or oath of the defender. The question before us is, wheth is writ of the defender establishing a loan to her by Dr Duncan on 2d F 1869? All the letters and admissions of the defender only come to this that date she got £100 from Dr Duncan. This has never been denie true issue is, whether she got it under an obligation to repay. Your L has said that we cannot look at the document No. 6 of process at all.
tainly cannot look at it as an independent and substantive acknowled the debt. But if the oath of the defender had been resorted to it mi been exhibited to her, and so made part of the deposition. And in like if the letters of the defender had specially referred to this document, have formed part of the proof. But this is not the case, and the lette be judged of from their own contents. Now, in the first place, in lo the letters of the defender, it is a great fallacy to hold that in order t stand these letters, we are not entitled to look at the letters on the othe which they are answers. If the letters on the other side contain s aliunde of the defender's letters, they cannot be used to prove that part contents. But we are perfectly entitled to read them, in order to ge precise meaning of the defender's letters. Again, another principle is ence to the qualifications contained in these letters. The letters are p and said to constitute evidence of the admission of a debt. But if the a is qualified in its essence it must be taken subject to its qualification.
the first point which we decided in the case of Spiers, that the qualifica tained in the admission by the defender in that case could not be go In like manner here the letters which are founded on contain such expl as essentially to destroy the obligatory part of their statements. Wit to the letter of 5th February 1869 the effect seems to be that although was willing to make arrangements with Mr Balfour about the £100 th admission or promise that she was going to pay at that date. She wa sult Mr Barbour, and to ask him to become her security. That does not to an admission that there was a concluded agreement that the transac to be changed into an obligation to repay, with a cautioner.

A single word as to the letters which passed between the defender Edmond after Dr Duncan's death. Mr Edmond had the document s to recover payment, and he writes to Miss Shand proceeding upon missory-note as a formal and binding deed. Miss Shand replies in
"As you hold it to be incumbent on me to pay this sum I must sub

Is that an admission of the constitution of the debt? And so with the subsequent letter of 29th February 1872.

The only issue before us being whether the debt is proved, I am of that no debt is proved.

Lord Benholme.—I have but little to add, as I substantially agree w has fallen from your Lordships. The writing dated 2d February 1869 already found not to be a valid document of debt. On the part of Mi there seems to have been a change of tactics. Immediately after his Duncan had obtained the writing from Miss Shand he seems to have co it his duty to put the matter on a different footing, and at all events some security. But Dr Duncan himself seems to have put a stop to alteration, for no further demand on Miss Shand is made for nearly thr nor till after Dr Duncan's death. Then followed a correspondence Miss Shand and the agents of Dr Duncan's trustees, which is said to c a substantive obligation on the part of the former, for it is plainly impo squent writings to set up an obligation which is ab initio null. Now, I t that the acknowledgment of receipt of money and of indebtedness on the of Miss Shand, which is contained in these letters, is coupled with such ifications as entirely destroy the force of the letters as containing a substanobligation to repay. It is the sacred duty of the Court not to omit or dis-d any part of a written admission; and the true meaning of this correspon-e with Mr Edmond and his firm, especially as brought out in Miss Shand's r of 15th January 1872, was that, as she was advised by Mr Edmond, in n she had confidence, that she was in law indebted to Dr Duncan's trustees r the writing of 2d February 1869, she was willing to make payment, but under protest that nothing was really due by her. No such legal obligaexisted, and no new obligation can be said to have been set up by these n.

ND NEAVES.—The proposition maintained for the pursuers is, that wherhabili modo, the fact is established that money has passed from one party other, that raises an obligation to repay, unless it can be shewn that the y passed on some footing other than loan. I am not aware that any such ine has been ever laid down. A payment of money must be proved scripto.
s are various kinds of writing allowed for this purpose. No better proof

e true proposition is that where the passing of money is proved in certain that will infer a loan. The essence of all these cases in which this has held is, that between the parties a document passed, given by the recipient e payer of the money as a record of the transaction. The doctrine, as re-dly laid down, is, that he who gives to another a document, acknowledging ceipt of money, without qualification or explanation, as a chirographum to eserved against him, infers an obligation to repay. And this obligation s not so much from the document in itself as from its possession by the party. That is the case of Ross v. Fidler,[1] and a whole series of decisions.
e case of Spiers the party getting the money did not give an obligation.
rgument against him was, that he had put his name on a cheque drawn in vour, which proved that he had got the money, and therefore, it was said, elled him to prove that he had not got it in loan. According to this, if I a tradesman a debt which I owe him by a cheque, that infers an obligation st him, unless he can prove the contrary, to repay me. The majority of Court held that there was no document of debt to raise any such presumpthe present case, when did Dr Duncan hold a document which proved pt of money? This promissory-note has been found worth nothing; what-it is, it is not a document of debt. Do the other letters produced prove an pendent loan? Or if they do not prove that, do they convert that promis-note into a good document? Or does it convert them into a good acknow-ment of debt? I cannot give effect to any of these contentions. And I ot help adding that I do not think that we are going against the will of the ued.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the pursuers have failed to prove by the writ of the defender the constitution and resting owing of the debt sued for: Therefore sustain the defences, and assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the summons: Find the defender entitled to expenses; and remit," &c.

Teinds—Valuation—Rental Bolls—Consent of Titular and Heritors.—A sub-commission for the valuation of the teinds in a parish authorised the sub-commissioners to give effect to the practice of payments by rental bolls when the parties consented thereto. In 1629 a report by the sub-commissioners set forth that the parson, who was titular of three-fourths of the teinds of the parish, and tacksman of the remaining fourth, and all the heritors, had consented to the valuation by rental bolls, except the proprietor of the lands of A. The bishop who was titular of the said remaining fourth, was not directly represented.

In an approbation, brought after the lapse of two hundred years, by the proprietor of A, the titular objected to the valuation as having proceeded without the consent of all the titulars and heritors. Held (1) that the titularity had been sufficiently represented by the parson, as titular and tacksman; (2) that the silence of the proprietor of A was not a valid objection to the valuation.

TEIND COURT. Teind Clerk.

THIS was an action of approbation of a sub-valuation of the teinds of the lands of Kenmore, in the parish of Kilmelford and shire of Argyll, brought by Harrison Ainslie and Co., the proprietors of the said lands of Kenmore. The report of the sub-commissioners appointed for valuing the stock and teind of the lands within the presbytery of Argyll was dated 1629, and the teinds of the lands of Kenmore were therein valued by rental bolls. At the date of this valuation the Bishop of Argyll was titular of one-fourth of the teinds of the parish, and the Crown had since acquired his right.

The Officers of State opposed the approbation, and pleaded;—(1) The report of the sub-commissioners was invalid, in respect that neither the heritor to whom the lands of Kenmore belonged, nor the titular consented to the valuation of the lands, according to the rental bolls in use to be paid. (2) The report was invalid, in respect the Bishop of Argyll, titular of one-fourth of the teinds, was not called as a party.[1]

The sub-commission, in directing effect to be given to the practice of payment by rental bolls, bore,—"And which rental of teind by the space of fourtie years in victuall nearhand the just avail both parties agree, and none oppose against the samen." The report of the sub-commissioners bore,—"Findes and declares that the land underwrettin perteining to the personnes afterspe'it within the parochyne of Kilmelphoirt hes payed in tyme bygane, payes p'ntly worth and may pay for the p'sonage and great teynd thereof as ane constant rent yeirlie in tyme coming the particulare rentalled teynd boll afterspe'it," &c. . . . . PRESIDENT.—There are two pleas upon which we have now to decide. e the first and second pleas stated for the Officers of State in the paper dated 13th March 1866. They involve the proposition that the report b-commissioners is invalid, because, while it professes to give the valua- he teinds according to rental bolls in use to be paid, it does not bear to ıpon the consent of the titular and the heritors, and because the Bishop l, who was titular of one-fourth of the teinds, was not called. The ıe sub-commission which directs effect to be given to rental bolls is a rwardly expressed,—"And which rental of teinds by the space of fourtie victuall nearhand the just availe both parties agree, and none oppose he samen." The construction which the Officers of State put upon this t is not competent to give effect to a practice of paying by rental bolls, ere be a positive agreement by all parties. I think this is too strict, and ther clauses of the commission have not been subjected to the same strict- onstruction. If there has been an agreement by the parties truly in- that is sufficient. The silence of one of the heritors will not render the ineffectual after it has been allowed to stand for a long time. The nissioners report that 40 bolls are the actual value of the teinds, "as it ds;" and further that the patron, and Colin Campbell, the parson, who as titular to three-fourths of the teinds and to the other fourth as , and the heritors, with the sole exception of Neil Campbell of Kend- eed to the valuation. They were all of one mind that 40 bolls repre- e true value of the teinds. The difference that it has not been presented till after a long time a worse objection. I think, therefore, that it is bad on the face of it, ls no good ground for refusing to approve of the sub-valuation. The f the titular, or rather of the owner of a portion of the titularity, for one-fourth of the teinds which were held by the bishop, is the other . Now, I do not know that it is necessary for us to decide that a by sub-commissioners may be good although the titular be not a party, may state that I think it has already been decided by the case of Thom- case of Pringle is a still higher authority to the same effect. Succession—Mutual Disposition—Revocation.—A person having purchased certain subjects took the disposition to himself and his wife in conjunct fee and liferent, for her liferent use allenarly, and to himself and his heirs and assignees in fee. Thereafter the husband and wife executed a mortis causa disposition containing the following clause:—"Reserving always to us during our joint lives our own liferent right and use of the premises, with full power to us at any period during our joint lives to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part." Held that the husband, being absolute fiar under the first deed, was entitled to revoke the mutual disposition after his wife's death.

Succession — Conditional Institution — Substitution.—A person conveyed a heritable subject to his children "equally among them, and the lawful issue of their bodies, and failing any of them by death, without lawful issue of their bodies, to the survivors equally." Held that this was a conditional institution of the grandchildren, and not a substitution.

1ST DIVISION. B.

JAMES BROWN, merchant in Dundee, was infeft in the following properties:—1. Subjects in Couttie's Wynd, Dundee, in virtue of a disposition to himself and his wife, Isobel Maiden, in conjunct fee and liferent for her liferent use allenarly, and to himself in fee; and (2) Subjects in the Cowgate of Dundee, in virtue of a disposition to himself.

On 23d August 1821 the spouses granted this disposition of the subjects in Couttie's Wynd:—"We, considering it to be our duty in our own lifetime to settle our affairs in such a manner as to prevent all disputes after our death, have resolved to grant these presents in manner underwritten. Therefore, and for other good and onerous causes, we do hereby give, grant, assign, and dispone to and in favour of Janet Brown and Isobel Brown, our daughters, equally between them, and the survivor of them in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and to their heirs in fee, all and whole." The deed contained the following clause:—"Reserving always to us during our joint lives our own liferent right and use of the premises, with full power to us at any period during our joint lives to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents in whole or in part; to sell, alienate, and dispone the subjects and effects hereby conveyed, in any manner we may think proper."

Mrs Brown having died in 1825, James Brown, on 29th July 1828, executed another disposition in the following terms:—"I, James Brown, weaver in Dundee, for the love, favour, and affection which I have and bear to my sons and daughters after named, do hereby give, grant, assign, and dispone to and in favour of Janet Brown, spouse of Archibald Young, and Isobel Brown, both my daughters, equally betwixt them and the survivor of them in liferent, for their liferent use only, but excluding the jus mariti, &c., and to the lawful children of the said Janet Brown and Isobel Brown equally amongst them, declaring that the children of the said Janet Brown and Isobel Brown respectively shall have right only to the share which would have belonged to their mothers, whom failing, to the heirs or assignees of the said Janet Brown and Isobel Brown respectively in fee, all and whole" the Couttie's Wynd subjects.

In 1831 James Brown granted the following disposition of the subjects in Cowgate:—"I, James Brown, do hereby give, grant, assign, and dispone to and in favour of William Brown, James Brown, and Peter Brown, my sons, and Margaret Brown, Isobel Brown, and Janet Brown or Young, spouse of Archibald Young, clock and watch-maker in Dundee, my es due and payable furth of the subjects before conveyed, but ıll, burden, or otherwise dispose of their shares of said subjects

'es, for onerous or gratuitous causes."

Brown died on 2d February 1832, being survived by five childıree of these died without having any issue.

Brown, one of the children of James Brown, married Archibald nd died intestate in 1837, leaving five children. Of these James
'as served as heir to his mother. James Young being abroad, Stiven, accountant, was appointed his factor loco absentis.

Brown jun., the son of the disponer, survived, and made up a ıeir to the subjects in question. He thereafter, by trust-disposisettlement, disponed the subjects to trustees.

ım Stiven, the factor for James Young, brought the present action
ɜ the title made up by James Brown jun., and his trust-disposition, ljudge. The defenders were the trustees of James Brown jun., four remaining children of Mrs Janet Brown or Young.

ıursuer pleaded;—3. The several shares of the said subjects by the pursuer being still in hæreditate jacente of the said Janet r Young, and the said James Young being nearest lawful heir of ı to her under the different deeds above set forth, the pursuer, as r loco absentis, is now entitled to complete his title thereto by r otherwise in habili modo. 4. The pursuer, as factor loco absentis is entitled to make up a title in the person of his ward to the indiviso shares of the said heritable subjects which were conveyed id Janet Brown or Young, but which have been included in the the said deceased James Brown jun.

and assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the libel, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses, of which allows an account," &c.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and after hearing counsel the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor in hoc statu; and on the condition of the pursuer paying to the defenders the expenses incurred by them since the date of the reclaiming note, sist process, and give the pursuer an opportunity of amending his title or expeding another title, as he may be advised."

Thereafter the parties gave in a minute stating that they had agreed that the case should be decided on the footing that the objections to the service of the pursuer were not to be insisted in.

The pursuer argued;—The deed of 1821, conveying the Couttie's Wynd subjects, being a mutual deed by James Brown sen. and his wife, could not have been revoked by the subsequent deed of 1829, executed by James Brown after his wife's death. As in right of his mother, James Young was entitled to one-half pro indiviso of these subjects. In virtue of the

* "NOTE.—. . . . . (2) The ground on which the pursuer claims, as loco absentis to James Young, the one-half part or share of the subjects in Spalding's or Couttie's Wynd, Dundee, is that James Young has right thereto as heir of provision to his mother, under the mutual disposition and settlement of James Brown sen., and Isobel Maiden, his wife, dated 23d August 1821. As regards this claim also, James Young has, on the assumption on which it is made, no title to sue, not having expede any service to vest in him the person right conveyed by that deed to his mother. But there is a more formidable objection to his claim. The disposition and settlement of 1821 was superseded and revoked by the disposition and settlement executed by James Brown sen. on 29th July 1829; and the subjects were thereby conveyed to Janet Brown and Isobel Brown in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and to the lawful children of the said Janet Brown and Isobel Brown respectively, equally among them, in fee. The pursuer contended that it was incompetent in James Brown sen. to revoke the mutual settlement of 1821. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that James Brown sen. was entitled to do so, because the settlement of 1821 was not a mutual remuneratory deed between the spouses, and because the destination of the subjects remained, notwithstanding its execution, entirely within the control of James Brown sen., the proprietor thereof.

"(3) The pursuer insists in this action, in so far as regards the subjects in the Cowgate of Dundee, on the ground that James Young has right to one-fifth part thereof, as heir of provision to his mother, Mrs Janet Brown or Young, under a disposition and deed of settlement of James Brown sen., dated 6th December 1831. Even if this claim were founded upon a correct construction of that deed, James Young cannot, in hoc statu, insist in this claim, as he has not completed his title as heir of provision. But there is a more formidable objection to his claim, founded on the terms of the settlement. By that deed Mr Brown conveyed the subjects to his six children nominatim 'equally among them, and the lawful issue of their bodies, and failing any of them by death, without lawful issue, to the survivors equally, their heirs and assignees.' James Brown sen. died last seised and infeft in the said subjects. His daughter, Mrs Janet Brown or Young, never completed her title to her share thereof. The destination by the settlement is to her lawful issue, and it vests, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, the one-fifth share destined to Mrs Janet Brown or Young and her issue, in her whole children equally. He considers that the term 'issue' is synonymous with the terms 'bairns' and 'children,' and that the whole children of Janet Brown or Young are thereby designed—Carnegie, 13th Feb. 1677, Dict. 12,840; Herries, 26th Nov. 1806, Hume's Dec. 528; Wilson, 14th June 1811, Hume's Dec. 534; Waddell v. he property in Couttie's Wynd, thereby conveyed, as heir-at-law of his Irs Janet Brown or Young. Now, undoubtedly, he would be entitled n if the deed of 1821 stands unrevoked by that of 1829. The only therefore, with regard to this claim of the pursuer is, whether this ed of 1821 was effectually revoked by the subsequent deed executed Young's grandfather, James Brown, on 29th July 1829. No doubt of 1821 was a mutual deed, though it is not so called in the deed
; there is a mutual disposition, and there are two parties to the deed, own on the one hand, and Isobel Maiden, his wife, who concurred; two dispone certain subjects, including those now in dispute, to their
, Janet Brown and Isobel Brown, equally between them, and the sur-hem in liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and to their heirs in fee.
ous, however, that if one only of two parties to a mutual disposition of is in right of the property disponed, the fact of the other having con-the disposition will not give that party any right to the subject, unless words of contract in the deed by which such a right is properly and ly created. In this deed there are no words expressive of such a conould disable the real proprietor from exercising all his rights over these nothing of that sort appears except that the names of the spouses are in the disposition. When we look at the state of the title, it is be-question that the fee of these subjects was the individual and particular of the husband. It stood in his person upon an infeftment proceeding conveyance in June 25, 1816, "to and in favour of the said James nd Isobel Maiden, his wife, in conjunct fee and liferent, for her liferent arly, and to the said James Brown, his heirs and assignees whomsoee." Under that conveyance, and infeftment following thereon, there the slightest doubt that James Brown was the absolute fiar, and that rn's right was a bare liferent. In such circumstances it may have been point of form that she should concur, but it was not necessary, and such ence can never constitute a contract to give the liferentrix a higher n was hers under the conveyance and infeftment. I am clearly of hat the deed of 1821 was a testamentary and revocable deed, and was y revoked by James Brown's subsequent deed in 1829, and, therefore, pursuer's claim cannot prevail on this point.

e pursuer lays claim to one-fifth part of a second class of subjects; and n depends upon the construction of a deed of 1831 executed by the only to uplift and discharge the rents due from their shares of these subj also to sell, burden, or otherwise dispose of their shares of the subjects. is no positive rule settled in law, as far as I know, for the construction of this kind—no technical rule at all events—and, therefore, we must what was the meaning and intention of the maker. The defender's co is that this constitutes an institution of each and all of the testator's c and that their issue are substituted to them. Now, I never met with tion as a result of such words as these. Upon reading them first, wha veyed to one's mind is that this is conditional institution. It was natu the possible predecease of some of his children should be in the conte of the maker of this testamentary writing, and that provision should for that event. This seems to have been well done here if we read thi as importing a conditional institution,—that is to say, if we take it as —"I convey to my children or the lawful issue of their bodies, if the cease me, and to the survivors if any predecease without issue, and to th i.e., to the heirs and assignees of the disponees." I think this appli whole class of persons mentioned in the dispositive clause of the deed.

But another and still more favourable view may be taken from a consi of the succeeding clause which I have alluded to. When a testator substitution, he no doubt leaves the first institute dominus of the prope the estate is open to the diligence of the institute's creditors. Still, he wish to incite the institute to defeat the substitution. I have never s done. But it is clear here that, supposing he had meant substitution, incite his daughters, the institutes, to defeat the substitution by provid without their husbands' consent they shall be entitled to sell, burden, wise dispose of their shares of the subjects disponed. He has cut off the the husbands, who might have interfered in the interest of children, an created every facility for defeating the supposed substitution. That, makes this second point clear—that conditional institution, and not subs was the disponer's intention. Apart from this last consideration, ho think the matter quite beyond dispute, that, on a construction of the conveyance, conditional institution must be inferred. I am, therefore, f ing in substance to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

The other Judges concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find that the disposition dated 23d August 1821, made and gra James Brown sen. and his spouse, was validly and eff revoked by the disposition executed by the said deceased Brown sen. on 29th July 1829; and therefore find that t suer is not entitled to one-half pro indiviso of the subj Couttie's Wynd, Dundee, in terms of the said disposition c but reserving his right and interest in the said subjects un said disposition of 1829: Find that the pursuer is entitled fifth part pro indiviso of the subjects in the Cowgate of conveyed and settled by the disposition executed by the s ceased James Brown sen. on 6th December 1831, togeth the rents thereof, from the death of the said James Bro on 2d February 1833, so far as received by the said defe their constituent, the said James Brown jun.: . . . . Messrs Kimball and Morton appealed to the Sheriff (Glassford Bell), who adhered to the decision of his Substititute in the following interlocutor, which states the result of the proof:—"Finds that the question at issue substantially is, whether the pursuers are entitled to be protected in the exclusive use of the word 'Singer' as a trade mark, designating a particular description of sewing machine made and sold by them, or whether the defenders, being admittedly entitled to make and sell sewing machines of the same description as the 'Singer,' are at liberty to offer such machines to the public as 'Singer' sewing machines, manufactured by the defenders themselves: Finds that the individual pursuer, Isaac Memitt Singer, who is a partner of the pursuers' company, seems to have been the inventor, about twenty years ago, of the machine called the 'Singer,' and to have sent it into the market from the first as the 'Singer': Finds that the pursuers, the Singer Manufacturing Company, of New York, have been in existence since 1863, and no other makers of sewing machines gave out to the public that they made 'Singer' sewing machines till the defenders did so in March 1870, soon after which the present action of interdict was raised against them: Finds that the machine sold by the pursuers as the 'Singer' was never patented either in this country or America, but certain principles or processes which were applied in the construction of the machine were patented in America, and these patents have all expired: Finds that the pursuers' 'Singer' machine has not been always the same in construction, but has been improved from time to time, and has obtained such reputation that they now dispose of about 180,000 annually: Finds that the defenders, prior to March 1870, introduced a sewing machine of similar construction to the 'Singer,' which they sold as the 'Lion;' but finding that it did not succeed under that name, they then announced that they made and sold the 'Singer': Finds that it is in evidence that various parties believed that no 'Singer' machine was made except by the pursuers, and that when they bought a 'Singer' they took it for granted that it was the pursuers' manufacture, understanding, in the words of one of the witnesses, that 'the name "Singer" was used to signify the manufacturer and not the machine': Finds that there is no averment in the record that the pursuers had made any unfair or fraudulent representation regarding the sewing machines sold by them calculated to mislead the public, and so to bar the pursuers' title to complain of any infringement of their right; but finds that even if the objection were open, which at the debate before the Sheriff it was contended to be, there is no evidence of any such unfair dealing by the pursuers: Finds, in point of law, that the name of the manufacturer of a particular article, if the name be ab initio attached to the article with the view of distinguishing it from all others, and if for a succession of years it be sold exclusively by the manufacturer, or parties in his right, under that name, may become property as a trade mark, and though third parties may be entitled to manufacture and sell the same article they are not entitled to do so under the said name, seeing that they may thereby mislead the public, and this is a fortiori the case when the person using the name of the original manufacturer is himself of a different name: Finds that, in the whole circumstances of the present case, the pursuers have such property in the name 'Singer,' and are entitled to the interdict craved: Therefore, and under reference to the annexed note, dismisses the appeal, and adheres to the interlocutor appealed against."*

n the recent case of Wotherspoon against Currie, decided in the House of rds on 19th April last.[1] In both of these cases it was the use of the name of a ce (Glenfield) by a rival maker of starch that was interdicted, and here the rdict is sought against the use by the defenders of the name of a person as scriptive of a sewing machine made by the pursuers, and by which it has ays been distinguished. In the former cases the starch was actually made Glenfield by the defenders, who had premises there, but this was held not be sufficient, for, in the words of Lord Westbury, 'long antecedent to the erations of the defendant the word "Glenfield" had acquired a secondary sigfication or meaning in connection with a particular manufacturer; and, in short, d become a trade denomination of the starch made by the plaintiff. The word Glenfield" therefore, as a denomination of starch, had become the property of e plaintiff. It was his right and title in connection with starch, and the quesn was, had the property been invaded by the defendants?' Here, in like manr, the word 'Singer,' long before the operations of the defenders, had acquired signification in connection with particular manufacturers, viz., the pursuers, d the word, therefore, as the denomination of a sewing machine, had become eir property. In the case of Burgess, 3 De Gex, Mac. and G., p. 896, it was marked on the bench that 'where a person is selling goods under a particular me, and another person not having that name is using it, it may be presumed at he so uses it to represent the goods sold by himself as the goods of the pern whose name he uses.' It was ingeniously argued here for the defenders that there were no patent rights involved there was nothing to prevent any one aking a 'Singer' sewing machine, and selling it under that name. But whilst e first portion of this proposition may be true, the second is fallacious. The fenders may no doubt make sewing machines, as similar to the 'Singer' as posble, but they are not entitled to sell them as 'Singers,' because so far from that me having been a name universally acknowledged as generic in the trade, it is, the contrary, a name which has all along been appropriated by the pursuers, d which the public has been taught to associate exclusively with them. On is ground injunctions have been passed in England against persons selling pills Holloway's (Bevan's Reports, vol. 53, p. 209), or blacking as Day and Mar's (Tudor's Leading Cases, p. 482), even although they were so sold by a bona de Holloway or Day and Martin, but not the original vendors, whose pills and lacking had acquired a celebrity under their names. The simple rule is that a ader who, in ordinary circumstances, might be quite entitled to use a particular ark or name, cannot be allowed to adopt it if that would cause the goods to ear the same name that has already been appropriated by a rival trader, d which had not been in general use previously, or was a term of such comon application as to be patent to all. The distinction indeed hinges on this st consideration. In the Scotch case of Robert Wotherspoon and Co. v. Gray d Co., November 10, 1863,[2] it was held that the pursuers were not entitled to n interdict against the defenders using wrappers having on them the words 'Gray and Co.'s Victoria lozenges,' merely because the pursuers had previously en in the habit of selling lozenges in wrappers having the words 'Wotherspoon d Co.'s Victoria lozenges.' The Court thought that as it was quite a common ing to apply the name 'Victoria' to all sorts of goods, such as shawls, perfumery, d fancy articles, the first application of the name to an article well known in e trade gave no exclusive right to the party using it, and that Gray and Co.'s Victria lozenges would never be mistaken for those of Wotherspoon and Company. t it is clear that the word 'Singer' is of a much less broad and generic aracter, and was never applied to distinguish any article of commerce till the nsuer applied it to a sewing machine, and all the concomitant circumstances e unfavourable to the defenders. Whether the judgment of Vice-Chancellor hesitation by the House of Lords. Neither is the judgment very re with that of Millington v. Fox, Tudor's Leading Cases, p. 487, where, it was proved that the terms 'Crowley' and 'Crowley Middleton' were used as descriptive merely of particular qualities of steel, their use b fendant was interdicted at the instance of a plaintiff who had always words on his trade mark. In short the following sentence of the Lord lor in the well known case of Seixo, January 1866, 1 Chancery Appeal seems to embody the essence of the law on the subject:—'If the g manufacturer have, from the mark or device he has used, become kno market by a particular name, I think that the adoption by a rival trad mark which will cause his goods to bear the same name in the market i much a violation of the rights of that rival as the actual copy of hi Now, the pursuers' trade mark, as may be seen on 23/32, 38/27, and vari productions, describes them as the 'Singer Manufacturing Company,' the defenders have done is to announce that they are as much a 'Singe facturing company as the pursuers, and that they supply, not the 'Lio other sewing machine made on the same principle as the 'Singer,' but 'Singers.' This, in the first place, does not seem upon the proof to b for at least the materials used are frequently different; but in the next Currie was not allowed to announce that he sold Glenfield starch, thou actually made at Glenfield because another party had previously app the name, why should the defenders, who have no connection with an or place of the name of 'Singer' be allowed to neutralise the pursue mark, and lead the unwary into the belief that they might purchase fr a machine with which no other name than that of the pursuers was ev connected, and which they might naturally suppose was made by them not enough that the defenders simultaneously publish that their 'Sin made by themselves; so did Currie and Company regarding the sta point of fact, they have not 'Singer' machines to sell any more than t Holloway's pills, or Day and Martin's blacking; they have only Kim Morton's, and they cannot be allowed to sail with them under the colours.

"In Mr Upton's valuable treatise on the law of trade marks will 1 a succinct digest and review of nearly all the authorities on the subject, and American, and as the result of the whole the author lays down the proposition as law, which appears to be entirely applicable to the presen 'That the honest, skilful, and industrious manufacturer, or enterprising m who has produced or brought into the market an article of use or consump has found favour with the public, and who, by affixing to it some nam device, or symbol, which serves to designate it as his, and to distinguis all others, has furnished his individual guaranty and assurance of the qu integrity of his manufacture, shall receive the just reward of his honesty, industry or enterprise, and shall, in no manner, and to no extent, be de the same by another who, to that end, appropriates and applies to his pro the same or a colourable imitation of the same name, mark, device, or sy that the public are or may be deceived or misled into the purchase of ductions of the one supposing them to be those of the other.'"

that it becomes in a certain sense the property of a particular individual pany in that trade, or, in other words, becomes the trade mark of that ind or company; and if the evidence of that appropriation of the name to de the manufacture of a particular manufacturer is clearly made out, it is good a trade mark, and one as exclusively and effectually appropriated t as if it were a trade mark not consisting of a word at all, but of some pa device in drawing. We had not very long ago in this Court a case illustrated very well the general rule as applicable to trade marks—the Dixon v. Jackson, Jan. 29, 1867, ante, vol. v. p. 326, in which Mr Di Govan, or rather his trustees, complained that whereas a certain quality c iron was always marked "Govan" with a star, another trader had n marked his iron with the name of the place where it was manufactured star added, and they complained of his use of the star as an innovation o trade mark. That case did not come to ultimate judgment, but it was ver ously considered upon the question of interim interdict, and the Court g an interim interdict upon the ground that there was a prima facie case of i tion of a trade mark, leaving it to be established upon the passing of th that the star had been so appropriated by Mr Dixon of Govan as exclusiv represent his peculiar make of iron as distinguished in the trade from any But whether it be a star or any other device, or a name, as in the present the result is the same. If it be exclusively appropriated for a series of and has obtained a certain exclusive meaning in the trade, as signifyi goods or the productions of a particular manufacturer, then it is his prop a trade mark, and no one else is entitled to use it. Now, it appears to m for a series of years, and certainly I think back to the year 1863, as aver the petition, everybody in the trade has understood that a Singer machi Singer sewing machine is a sewing machine manufactured by the Singer facturing Company. I think that is the fair result of the evidence. hardly been denied that for that period the fact has been so. But then ence is made to an earlier period in the history of the use of this word, as ing that the meaning thus acquired by the word Singer arose from false sentations made by Mr Singer, and afterwards by the Singer Manufac Company, or some other company that preceded them, as to the right Singer as having a patent or patents which enabled him, for a time at exclusively to manufacture what was called the Singer machine. Now, no Mr Isaac Singer, who appears to be still a partner of this company, so fa as 1852, was under the impression that he had made an original inventio he expected to obtain a patent for it, but in that he was disappointed. It out that the straight needle with vertical action, which he conceived t novelty invented by himself, had been anticipated in other sewing ma and the consequence was that he did not obtain a patent for that. It ap however, that he went on to manufacture the article which he thought s was an invention of his own, and that in the course of that manufact effected various improvements on it, for some of the details of which he di ceed in obtaining patents. But I am not prepared to say that there evidence in this case to shew that either Mr Singer or any person associate him in business committed any fraud in the way of holding out to the that they held patents which they did not hold. I do not think there is su evidence of that, or that the use of the word Singer, as applicable to ma made by him and his company, was caused by their false representations of rights belonging to him. On the contrary, it rather appears to me that t of the name grew up and matured just in consequence of Mr Singer and connected with him in business having constantly gone on making this h machine which he thought originally was a novelty, and improving it in kind of way that occurred to them in the progress of their business. It that way, I apprehend, that the name "Singer" came to have what is n established meaning, and I cannot see that there is anything in the hist that appropriation of the name to prevent the Singer Manufacturing Co now from asserting right to it as their trade mark. It is said, no doubt, part of the defender, that to interdict him and all other manufacturers of s ry fresh witness seems to give a different account, and at last it all ith this, I think, that one of the defenders' witnesses, a Mr Thoms, he is asked what is the Singer principle—"A machine made on the ciple is one made in imitation of the pursuers';" so that the only ıat is involved in the making of Singer machines by persons other ırsuers is, that they simply imitate as far as they can the machines

.e pursuers. Now, this is plainly no principle at all in the only sense he statement can be available to the defenders. If the defenders' re called Singers, and if they imitate both the thing and the name, ıre doing the very thing complained of, and the very thing the purɛntitled to complain of. But the supposed hardship in not being use the name of "Singer," because no other word, or at least no ; form of expression, will sufficiently convey the idea that they make achines upon this principle, is not very credible, when one comes to › fact that for a long series of years prior to 1870 nobody felt such ınce from the want of the use of the name "Singer" as to try to make It was left entirely to the use of the pursuers. Other people were wing machines of all kinds, and, I have no doubt, were making sewing like the Singer, or as like them as any machines could be made, but lled them Singers, because it was just as easy to describe the machines ›ther way and to recommend them in some other way. Nay, the themselves, during the first three years that they carried on business left the pursuers' employment, never used this name of Singer, and yet ; manufacturing and offering to sell every kind of sewing machines, and ıestionably manufacturing machines very like the Singers at all events, ere not identical with those that were at the same time being manufac-the pursuers; so that down to 1870, nobody, not even the defenders s, experienced any evil from not using the name of "Singer" as deof one portion of their manufacture. This is so very clear in point of it is quite needless to refer to the evidence further than to say that the Mr Morton, himself confesses very candidly that prior to 1870 nobody ıited Kingdom used the name of Singer except the pursuers' company.
; to me, therefore, that the first averment upon which the petition for is founded is quite satisfactorily established. But, then, the pursuers averred—and it is quite necessary for their case that they should do ground for such an application. Now, how does the matter stand here? There can be no doubt that Messrs Kimball and Morton are very desirous, as they express it, to break down the American monopoly enjoyed by the pursuers, and to make and sell Singer machines, the name being a great favourite with the public. They want to make and sell Singer machines, because the name is a very taking one, and because the name "Singer" carries off machines, and produces a greater sale than any other name going; and accordingly, while they do not in direct terms profess that they are selling machines made by the pursuers, they do say they are selling Singer machines. No doubt they also state that they are making them—that is quite true—but if they did not state that, and did not prove that they could make them and make them well, of course they would not succeed in extending their business. Their great object is to be known in this trade as people who make as well as sell Singer machines, and if they did not succeed in that they would not succeed in their object. But the question comes to be whether they are entitled to use this word "Singer" merely because they say that they are themselves the makers of the machines which they so christen. Now, in one point of view, that is certainly not representing to the public that the machines which they sell are made by the pursuers. It is not so direct a misrepresentation as that, but that is just the thing that is complained of in this action, namely, the use of the term "Singer," which with the public carries a certain guarantee of excellence in the machine that is sold, and the appropriation of which, therefore, by the defenders is an invasion of the pursuers' trade mark. We have not any very direct evidence before us of persons who have been actually deceived or misled by what is done. There was one example referred to in the person of the name of Cole, but the pursuers have not taken much trouble to lead evidence of that kind, and I think they were justified in refraining from doing so. It is difficult evidence to procure, and would unquestionably have extended the bulk of this proof, bulky enough as it is, to a much greater extent; but they rest upon this, that what these defenders are doing in christening their machines of their own manufacture with the name of "Singer" is calculated to injure the business of the pursuers by the use of the trade mark which is exclusively appropriated to them, and that, I confess to my mind, is quite sufficient. I do not think it is necessary that they should go the full length of their statement when they say that this has been done with the object and effect of leading and inducing the public to believe that the machines are manufactured by the said company. It is sufficient to my mind if it is calculated to have that effect; and that it is calculated to have that effect is certainly a most reasonable conclusion from the evidence that is before us. Upon the whole matter, then, I am of opinion that the interlocutors of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute are well founded, and ought to be adhered to.

Lord Deas.—It is not disputed by the defenders that since 1863 the pursuers have been and still are selling sewing machines under the name of Singer machines or Singer sewing machines. The only defence pleaded is that the name "Singer," or "Singer machines," or "Singer sewing machines," is not understood or intended to mean machines made by Singer and Company, but is used and understood to mean, machines of a particular construction such as are made by Singer and Company. Consequently the main contention both of Mr Macdonald and the Lord Advocate, very properly, was that the import of the proof, taken in connection with the statements and representations of the pursuers, is that the name "Singer" designates not the maker but the construction. Now, there do seem to be some peculiarities in the construction of the machines made by the Singer Company, and the pursuers have themselves represented very strongly that there are such. But assuming this to be so, the question, I think, still remains, Is it these peculiarities of construction which the name "Singer machine" is used to denote, or is it that the machines are made by the Singer Company?

Now, it appears to me that the burden of the proof goes to instruct that although there are peculiarities in the construction of these machines, the substantial thing which the name describes, and the consequent weight the name

next question is, whether in using that name the defenders have for the purpose of increasing their own sale and diminishing the the pursuers, and to the probable loss and injury of the pursuers. It t be necessary, however, to prove that that was their object, if it that such has been the effect. At same time, it is scarcely conceivable was not their object, for Mr Morton, the defender, says—"We thought entitled to use the word 'Singer,' as we followed the same principles, used it to increase our trade." And how could it increase their trade, by representing that these machines were Singer machines? No doubt ntage of that might occur in either of two ways—either because the s made by the defenders were of the same construction, or because they de by the same makers. But then if the result of the proof be, as I is, to shew that what so enabled the defenders to increase their trade belief of purshasers that these machines were made by the Singer Com- at fact is conclusive upon that point.

not think it necessary, in this case, to go much into the question of a reasonable apprehension of injury will entitle a party to an interdict. re many cases in which that will very clearly be so,—cases of apprehen- ersonal injury, or of danger to life, or of great and perhaps irreparable loss ain thing is allowed to go on. There are cases of that kind, in which there o doubt that a reasonable apprehension is enough, and I do not say that, in this kind, a reasonable apprehension that the pursuers might suffer great what they complain of was allowed to go on might not be sufficient; t I do say is that it is not necessary to go upon that doctrine here, the proof seems to me, beyond all question, to shew that there is, and n, loss and injury to the pursuers in their trade by this assumption of de mark or trade name. If we had been in an action of damages, it ave been necessary to have had specific instances, and to have brought ies who bought the machines to say whether they were imposed upon; sort of particularity is not necessary in order to enable us to arrive at lt that there ought to be an interdict. We may not have the materials rtaining what the damage was, but I think we have here abundance of s for being satisfied, taking the whole evidence together, that the defenders by using this name, and that the pursuers did lose in consequence. ngly, I am entirely of opinion, with your Lordship, and the Sheriffs in t below, that it is proved that the name of Singer had been adopted or by the Singer Manufacturing Company. It is not proved that the name indicated any special peculiarity in principle or construction.

With the natural eagerness of competitors, and the usual complacency manufacturers, it seems that the respondents, Singer and Company, have, different times, and in language copious and complimentary, described machine as marvellous in point of invention, as well as matchless in point construction. But, after reading all the proof, I have formed a clear opini that the name "Singer" has been applied and recognised by the public and the trade, not primarily and mainly as denoting any particular principle or pe liarity of construction in the machine, but as denoting the fact that they w made by Mr Singer or by Singer and Company. To give his own name to machine which he made himself was natural and legitimate; and as the ma facture was a great success, the public accepted the name, and the trade rec nised it as a distinctive and well-understood designation. To the public name was a designation; to the maker, a trade mark. I may mention that th is clearly instructed by the testimony of M'Kellar, p. 31; Stirling, p. Hunting p. 34; Stockwell, p. 35; Huxley, p. 37; Hunt, p. 39; Nicoll, p. whose testimony is clear and important; Tait, p. 43; Woodruff, p. 65; Fothergill, p. 67. These are witnesses for Singer and Company. But one the witnesses for the appellants, Kimball and Morton—a Mr Parker—p. says, "by a Singer machine I understood a machine made by the Singer C pany." On this point there is no doubt.

An invention is protected by a patent. When the patent has expired protection is gone. But a maker's name cannot be assumed by another with a deception and a wrong. Here it is the name that is assumed. In this of the facts I have no difficulty in finding sufficient foundation for adhering the interlocutor of the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute, both of whom h stated their views clearly and ably, unless there is some rule of law opposed the pleas of the manufacturers.

If it be true, as I think it is, that the name of "Singer," being that of manufacturer, was known and understood in the trade as denoting the mach which he manufactured, then the use of that name, by applying it to a com ing and rival machine not made by Singer, is, in my opinion, a usurpation a wrong. The authorities referred to by the Sheriffs are most important, p ticularly the case of Wotherspoon v. Currie (the Glenfield starch case), and th case of Seixo, decided by Lord Chancellor Hatherley in 1866 (1 Chan. App 192), and the case of Ainsworth v. Walmesly in 1866, decided also by the noble and learned Lord.[1] These are a body of weighty and appropriate authority The only authority apparently adverse is the case of Wheeler and Wilson, November 1869 (Law Jour., Ch. Rep., vol. xxxix. p. 36). If that decision considered apart from the special circumstances of the case, and if it is urged opposed to the decision in the case of Wotherspoon, I must, with the greate respect for Vice-Chancellor James, hold that the more recent judgment of th House of Lords in the case of Wotherspoon is of higher authority. But th case of Wheeler and Wilson was the case of an expired patent, a case where th machine was distinguishable rather by the novel invention to which the pate applied than by the name of the maker as a guarantee of construction a durability, and there may perhaps have been special circumstances to sustain explain the judgment. In any view of it, I do not think that it affords a s foundation for a decision in this case, which is quite different, where the eviden of appropriation and application is so strong, and where the law is so clear laid down by the House of Lords in the cases already mentioned, and partic larly in the recent case of Wotherspoon v. Currie. Our judgment must be accordance with that high authority if the facts are clear, and on the facts have no doubt.

I have little now to add. Singer and Company have no monopoly of the vention, and no exclusive right to make or to sell the machine. Any one m it. Any one may sell it. But there must be no deception, no sailing false colours, no unfair and delusive assumption of a trade mark, or of a appropriated and known as a trade mark. The name of "Singer" has, the circumstances and with reference to the usage and understanding in- ed by the proof, been, in my opinion, so applied to and associated with achines manufactured by Singer and Company, as to be equivalent to a mark; and Lord Chancellor Hatherley says, "You shall not, by using a mark, pass off your goods as the goods of the owner of the trade mark. he adds, "is not a man's name a still stronger trade mark than anything an well be devised?" This Court is not giving support or encouragement n recognition to a monopoly of these machines. The Court is protecting anufacturer against a usurpation, an unfair and inequitable and illegal use manufacturer's name, which he has adopted, and the public have recog- and understood, as a trade mark.

is is not an action of damages. It is an application for interdict. It would been more satisfactory if we had been informed by witnesses that they had lly been deceived, and that they had purchased from the appellants as ger's machine" a machine not made by Singer. But, in an action not for ges but for interdict, not for redress but for prevention, I do not think that ant of such evidence is fatal to the petition for interdict; for I am satis- oth of the intention and of the tendency of the appellants' proceedings to re the public into the acceptance of the machines as made by Singer and any, though not so made.

terdict, or in England injunction, against a proceeding calculated and in- d to injure has frequently been granted. There are some peculiarities distinguish the English procedure by injunction; but the clear authority rd Westbury in the case of Edelsten in 1863 cannot be overlooked. A nable apprehension of injury created by the wrongful conduct of the appel- is, by the law of Scotland, sufficient to sustain a petition for interdict. ntention and the tendency must be clearly proved. But if proved, preven- is better than cure; and to crave interdict is wiser and fairer than to await sult and sue for damages.

RD JERVISWOODE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff of date the 20th February and 4th June 1872: Find that for a period of at least seven years prior to the petition for interdict being presented in the inferior Court the name 'Singer' has been in the sewing-machine trade used and appropriated exclusively to designate and identify the sewing machines made by the pursuers: Find that the defenders have recently sold and offered for sale machines made by themselves under the name of 'Singers,' 'Singer machines,' and 'Singer sewing machines': Therefore grant interdict as craved, and declare the same perpetual, and decern: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses both in this and the inferior Court; allow an account," &c.

Insurance—Conditions.—A and Co., a firm of manufacturing chemists, consisting of A, B, and C, obtained in name of the firm a policy of fire insurance on their works, which contained a condition that the policy should "cease to be in force as to any property hereby insured which shall pass from the insured to any other person otherwise than by will or operation of law, unless notice thereof be given" to the insurance company. After an agreement had been entered into by the partners to transfer the works to B, and after a notice had been published in the "Gazette" that A had retired from the firm, and that the business would in future be carried on by B and C under a different name, but before notice had been given to the insurance company, a fire took place.

In an action raised in name of the old firm against the insurance company under the policy, held that the irritancy had not been incurred, in respect that the main interest under the policy had continued to be from the first in B, and that the conditions on which the right of the new firm to a transfer of the work depended had not yet been purified.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale. I.

ON the 15th of July 1871 a policy of fire insurance for £1500 was granted by the Border Counties Fire Office to Messrs Peter Forbes and Company, Port-Dundas Oil Works, Port-Dundas, Glasgow, manufacturing chemists and paraffin oil makers, over the said works and their contents.

The policy, which bore to be granted "subject to the conditions on the back hereof," contained the following warranty,—"Warranted that no naphtha be stored in any of the aforesaid buildings, and that the 'flash point' of the burning oil is not below 100 degrees, and also that the oil light in numbers 1 and 2 be enclosed in gas lanterns." And one of the conditions endorsed was as follows,—"The policy ceases to be in force as to any property hereby insured which shall pass from the insured to any other person otherwise than by will or operation of law, unless notice thereof be given to the company, and the subsistence of the insurance in favour of such other person be declared by a memorandum endorsed hereon by or on behalf of the company."

By a fire which occurred on 19th December 1871 damage was done to the property insured to the extent of £840, as set forth in a fire claim made against the defenders six days later. Payment was refused, and the present action was brought to recover this sum.

Various pleas were stated in defence, but only three were ultimately insisted in, viz., (1) breach of the said warranty, in respect that the condition No. 2 quoted from the policy in the answer to article 2 of the condescendence was violated by the manufacture and storing of the spirit and crude oil condescended on, both having a "flash point" considerably lower than 100 degrees; (2) violation of the condition above-mentioned; and (3) that the amount claimed in respect of damage was grossly excessive.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, the purport of which, on the matter of warranty, is sufficiently disclosed in his Lordship's note.

On the question raised by the condition as to change of ownership, which was endorsed on the policy, the proof was to the following effect:—On 25th August 1869 a memorandum of agreement was signed by (1) Joseph Townsend, manufacturing chemist, Glasgow; (2) James Burgess Readman; and (3) Peter Forbes, chemist, Glasgow,—which bore that "(1) The first and third parties having taken out a patent for

(2) The first and parties agree to provide the third party with capital to the extent 00, either in cash or by way of cash-credit, or by bills, to be dis- l as may be arranged, for the purpose of working said business; : third party agrees that he shall take the advice of the first party ig up the machinery and the general conduct of the business. The second party shall be employed in the counting- lepartment, at a salary of £100 per annum; but no profits shall be from the business during the above period. In the event of the d second parties becoming partners in the business any profits hall be added to the capital stock of the partners in the proportion n the previous article. In the event of the business being broken provided for in the succeeding article, the assets, after liquidating gations undertaken by the first and second parties, shall belong vely to the third party."

lisposition dated 12th November and 20th December 1870 the y occupied by the company was conveyed by John Parker, with cial advice and consent of Peter Forbes, as taking burden for Peter and Company, and by the said Peter Forbes for his own right and , to and in favour of the said Joseph Townsend, who was there- ifeft. On the latter date Townsend granted to Forbes and Read- back-letter acknowledging that, "notwithstanding the terms of said ion, the property therein mentioned, being part and portion of ds of Hundred Acre Hill, is held by me as trustee for behoof of n of Peter Forbes and Company, oil manufacturers, Port-Dundas, h you and I are partners, and that I shall be bound when required t all deeds necessary for vesting said property in you and me as s for behoof of said firm."

ers from Mr Townsend to customers of the company were produced, between September 1869 and October 1870, as well as after the late, and written from the works of the firm. Thus on 22d Sep- 1869 he wrote to Mr Newall,—"I have sent you, per rail to-day e paid), a small sample of our oil, which I have every confidence swer as a lubricant, also for jute, also for woollen goods, where the i goods does not require to be bleached. to you that all the casks must be removed on or before to-morrow for you are well aware we cannot go on with our operations. Mr wick will explain more fully. Excuse me having to write as Yours truly, pro P. F. and Co., J. TOWNSEND." On the 13th of the month he wrote to Mr Pallinson as follows,—"I may state to yo the firm will be carried on in the name of Peter Forbes and Co. partners thereof will be Mr Forbes, Mr Readman, and myself, so t sending letters or invoices as so connected with the business p address as above; but anything not connected with the refining p write me." It was proved and admitted that on 15th July 1871, date of the insurance, Mr Townsend had advanced to the company £70 in money, and that his obligations were close on £20,000 besides. Mr Readman had made an advance of £500, and Mr Forbes had put into the concern nothing but a patent and his skill as a manufacturing chemist.

On the 28th November 1871, about three weeks before the fire took place, a minute of agreement was entered into between Peter Forbes of the first part, Joseph Townsend of the second part, and James Burgess Readman of the third part, which proceeded on the narrative,—"Whereas the second party, by disposition by John Parker, with the special advice and consent of the first party, in his favour, dated 12th November and 20th December 1870, acquired and is now infeft in the Port-Dundas Chemical Works aforesaid: Whereas the first and third parties have certain rights and interests therein: Whereas the first party, under the firm of Peter Forbes and Company, and of which firm he is sole partner, has been carrying on the business of paraffin oil maker and manufacturing chemist at said works: Whereas the second party has made payment to the first party of the sum of £400 sterling in consideration of his having agreed to execute these presents, and has also made certain advances and payments to or on behalf of the first party in connection with said business . . . . Whereas the third party has continued to act as cashier, the understanding that he should be assumed a partner of the said firm of Peter Forbes and Company: And whereas it has been agreed that the business of the said firm of Peter Forbes and Company, and the name and goodwill thereof, and the said certificate of allowance of provisional protection, should be transferred to and vested in the second party, and that the first and third parties should renounce in favour of the second party any right, title, and interest they may have in or to said works and said business, or in connection therewith." It was therefore agreed "First, As from and after the 20th day of November 1871, the first party with consent of the third party, shall transfer and make over to the second party the business carried on by the first party under the firm of Peter Forbes and Company, and the whole assets and goodwill thereof, and all right and interest in and to the said works; as also the right to use, in such manner and in connection with such business as the second party may think proper, the name or firm of Peter Forbes and Company, and the first party shall abstain from using the said name or firm of Peter Forbes and Company in any manner of way: And as from and after the said 20th day of November 1871 the first party shall retire from, and the first and third parties shall cease to have any connection with the said firm of Peter Forbes and Company or the said business. Third, The first party shall subscribe a notice, in such terms as the second party may select, intimating that the first party has ceased to have any connection with the firm of Peter Forbes and Company, and that the business has been transferred to the second party, which notice shall be published in the "Edinburgh Gazette," and such Glasgow newspapers as the second party may select, and shall also be sent to all creditors of the firm of Peter Forbes and Company. December 1871 the following notice appeared in the "Edin- ette," but was never sent to the creditors or customers of -"The subscriber, Peter Forbes, retired, as on the 20th day of last, from the copartnery of Peter Forbes and Company, carry- iness as paraffin oil makers and manufacturing chemists at as Oil Works, Port-Dundas, Glasgow, and the business will in arried on by the other subscribers, under the firm of the Port- l Company, who will receive payment of the debts due to, and he debts due by, the firm of Peter Forbes and Company.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The condition endorsed on the policy must be strictly construed, since it acted indirectly as a restraint

"1. The Lord Ordinary not being satisfied on the proof that there was any breach of warranty referred to, has not sustained that defence. The onus of proving that there was a breach lay upon the defenders, and this being so, the question is, not whether the evidence is such as to make the matter doubtful, but whether it clearly and conclusively establishes that there was a breach of the warranty. The Lord Ordinary has been unable to satisfy himself that the proof has done so. It may, he thinks, be taken as established that during the time the pursuers' works were in full operation from three to five barrels of spirit were daily manufactured, and that in the general case there was a removal of the spirit from the premises once only in three days, when the barrels of spirit had accumulated to twelve or thirteen. The pursuers contended that this being in accordance with the fair and ordinary mode of business in such works, it could not, in the true sense of the warranty in the policy, be said that there was any storing of the stuff; and the pursuers have also contended that the spirit manufactured by them was not 'naphtha.' Now, while the Lord Ordinary thinks that these are not unreasonable views of the matter, he finds it unnecessary to rest his judgment on them exactly as so stated, inasmuch as it appears to him that the defenders have failed to prove with sufficient clearness that there had been any such storing of the stuff, whether it is to be taken as naphtha or not, at the time the fire took place as to amount to a breach of the warranty in the policy, and thereby render it void. The defenders did not in reference to this matter examine on their side any of the workmen or others who had been engaged in carrying on the operations in the pursuers' works. They relied on the statements of the pursuers themselves and of their witnesses. But, according to the statement of Mr Townsend, who says he was at the work almost the whole day which preceded the night on which the fire occurred, and left it only at half-past six in the evening, there could not be more than a barrel and a half, or at most two barrels of spirit in the premises at the time, and it had been run into a tank for the purpose of being barrelled afterwards. The Lord Ordinary can find no contradiction of this statement, and he is not satisfied that it can be held to substantiate what it lay upon the defenders to make clear, that there was any storing of naphtha in the true sense of the warranty of the policy when the fire occurred.

"2. The Lord Ordinary has arrived at a different opinion in regard to the second point relied on by the defenders. He thinks it has been sufficiently established that the property insured had, between the date of the policy and the occurrence of the fire, passed from the insured to another person or persons, and that the subsistence of the insurance in favour of such other person or persons was not declared by a memorandum endorsed on the policy by or on behalf of the defenders. It is not pretended that any memorandum such as that referred to was ever endorsed on the policy, but the pursuers contended that the property insured cannot in the circumstances be held to have passed to any other person or persons than the insured, and that if the contrary could be held, then this was sufficiently made known to the defenders, whose fault it was, and not the pursuers', that the necessary memorandum was not made in the policy.

"In regard to the latter branch of this contention, the Lord Ordinary need merely remark that it appears to him to be not only without support in the proof, but altogether inconsistent with the evidence adduced for the pursuers themselves, and their whole reasoning and pleas on the subject, which were to the effect that in truth and substance there had been no change in the ownership of the property after the insurance was effected. This, then, is the question the Lord Ordinary has had to deal with under the second head of the defence. The parole testimony of the pursuers' witnesses on the point is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, far from satisfactory, being indeed in many respects glaringly inconsistent and contradictory. The Lord Ordinary has, therefore, considered it fortunate that he has had before him written documents of the description quite sufficient in his judgment, independently of the parole evidence, to support the conclusion he has arrived at.

a alienation.[1] Townsend was originally, and at the date of the policy, partner of the firm; but even supposing he were not, as the policy is "The policy of insurance itself bears that the insured are 'Peter Forbes and ompany,' and that the property mentioned in the policy is the 'insureds' wn.' Who, then, were the 'insured' on the 18th of July 1871, the date of he policy? And did the same person or persons continue to own the property nsured when the fire occurred on the 18th of December 1871? These are the estions which the Lord Ordinary has had to consider and determine. The nswers' contention was that in truth and substance there had been no change f ownership of the property insured between the date of the policy and the ate of the fire. It was not said that if in the circumstances it could be held hat there was such a change, it had been effected by 'will, or operation of law.'

"The only conclusion the Lord Ordinary has been able to come to on the ritten evidence, taken in connection with the statements and admissions of the nswers themselves, which they of course cannot be heard to disclaim, is that, hile according to the terms of the policy the property insured must be taken o have belonged at its date to the firm of Peter Forbes and Company and the en only partner of that firm, no such firm or partner existed at the date of the re, and that consequently and necessarily it follows that the property insured nd, at or before that date, passed to some other person or persons, who, the rd Ordinary thinks, must be held to be Joseph Townsend and James Burgess eadman, both or either of them trading under the name and firm of 'The ort-Dundas Oil Company.' There is no question (1) that the individual eter Forbes was, if not the sole at least the managing partner of Peter Forbes nd Company on 15th July 1871, the date of the policy; and it is not altogether nimportant to keep in view that, according to the evidence in the case, Peter orbes had been educated and brought up as a practical chemist, that he had xperience in such works as those in question, and that he had the chief if not he sole management of them. It may not unreasonably be assumed that the efenders, on accepting the risk and granting the policy in question, had it in iew that the property insured belonged to, and was to be under the care and ontrol of, such a person as Peter Forbes, or at least some person well qualified, om practical knowledge and experience, to manage so very perilous and risky ubject with due skill and caution. Accordingly, the Lord Ordinary observes hat in the present case the report, No. 35 of process, made on the works in uestion to the defenders when the insurance was applied for, expressly bears that the work is tidily kept, and the management is first class.' But (2) the ndividual Peter Forbes, it is not disputed, and at any rate is sufficiently esta-lished, ceased to be a partner of Peter Forbes and Company and owner of the roperty insured some time before the fire occurred. This is stated distinctly y himself, and is not contradicted by any one. It is, besides, put beyond all oubt by the 'Gazette' notice of 15th December 1871, three days before the re set out in the fourth article of the defenders' statement of facts; and that otice, it will be observed, was subscribed not only by Peter Forbes, but also y Joseph Townsend and James Burgess Readman, who, of all others, must ave known best how the matter truly stood. (3) This 'Gazette' notice appears o be also conclusive, to the effect that at and after its date, 11th December 871, which was a week before the fire, the business of Peter Forbes and Com-any was thereafter to be carried on, not under that firm, but the firm of 'The ort-Dundas Oil Company.' And (4) the very formal agreement (No. 200 of rocess) entered into and subscribed by Peter Forbes, Joseph Townsend, and ames Burgess Readman, makes it also clear that, prior to the 20th November 871, when Peter Forbes retired, and Peter Forbes and Company ceased to exist s a firm, Peter Forbes had been the sole partner of Peter Forbes and Company. his agreement expressly says so, and by the first head of it Peter Forbes, 'with he consent of the third party,' that is, James Burgess Readman, 'transfers and in favour of Forbes and Co., it must take the circumstances of the firm a they stood, in especial the contingent right of Townsend and Readman t enter. The condition only refers to a separation of the right to the pro perty and the right to the policy, and both were transferred together b the agreement of 4th December 1871. The pursuers were entitled to reasonable time to give notice to the insurance company of any chang in the firm, and were anticipated in so doing by the fire itself. But, i point of fact, the dissolution was not carried out at the date of the fire, a that Forbes was then really a proprietor, though under obligation t transfer.

Argued for the defenders;—At the date of the policy the managemen of the business was in the hands of Peter Forbes, and the risk had bee increased by his leaving the firm. This was an important change, suc as was contemplated in the condition endorsed on the policy, and n notice thereof had been given.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case, which turns upon the construction of policy of fire insurance, the Lord Ordinary has found—(reads the Lord Ordinary interlocutor, quoted supra). I somewhat doubt whether, even if the view whi the Lord Ordinary has taken of this clause and of the facts be right, that woul have been the appropriate finding, for I think it would have been necessary f the company to prove, and consequently for the Court to find, to whom the pr perty had passed, before the clause could come into operation. But I am opinion, on the whole matter, that the Lord Ordinary has mistaken the state makes over to the second party (Mr Townsend) the business carried on by t first party (Peter Forbes), under the firm of Peter Forbes and Company, a the whole assets and goodwill thereof, and his right and interest in and to t said works; as also the right to use, in such manner and in connection wi such business as the second party may think proper, the name or firm of Pet Forbes and Company, and the first party shall abstain from using the said nam or firm of Peter Forbes and Company in any manner of way: And as from a after the said 20th day of November 1871, the first party shall retire from, a the first and third parties shall cease to have any connection with the said fi of Peter Forbes and Company or the said business.'

"The Lord Ordinary has found it impossible, in the face of the writings whi have now been noticed, to decide differently from what he has done. He ca not take it from the defenders, or any of them, that they subscribed and becam parties to such writings without reading them. Nor can he, upon that or a other ground suggested in the parole proof, deny to these writings their legi mate effect. He conceives it would be most dangerous and contrary to all soun principles to do so, or on that footing to hold that the conditions in the poli in question, or any of them, are to be disregarded and denied effect to.

"3. In the view, as now explained, which the Lord Ordinary has taken the defence just noticed, and which the Lord Ordinary has held to be sufficie of itself to entitle the defenders to absolvitor, it is, of course, unnecessary inquire whether the only remaining plea which was relied on by the defende to the effect that the pursuers' claim is excessive, or if excessive at all, to wh extent it is so, is maintainable. He may remark, however, that, were it nec sary to go into this inquiry, he is not satisfied that the pursuers' claim could maintained to its full extent. He may say, in particular, that, according the admission of Peter Forbes himself, the 'hydro extracter,' for which t pursuers claim £100, was not covered by the policy.

"In regard to the matter of expenses, there can be no doubt of the defende right to them generally, but whether subject to any and what modification respect of the numerous pleas taken by the defenders in the record as clos some of which were ultimately given up, is a question which the Lord Ordina has thought it right to reserve until after the Auditor's report has been made.'

in this case. It does not appear that the property which was insured ed to any other person than the original insurer in the sense of that nd I shall very shortly go over the facts and state the grounds on which at that opinion.

gument was addressed to the Court for the purpose of shewing that the question would not have operated, even if the subject of the insurance parted with, provided the policy followed the transference of the pro- It was contended that a clause of that kind operated an entirely different m a prohibition of an assignation of the policy itself; and, if I understood ment rightly, it was this, that the policy remained assignable, and that ently the assignee was the insured in the sense of the clause, and there- long as the property and the policy went together, into whose hands hey came to be, the clause would not apply. This certainly is not the which I should have read the clause on the first impression of it, but in r which I take of the case it is not necessary that we should give any opinion upon that somewhat ingenious argument. In my opinion the of Peter Forbes and Company at the date of the insurance were sub- y the same persons that were partners when the fire took place, or at all Townsend, who was evidently the person mainly interested in this matter, held the title of the property which was insured, in his own name, but back-letter in trust, was truly the party interested, and is entitled to

This is quite clear upon a short review of the circumstances under he insurance was effected. Peter Forbes was a chemist, and the holder tent for the purpose of manufacturing paraffin oil, or the products of oil. This patent apparently was the main capital which he had to put s concern. Mr Townsend was a person with considerable funds, and Mr n appears to have been a young man with considerable chemical know- nd he was conjoined in this project. In 1869 an agreement was entered which this company was started under the name of Peter Forbes and y. Peter Forbes was the only ostensible partner, but Mr Townsend, who ne the main bulk of the funds, was to advance the money necessary to start ere was a provision in the fourth article that Peter Forbes was to be £200 a-year, and that Mr Readman was to be allowed £100 a-year; that ts whatever should be drawn from the concern down to the 1st of October nd that both Townsend and Readman should have the option at that becoming partners. Now, the meaning of that is perfectly plain. nd was unwilling to risk his capital in the capacity of partner, by which ld have been liable for all the debts that might have been incurred by the , until he saw what the nature of the concern was to be and the amount ess which it might command. But no profits were to be drawn by any d Forbes in reality was simply a salaried manager during the tentative which was to elapse. But I think it is as clear as possible that when r 1870 came round Mr Townsend saw his way sufficiently to become a . There is no regular deed of copartnery, nor was it necessary that there be. But we have the disposition by Parker to Townsend on 12th ber and 20th December 1870, by which the title of the property occupied company, and at that time in the possession of Peter Forbes, or at least y him for the purposes of the concern, was made over absolutely by to Townsend. There is also a back-letter, dated 20th December 1870, in Mr Townsend, referring to the disposition, acknowledges that the pro- o conveyed "is held by me as trustee for behoof of the firm of Peter and Company, oil manufacturers, Port-Dundas, of which you and I are s, and that I shall be bound when required to grant all deeds necessary ting said property in you and me as trustees for behoof of said firm," and addressed to Forbes and Readman. The correspondence which is produced rily leads to the same result. There is a variety of letters which can only l on the footing that Townsend then became a partner. For instance, on ovember 1869, which is before the date of the back-letter, he writes to Mr on,—"I may state to you that the firm will be carried on in the name of Forbes and Company. The partners thereof will be Mr Forbes, Mr

Readman, and myself, so that in sending letters or invoices as so connected with the business please address as above." And in a variety of letters to his business friends he goes on to speak of the firm and the conduct of the business as a matter in which he, along with his partners, was directly interested as a proprietor, and in no other capacity. So stood matters when the insurance was effected on the 15th July 1871. The title to the subjects stood in the name of Mr Townsend. Further, it is proved that Mr Townsend had advanced not merely the amount which he originally undertook to advance, but that he was at the date of this insurance, in advance to the extent of something like £20,000. Mr Readman had made a partial advance, I think of £500, and Mr Forbes had put nothing into the concern. Therefore at the date of the insurance I cannot doubt that Mr Townsend had a substantial interest in the insurance, and it does not occur to me that if a fire had taken place at that time any one would have drawn the insurance money except Mr Townsend. His advances were not replaced; he was proprietor of the subjects, holding them, no doubt, first, for the company, but I rather think he would have been entitled to hold the whole concern until these advances had been replaced. The fire took place in December 1871, and the defenders object that they are not bound to pay under the obligation because there had been an agreement which in fact they had nothing whatever to do with, and of which they had no cognisance necessarily, by which there was a new arrangement of the firm of Peter Forbes and Company. If that had been fully carried out I should not have thought that it made any difference upon the question that we are now discussing, because my opinion is that Mr Townsend himself was substantially the insured. I have no idea that the mere change of firm, or even the change of interest of the partners in the firm, would bring that clause into operation upon any construction of it. Certainly if the firm had been dissolved altogether, so that it no longer existed as an operative persona, the interests of the partners in the concern would subsist and they would substantially be individually the insured, or the firm subsisting at the winding up would be entitled to recover the amount insured. In the present case, however, I should have doubted whether the transfer was complete before the fire under any circumstances. There is an agreement no doubt dated in November, under which Mr Forbes undertakes to transfer and make over to the second party the business carried on by the first party under the firm of Peter Forbes and Company, and the whole assets and goodwill thereof, and his right and interest therein. He undertakes to do that, and in consideration of the obligations undertaken by him, the second party (that is to say, Mr Townsend) has made payment to the first party of the sum of £400 sterling, and has undertakes to relieve the first party of all the debts and liabilities contracted by the first party under the firm of Peter Forbes and Company. I rather think from what we see that that still remains to be done. The obligations amount to over £20,000, and Mr Townsend, before he could have the benefit of this agreement, or demand his transfer, must shew that he has implemented this part of the agreement, and cleared the business of the debts that were upon it. The matter is not complete. The fire takes place in December and before this has fully come into operation. No doubt there was a "Gazette" notice that the firm was dissolved, but the firm would still continue until the conditions of this agreement had been fully implemented. But putting that aside altogether, and supposing that this had been an operative agreement from the first, my opinion would still remain that Mr Townsend was substantially the insured; that he continues to have the substantial interest in the policy; and that the property which was thereby insured has not been in substance passed from the insured to any other party, and that therefore the clause does not apply.

A second plea was taken, that the policy had been infringed by storing the naphtha on the premises.

There is no such plea on record. It would be competent still no doubt for the parties to add to the plea. They say the matter came out on the proof, but of this we must be satisfied. Now, I have read the proof, and I am very clearly of opinion that no storage in the sense of the provision in the policy ever took place. All that is said is that they went on keeping the naphtha in barrels for

, or three at the most, until a cart-load had been obtained, and then it away. I do not think that that was storing in any reasonable reading lause in the policy. Here there was nothing but the reasonable and convenience of manufacturing, and not any violation of the provisions dicy.

e whole matter, I have come to be opinion, in the first place, that there n no transference of this property from the insured to any third party, the second place, that there was no storing of naphtha in the sense of ision of the policy.

COWAN.—On the second point to which your Lordship has adverted I concur in the views stated by the Lord Ordinary and by your Lordship. ır question which has been raised involves a matter of great importance ing policies of insurance against fire. As a condition embodied in a ontract, that condition is entitled to fair reasoning in its construction, en it is clearly proved not to have been complied with, it will receive l effect to which every condition in such a contract is undoubtedly

The Lord Ordinary has fairly put the question whether or not the n in question has or has not been shewn to have been brought into n so as to affect the subsistence of the insurance in favour of the pursuers. n question not of law, but of evidence; and my view on a clause of this that it must be shewn in any action brought under the policy that the n was not clearly fulfilled in order to liberate the insurance company. insurance company are entitled to have the matter put in issue whether ne facts come up to the statement that is necessary to be established in bring this provision of the policy into operation. I cannot enter into distinction attempted at the outset of the argument by Mr Campbell, nce to the difference between the policy and the condition here, as le simply to the transfer of the property. I think it very clear that, g that the condition had been shewn to have been brought into opera- have nothing more to do with the question as to the supposed possible gnation of the policy and its subsistence, although that condition has ly shewn to have been brought into operation by the transfer of the . Was the company, at the date of the policy in July 1871, composed se who were substantially, and to all real effects, the same as at the date re? That is really the question, and I cannot avoid the conclusion that litors of this company would have been entitled to claim payment debts from Mr Townsend, as the party principally interested in this

I think he could not have resisted the claim of the creditors, and I must have been dealt with as a partner not only in July 1871, because nsidering the original agreement in 1870, when an option was given to October 1870 to declare whether he would be a partner or not, and finding did declare himself to be a partner under these documents, had it been y for the determination of this cause my view would have been to have th him as a partner ab initio, he having adopted the contract and become e interested in the business, not merely at July 1871, when the policy ned, but as having been a partner all through, and liable to the creditors mpany. I assume that the Lord Ordinary is wrong in thinking that the rtner at the date of the policy was Forbes. On the grounds which your p has so fully explained I think Mr Townsend was the principal although Mr Forbes was also a partner. But it is said that Forbes se in November 1871, a few weeks or days before the fire. Now, the n is, whether the agreement in November 1871, in which Forbes ed himself out, should affect the interests of the company, composed of Townsend, in recovering the value of the buildings under the policy, ne fire took place a few days afterwards? On this my opinion is that the cial interest having been in Mr Townsend throughout, any arrangement the partners by which Forbes went out could not affect the substantial ght of Townsend as a partner to insist on payment of the sum insured ne fire took place. The Lord Ordinary observes that the subsistence of Forbes as a partner was the essence of this contract, because he was the man who had the practical knowledge of the business, while Townsend was only the man of capital. There may be a great deal of reasoning in that; and had the condition in the policy been that Forbes, being a man of skill, was to remain as a partner, I could have felt the force of the argument on his retirement as substantially affecting the insurance. But there is no such condition in the policy. It is merely suggested that Forbes was a man of more skill than Townsend, and that his retirement greatly increased the risk of the company. I cannot take that off the hands of the insurance company, for I do not see anything in the policy entitling them to plead it, though it may be made the subject of observation.

On the whole matter, I concur in the views of your Lordship.

LORD BENHOLME.—I concur generally in the views that your Lordship has expressed. I think that at the date of the policy Mr Townsend was in fact the substantial owner of this concern. He was the moneyed man. Originally, he had not in point of form been a partner; he seems to have withheld his name in a formal way until a certain period, but at that period he had a right to become a partner, and there is sufficient evidence that he declared his acceptance of that position before the date of the policy.

The only objection seems to be grounded upon the supposed irritancy of the insurance on the retirement of Forbes. Now, I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the retirement can hardly be held to have been completely effected; but I do not think that sufficient to bring this insurance under the irritancy of that clause. Here was a company at the date of the policy, and the substantial partner was Mr Townsend; he remained so at the date of the fire, and, considering the kind of interpretation which we must supply to so stringent an irritancy as this, it cannot, in these circumstances, be held that the right to the subject in the policy had been alienated and transferred in terms of that clause.

I also agree with your Lordship as to the storing. I think in substance there was no storing.

LORD NEAVES.—I have arrived at the same conclusion with your Lordship. When this case was opened to us I was much impressed with the strange aspect of the pursuers' case, because there seemed to be a great unwillingness to grapple with the facts, and a great desire to get the case decided upon an alleged plea of relevancy, which was stated and supported by a number of American authorities as was said. I never could understand that plea, and upon thinking it over repeatedly I have arrived—with some modesty no doubt—at the conclusion that the reason why I have been unable to understand it is, that it is unintelligible. Some clauses were founded on as in use in America, which are not the same as this clause, and because this clause was not that clause it was said this is irrelevant. Now, it appears to me—and it is only because the plea was stated that I think it necessary to advert to it—that there is no foundation whatever for assailing the first part of this agreement,—I mean the stipulation that the policy of insurance is to cease to be in force in a certain event. If the event contemplated has occurred, the words that are used are explicit and unambiguous; and I must take the liberty of repeating what I formerly said—that there is no room for construction at all unless there is ambiguity. It is only when there is some ambiguity that construction comes into play. That is distinctly laid down by all the authorities, and by none more clearly than by Mr Erskine. Words may be so plain that they do not admit of construction. And if anything can be plain, it is that condition in the first part of the policy that the policy ceases to be in force if a certain event occurs with reference to the property there described. Nothing can be plainer than that. What room is there for construing these words, "the policy ceases to be in force"? There is none whatever, and the argument as to its only preventing something that was not attempted to be done was unintelligible to me then, and is so still. Therefore the question arises in the way in which your Lordship put it, viz., whether the case has arisen in which the policy ceases to be in force from the property having

I think it is quite plain on the documents how the matter he original agreement gave Townsend and Readman an option at a me, viz., in October 1870. They were then to intimate to Forbes their of withdrawing the capital, or, in their option, claim the right of being as partners, in which case (if they claimed that right) it was a right to rs from the commencement of the company. In December 1870 it o me that Mr Townsend did declare that option.

THIS was an action of divorce for adultery brought by the purs shipmaster at Glasgow, in the circumstances which are thus detail the Lord Ordinary's note:—

"The parties were married in Glasgow in June 1852. The wife is the defender, had her residence in Glasgow at the time of the ma and she has resided there ever since. The husband, who is the p of this action, appears to have been at the time of his marriage, an since, a seafaring man. It also appears that the pursuer, soon aft marriage, went to Australia, leaving his wife in Glasgow. It ha been said, and the proof shews, that there would be no ground for that, in going to Australia, the pursuer intended to abandon his
He went there apparently with the laudable desire of bettering h tunes; and it has been proved that he for some time correspondec his wife; that, on at least one occasion, he sent money to her Australia, and also that he had expressed a desire that she shoul him there. In place, however, of doing so, the defender, within th four years after the pursuer had gone to Australia, went to reside man called Henderson Carrick, a married man, but who had sep from his wife, and that she and that individual have until recentl together, chiefly in Glasgow, as man and wife. It is proved that children have been born of the intercourse between the defend Carrick.

"On the other hand, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the proof ciently shews that the pursuer came to the knowledge of his wi defender's, misconduct, about ten years before the institution action. But then the proof also sufficiently shews, in the Lord Ordi opinion, that the pursuer was, during the time which intervened be his becoming aware of the misconduct of his wife and his institutin action, engaged in the prosecution of his calling, in the comma vessels trading between various ports in Australia, Tasmania, and Zealand. The Lord Ordinary thinks he may also assume from the evidence that it would have been very difficult, if not impossible, f pursuer to have returned to this country sooner than he did, w serious injury to his business and pecuniary prospects. He return the spring of this year, and the present action was raised in July after.

"The Lord Ordinary may further add, as a circumstance which a to him to be clearly enough established by the proof, that the de the pursuer's return, and any delay between the date of the cessation thereof and the raising of the present action was very short.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am clearly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is right, and that the authorities which have been cited are not applicable to the case. If it had been necessary to decide the point, it would have been very doubtful whether a husband living in Australia should be held bound, as soon as intelligence reached him of his wife's infidelity, at once to bring an action of divorce against her in his absence from the country. He may do so no doubt, but it is a delicate matter to entrust to the management of another at a distance so great. But the present case turns on a different point altogether. Here the wife's course of adultery continues down to 1871, only a short time prior to the husband's return to this country, so that if condonation implied "mora" be alleged, it can only be for the interval between the cessation of the adulterous conduct and the date of raising this action, a period much too short for the purpose. Connivance would rather be the inference unfavourable to the pursuer, but in the present case I think that not proved.

As to expenses, the wife is entitled to a reasonable sum. The husband was for ten years aware of his wife's course of life, and allowed it to go on without objection; so that I do not wonder that the action was defended.

Teinds—Locality—Valuation—Surrender—Prescription.—By a final decree of locality in 1817 the lands of a heritor were localled on for stipend to the extent of £40, being the full amount of the teinds taken at one-fifth of the proven rental. In 1863 the heritor obtained a decree of valuation of his teinds, which fixed them at £32, and subsequently obtained a decree of reduction of the decree of locality, qualified by the condition that it should subsist as the interim rule of payment of stipend until a new decree of locality was obtained.

In a subsequent locality, held, in a question between the heritor and the minister, that the former was not precluded by the forty years' payments of £40 from surrendering his teind at the sum fixed by the decree of valuation.

Question, whether the reduction of the former decree of locality was necessary.

Observations on the Locality of Madderty, July 9, 1817, F.C.

2D DIVISION. Lord Gifford. Teind Clerk.

THE present question arose in the course of making up a final locality of the parish of Kilmorack. The circumstances are thus stated in the Lord Ordinary's note:—"Previous to 1863 the lands of Aigas and others, now belonging to the condescender Mrs Chisholm-Batten, were held with the teinds thereof unvalued. In 1817, by final decree of modification and locality, these lands were localled upon for stipend to the minister to the extent of £40 per annum, which appears to have been one-fifth of the proven rental of the said lands, or rental upon which the then heritor was held confessed. This sum of £40 per annum was paid by the heritor as stipend under this decree of locality for more than forty years. At least this is the allegation of the minister, and the Lord Ordinary, for the purhe minister raised action for the full sum of £40 allocated by the itation, modification, and locality was brought on 28th January n now was, for what sum Mrs Chisholm-Batten's lands should be

"Prima facie, an heritor who has obtained a valuation of his teinds i to surrender the valued teind, and can be asked to pay no more than th of the valuation. It rests with the minister to shew why Mrs Chisholm who in 1863 had her whole teind duly valued at £32, 2s. 6½d., should in all time coming to pay nearly £8 more, or £40 in all.

"The minister accepts this onus, and founds his claim on the allega under the final decree of 1817, which stood unreduced till 1863, a events for a period of more than forty years, Mrs Chisholm-Batten and decessors paid £40 per annum, and he maintains that in virtue of the scription Mrs Batten must continue liable for that sum, whatever the of her teinds may be. In support of his plea the minister refers to which, notwithstanding old decrees of valuation, heritors have been fou in prescriptive overpayments—the chief case being that of Madderty, 1817, F.C. 371.—See this case and cases there referred to; also Bai Minister of Polmont, 3d July 1832, 10 S. 752. A judgment of the Lord Ordinary in the Locality of Row, dated 4th July 1871, was also to, in which effect was given to prescriptive overpayment. In this case sent Lord Ordinary fully considered the whole question and all the au and his judgment was acquiesced in.

"In all these cases, however, the prescriptive overpayments founde lowed the decree of valuation,—that is to say, an heritor holding a valuation of the High Court, and which therefore could not be dereli by overpayment, paid notwithstanding in excess of the valuation for prescriptive period. The Lord Ordinary, as at present advised, contin of opinion that the minister and benefice may by prescription obtain feasible right to such overpayment, the same being in reality a payme stock over and above the valued teind.

"It humbly appears to the Lord Ordinary, however, that such cases application whatever to the present case, where the alleged prescript payment did not follow upon, but preceded the final and unchallengeab of valuation.

"It is indeed a mistake in the present case to say that there was payment at all. The payment of £40 a-year was not an overpayment, fifth of the proven rental,—that is, it was the exact amount of the

The minister reclaimed, and argued;—A modification and locality standing for forty years gives the benefice a permanent right to the sum localled. The case of Madderty is the same as the present, since there had been there also overpayments for more than forty years prior to the decree of approbation, and the judgment of the Court was founded on this being dereliction of the subvaluation.[1]

Argued for the condescender;—A decree of locality is not such a title as is required by the Act of 1617 as to the positive prescription. There can be no dereliction, since before 1863 there was nothing to derelinquish. And in 1817 £40 may have been a fair estimate of the teind due, so that there is no proof of any ground on which the heritors could have objected to the said sum. This is the first case in which a positive prescription of teinds beyond their real value, and thus an encroachment into the stock, has been alleged by a minister whose teinds have not been inter-teind, and it was paid as such. There was no room for maintaining overpayment until 1863, when the teinds were valued for the first time at a lower sum, and it would require forty years' overpayment after 1863 to establish any right to overpayment in the benefice.

"The action of valuation was brought for the very purpose of fixing the exact value of the teinds, and to give the heritor the right to draw his own teinds. Supposing that the teinds had been actually drawn prior to 1863, the drawn teind would always exceed in amount the valued teind, and the valuation was brought for the very purpose of reducing it to its true and actual amount.

"Still farther, in a process of valuation the teind is struck at one-fifth of the net teindable rental as at the date of the valuation. Now, it may very well be that the teindable rental of the lands of Aigas had fallen off between 1817 and 1863, so that while a fifth of the teindable rental in 1817 was £40, the fifth of the teindable rental in 1863 might be only £32, 2s. 6¾d. The minister is no more entitled to found upon the byegone high rental of the lands as a reason for having more teind than is actually due than the heritor would be entitled to found upon that circumstance as a reason for drawing more rent than the lands will actually bring.

"Lastly, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the decree of 1863, being in point of fact unchallenged and unreduced, he must give effect to it in settling the final locality in the present process. It is just possible, though the Lord Ordinary does not think it likely, that forty years' prescriptive payment prior to 1863 might have been a good defence in the valuation against the value being struck at a less amount. But this was not pleaded, and final decree of valuation was pronounced. The Lord Ordinary cannot by way of exception set aside the final decree of valuation as he is now asked to do.

"The view now taken supersedes all the other questions raised on record. These questions relate chiefly to the years which must be reckoned in making up the prescriptive period, and in particular whether certain minorities are to be deducted, and whether the full sum was paid in certain other years. The question of minority is rather a difficult one, the absolute title being taken by the minor's tutors or curators in their own name, and the lands being so held by them for a time, and then conveyed to the minor. The Lord Ordinary inclines to think that as it appeared on the face of the title, though not in the dispositive clause, that the lands were really held for the minor, the exception of minority would apply. The present judgment does not, however, rest on this ground, but solely on the decree of valuation of 1863, as above explained.

"The Lord Ordinary has modified the expenses awarded, on the ground that the heritor has been unsuccessful in the discussion on the interim locality, the minister having succeeded in maintaining the interim locality at £40 per annum."

fered with by the incumbents of other parishes. There is a great difference between the proven rental (or rental confessed on) in a process of locality and the "constant rent," which is the result of a valuation.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have formed a very clear opinion that the Lord Ordinary is right. The question is, whether the minister, on the ground of immemorial usage or prescription, is entitled, notwithstanding the valuation, to have in the present locality effect given to the former locality, in respect that for more than forty years £40 has been paid out of the lands belonging to Mrs Chisholm-Batten. The argument for the minister is ingenious, but, I think, based on a fallacy. The decision in the case of Madderty does not present any difficulty in arriving at this conclusion. In that case a subvaluation was obtained in 1629, and a subsequent locality in 1661. The heritor continued to pay in conformity with the locality and in excess of the subvaluation. In 1760 a process of approbation was brought, and the Court gave effect to the subvaluation, but the heritor still continued to pay the old stipend. Some time after the question occurred whether the minister had acquired a prescriptive right to the overpayments. The Court held that the decree of approbation could not be dis relinquished, but that the minister had by the previous overpayments acquired a prescriptive right to the excess above the subvaluation.

This case is quite different. The decree of locality in the former process was a decree finding, for the purposes of that locality, that the present amount of the fund out of Mrs Chisholm-Batten's lands available for stipend was £40 per annum. The liability of the proprietor to the minister is to account for a certain proportion of the annual rent. The original enactment, 1633, c. 15, bound the heritor to pay one-fifth of the present rent; and although in the process of locality it was found quite reasonable to strike that liability at an average, still the principle is that the heritor pays year by year according to the present rent. But when the heritor leads a valuation, then his liability is altered. He then is to pay according to the constant rent. He was formerly bound to pay a proportion of the present rent; after the decree, he must pay the constant amount fixed by the decree. In this case, the minister's possession, prior to the valuation, was perfectly consistent with the rights of the heritor, whose position was precisely the ordinary one of an heritor whose teinds are unvalued. There then was no conflict either of title or possession, and consequently no ground on which prescription can run.

I have some doubt, looking to the case of Maxwell, Shaw's Teind Cases, p. 143, whether, when there is a new augmentation and a new allocation of the whole stipend, the former decree of locality is not superseded without any process of reduction. Lord Glenlee's opinion was to that effect, although it is the ordinary practice to set it aside by a reduction, when it is inconsistent with the rights of parties in the new locality. There is, however, a reduction here, and the real question is, whether prescription has run in favour of the decree of locality of 1817, to the effect of preventing the heritor using his right of surrendering his teinds at their value. I am of opinion that the possession which the minister has had has not been adverse to the heritor's right, but entirely consistent with it, and that there is therefore no room for prescription.

LORD COWAN.—This case appears to me to be free of difficulty. In the interval between the two localities of 1817 and 1867 the objector, Mrs Chisholm-Batten, obtained in 1863 a decree of valuation of her teinds from the High Court; and, in order to surrender thereon, further obtained—whether unnecessarily or not need not be here decided—a reduction of the locality of 1817. hat decree the stipend localled on the objector was £40, being one-fifth of the proven rental on which this heritor was held confessed. The decree of valuation has found the value of the objector's teinds at £32. It is now proposed to surrender the teinds as thus valued; and the question is, whether this can be competently done, having regard to the payment of a larger sum as stipend under the locality of 1817. I have always understood that a heritor's right to surrender his teinds could not be disputed, as soon as he has obtained a valuation, and finds that he is to be localled upon to an amount which exceeds the whole value of his teinds. No stronger illustration of this can be found than the decision in the case of Sir John Maxwell v. Anderson Blair, 3d July 1816, F.C.; and it is, as then decided, no objection that there has been, previous to the surrender, payment of stipend exceeding the surrendered value. On the other hand, I am not inclined to dispute that there may be cases in which payments in excess of the value of teind for the space of forty years may confer on the minister a right for time to come to demand that the excess shall continue to be paid. This may happen when the valuation of the sub-commissioners is derelinquished, but only so long as there is no approbation by the High Court, which is equivalent in its effects to a direct valuation by the High Court itself. Some doubt has been thrown on this subject by an examination of the case of Madderty. My view of that case had always been that the decision went on the fact that forty years after the approbation by the High Court there had been overpayments. But it is now pointed out that there had been a derelinquishment of the subvaluation by overpayments for more than a century prior to this decree of approbation. But whatever we may think of the soundness of the case of Madderty, it is not necessary to found on it here; for in the present case there is no valuation whatever extant before that of 1863; before which date the "constant value," which is required by the Act of 1833 to be ascertained by the sub-commissioners, could not be obtained; while in the locality of 1817, all that was necessary was to inquire into the "present value" of the teinds by taking one-fifth of this rental proved or admitted by the heritor. When the heritor was localled on for stipend to that extent he was called on to pay no more than by law he was bound to pay. There was no overpayment whatever. It is plain, therefore, that there are no termini in the present case for any counter-possession; not only that, but it is quite possible—nay, it must be taken to be so—that in 1817 £40 was a fifth of the rental, was the true value of the lands aye and until 1863, when the lands were for the first time judicially valued.

LORD BENHOLME.—By the law of Scotland, whenever an heritor, whose teinds have not hitherto been valued, obtains a decree of valuation, if he thinks that what he has been accustomed to pay is in excess of the valuation, he is entitled to surrender his teind, and that whether there is free teind in the parish to meet the existing augmentation or not. If there is free teind, the minister will get no relief by an alteration of the locality, shifting the undue burden from one heritor on to another. If there is no free teind the right of the heritor to surrender remains just the same. The only difference is that in the first case the Court will, as was done here, allow the locality to stand as an interim rule of payment, till a new locality is obtained shifting the burden on to other heritors. But if the minister has been drawing the full teind of the parish, so that there can be no shifting of the burden, the heritor can still escape from overpayment by surrendering his valued teind. The title on which the minister has drawn the overpayments is not one on which the positive prescription can run.

In the present case there has been discovered a fund of free teind more than sufficient to relieve the heritor of this burden of £8. Had it not been for the augmentation, the remedy would have been to have reduced the former locality and kept it up as an interim rule, until the burden was shifted. Then Lord Ovat would have had to pay the excess. But surely the circumstance of there being free teind in the parish does not prejudice the right of Mrs Chisholm-Batten to surrender her teind. The Court has no right and no jurisdiction to compel any payment out of the stock. If any order of payment in the shape of

No. 51. a decree of locality turns out to be in excess of the teind the heritor is enti to get quit of it by surrendering his teind.

This led to the interference of the authority, under the Nuisance Removal Act, and to the operations a expense of the proprietors previously mentioned, in the erection of the se and Victoria Wharf. Hence, under his title-deeds, the respondent an authors have no special right to, and have had no possession of this gr He cannot claim it as being in any sense an adjunct to his premises, an operations are certainly an interference with the existing state of possessio

Thus, on the ground of proprietary title, whether in the respondent or magistrates, there is no room legally for holding the ground capable of appropriated to the exclusion of the public. But it is alleged that the sa obtained from the magistrates ought to be regarded as sufficient justificat the erections contemplated by the respondent, and the excambion of groun posed to be made under their sanction. That the removal of that portion house projecting into Commercial Street would be a manifest improvement c be questioned. It is the appropriation of the public ground on the west and of his present premises, as an exchange, to which objection is taken; and as what the respondent urges is, that the sanction of the magistrates is all th required, and that in giving such sanction they did no more than what they been accustomed to do in times past. From the minutes of the town-coun date 31st March 1871, it would appear that in carrying through other im ments of the street, "parties sacrificing their property for the public interes invariably been allowed compensation by an extension of their boundari ward;" and holding the removal of the respondent's shop, as far as it encro on Commercial Street, to be (as it certainly would) a great public improve they resolved "to give their sanction and consent to the proposed extens the respondent's boundary," subject to certain conditions therein stated. resolution was adopted, notwithstanding the objections taken by the p complainers. It will be observed that the magistrates do not assert any to the ground in question, or propose to give a conveyance thereto. All t done is to give their sanction and consent to the extension of the boundary if the ground in question is not the property of the magistrates and counc of the Crown, their consent can be of no avail in justification of the respon act in appropriating the ground. Nor is there any room for vindicatin procedure when objected to by the Crown, or by parties having interest, b of similar consent and sanction having been given to encroach on the ground to others. As to this matter, further, the proof suggests some imp observations.

For (1) in no instance have the magistrates and council interfered effect of giving permission to any of the feuars to appropriate ground, seaward of the properties belonging to them, whereas what is now propos braces a large space lying not merely seaward, but laterally to the west respondent's premises, stretching towards the market cross; and (2) thi ground was enclosed towards the sea, and made part of the embankment the Victoria Pier, with the express sanction of the magistrates and counc by means of money raised by the subscriptions of the public, as before tioned. Thus, in the report of the committee of town-council, dated as e October 1859, it was recommended "that the space lying between V Wharf and Mr Irvine's new house, and below Mr Foubister's shop, now u a place for sheltering fishermen's boats, should be properly levelled and adamised," so as to be connected with Victoria Wharf. Then in July when subscriptions were in course of being obtained for this purpose, stated to a joint meeting of the town-council and commissioners of poli the convener of the committee, that if the south side of Victoria Whar improved by the erection of the sea-wall which had been proposed, a amount of support would be obtained; and upon that statement it was re

After this it seems not a little strange that sanction should have been

, the proposed erection would certainly interpose between the property of also limit and narrow the space that has been used by them and by the in-ats of Lerwick as an access to and from the sea and Victoria Wharf, espe›n the west side of the respondent's premises, near to the market cross. I doubt, therefore, that there is title sufficient and interest in the com-ɜ to insist in these proceedings. The case is essentially different from that neron v. Ainslie, January 1848. There the boundary of the party whose ions were objected to was the sea-beach, which the Court found must be ɜ extending to the sea-shore; and further, the only use and possession l by the objectors (feuars in the village) had reference to the use of the ɜ fishermen, under the statute Geo. II., which the Court held did not con-them any right of servitude which they could vindicate, and which was ingly disallowed, under reservation to the feuars of all their statutory rights ıermen. Here there is no boundary of sea-beach or sea-shore in the dent's title, and his attempt is to appropriate ground which has been from the sea, and which has been used and enjoyed, free of obstruction, ı objectors and others, under titles which give them access to the sea and

Reparation—Collaborateur.—In an action of damages brought by a sailor against his employers, the shipowners, on the ground of personal injury caused by the fault of the captain, held that the captain and he were collaborateurs, and that, consequently, the owners were not responsible.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Mackenzie.
R.

THIS action was brought by Terence Leddy, formerly sailor on board the steam-boat "Osborne," against George Gibson and Co., merchants, Leith, who were his employers, and owners of the vessel, for payment of £5 in name of damages and reparation. He averred in his summons that in the course of the return voyage from Rotterdam to Leith the "Osborne" required, as usual, to be turned from the river Maas into the canal running to Helvoetsluys, and that Mr James Johnstone, the captain of the "Osborne," directed a rope called a spring-rope, which was not of sufficient length or fit or intended for the purpose, to be used in checking or turning the steamer into the canal, and that he ordered the pursuer and other seamen to pay out or ease off, at the timberheads near the bow, the rope, one end of which was fastened on shore; that, on account of the shortness of the rope, the pursuer was obliged and was ordered, to let it go, while there was a heavy strain upon it; and that in consequence of this the end of the rope struck the pursuer before he could get clear of it, and broke one of his legs, and severely hurt the foot of the other; and that "the pursuer was thus injured by and through the gross fault and negligence of Captain Johnstone, who was in command of the vessel, in virtue of the powers conferred upon him by the defenders, in not using, or ordering to be used, a fit, sufficient, or suitable rope for said purpose, instead of a spring-rope, which was of insufficient length, or, at all events, in not stopping the steam-boat from proceeding before the rope was nearly all paid out, which it was the duty of the said Captain Johnstone to do."

He thus described the ordinary mode of turning or checking the steamboat into the canal:—When the tide is ebb the vessel is taken down the river below the entrance to the canal for a short distance, and is then swung or turned round in the river. It then steams up towards the canal, into which it is turned or checked by means of a rope called a check-rope. But when the state of the tide is about full, or slack as it is termed, the vessel, without descending the river, is at once turned in at towards the entrance to the canal, into which it is checked or turned by the aid of a check-rope. There are two check-ropes on board the vessel used for this purpose to suit the state of the tide. The one end of the check-rope is fastened on the shore, and it is eased off or paid out at the timberheads or forecastle near the bow, under a powerful strain, as the steamboat is being propelled into the canal. This strain upon the bow o

Leddy v. Gibson & Co.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The doctrine of collaborateur did not apply to the relation which subsisted between the captain of a vessel and a member of the crew. The captain was, as to all matters connected with the management and hauling of the ship, absolute master of the sailors. The delegation of authority granted to him by the owners was so absolute that even one of the owners themselves could not interfere with these matters. He was more what has been called in England a deputy-master under them than their servant equally with the crew. There was no analogy here with the case of an underground manager in a pit.[1]

Argued for the defender;—As pointed out by Lord Chancellor Cairns in Merry and Cunningham's case,[1] the defence of the employer, in such cases as then before the House, did not depend, in any technical sense, on whether or not the person in fault was a collaborateur with the workman, but on a limitation of the employer's duty to the engaging of "proper and competent" workmen, and furnishing them with adequate materials and resources. The dicta in Gregory v. Hill,[1] and in the English cases since 1868, did not materially touch that proposition. It was not that the wages covered the risk, but that the workman took the risk with his eyes open.[2]

The underground manager in Merry and Cunningham's case[1] was just as supreme in his department (which included the piece of work which caused the accident), as the captain was here; and sailors are so little favoured by law that the owners are not even liable to them for the seaworthiness of the ship.[3]

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded, on the grounds which he has fully explained. The injuries of which the pursuer complains are said to have been inflicted by the neglect of the master of a vessel, of which the pursuer was one of the crew, in the course of a voyage. As far as the defenders, who are the owners of the vessel, are concerned, the master and the crew were their servants, engaged under a common employer, in the execution of a common employment; and, on the principle established in the case of the Bartonshill Coal Company, the defenders could not be liable for injuries received by one of their servants by the negligence of another in the execution of the contract of employment, if the is just one of the ordinary risks of a seaman's service, for which the masters, the owners of the vessel, are not, the Lord Ordinary thinks, liable in reparation. The pursuer may sue the captain for the consequences of this fault, but he has no ground of action against the defenders, whom he does not allege to have committed any wrong.—Wilson v. ought his action against the owners. It was found that the man who the injury was the servant of the stevedore, and not of the owners.

Willes, in giving his opinion, says,—"The rule, out of which this case for an injury sustained in his employ through the negligence of a fellow-an or servant, is subordinate to another rule, and does not come into as suggested that the captain of a vessel on a voyage was to be held to be es. If, however, I rightly understand the phrase, it denotes one who is ed to do that which, from the nature of the contract, the employer would himself have done. This is not the position of the captain of a sea-going vessel. In so far as he is anything but a servant, he is rather in the position of an independent contractor. But, as regards a question like this, I cannot look on him in any other light than as a servant, along with the rest of the crew, of the owners of the vessel, although he has control and power of superintendence over his fellow-servants.

LORD COWAN.—This is an interesting case, and differs in some respects from cases of a similar kind which we have had to consider. I concurred in the judgment delivered in Gregory v. Hill. I adhere to the views which were there fully explained as the grounds on which the Court proceeded. Holding those views, I do not think we require to go into the nice distinctions on which the doctrine of collaborateur is said by the Lord Advocate to be founded. The real question in the case depends on the relation in which the captain of a vessel stands to the crew which he commands. In such cases as the present are the master, mate, and mariners not all engaged in a common employment for business, and as engaged for the voyage by the owners? I think this query must be answered in the affirmative. In many matters a shipmaster is supreme, and wields dictatorial power; even over the owners themselves, if they come on board during the voyage, and attempt to interfere with his control of the navigation. In that respect he might be said to have a larger power than a mere collaborateur. But then, on the other hand, captain and crew are more closely fellow-workmen, in another respect, than we usually find in the cases already decided. They are all equally and wholly interested in the navigation of the vessel, and in the safe prosecution of its voyage. On the whole, I think there is no foundation for the distinction which has been pleaded in English cases between a deputy-master and a mere collaborateur; that captain and crew were equally the servants of the owners engaged in a common work; that the accident which occurred to the pursuer was one of the ordinary risks incident to his employment; and that the rule respondeat superior does not apply.

LORD BENHOLME.—The only question in this case is in respect of the application of the English doctrine of collaborateur. Is it to be held as not confined to workmen of not very different grades, but as extending to all officers whether of lower or of higher rank acting under one employer? Some observations of the English Judges might indicate that, though they applied the rule to a sub-foreman, such as the underground manager of a coal-pit, yet they reserved their opinion upon the case where injury has arisen from the fault of the principal foreman, on whom the owner has conferred the supreme control over the whole subjects, as well as over the workmen. I had some doubts whether we were not going beyond what had been expressly decided by the English Courts. But I do not see my way to give effect to these doubts. The word collaborateur suggests community of actual labour, but it is clear that the meaning of the word as used by the English Judges, must be taken in a much wider sense. If the fault of a foreman or sub-foreman is held to be the fault of a collaborateur, ought that to be extended to every person connected with the employment who is not the owner himself, even to the person upon whom the owner has conferred the full powers belonging to himself? On the whole, I am not prepared to give effect to the distinction between the two cases.

LORD NEAVES.—It is not necessary to go into that region which lies beyond the principle applicable to common employment. There is in it sufficient to afford grounds for the decision of this case.

The most general rule on this subject, and that most consistent with equity, is culpa tenet suos auctores, meaning not only that the person by whose fault an injury is caused is liable, but that no one else is liable.

But from this rule there are several exceptions, one of them being, qui facit per alium facit per se,—i.e., a man who employs another to do anything is answerable for the way in which that other does it. In England this rule takes the form of the maxim, respondeat superior.

i this rule, which is itself an exception, there are at least three counter ons.
, if the person who employs another to do a thing does not employ a
, but a person of independent station—a tradesman or contractor—then on employing this independent tradesman or contractor is not responr the way in which he may perform or misperform the work. On this nd, even if my servant in the course of his employment does an injury, hird counter exception is that with which the use of the word collabora- ginated. It may be too narrow a word, but the meaning of the doctrine where several persons are engaged under one common employer, and one is injured by another, the employer is not liable. I do not mean to er. The captain of a ship, although certainly in a position of great nust still obey the owner, except in so far as the navigation of the ship ly concerned. I see no reason for holding that he is to be considered a naster. If he were, it would give rise to endless anomalies. Suppose ain lawfully off duty, and the mate to go on board, is the owner to be ble for what the mate does, and not for what the captain does? In nion, the captain, mate, and seamen are all persons deriving their ment from the shipowner, and serving him in the navigation of the d I think this principle has been well employed by the Lord Ordinary

R.

IN 1870 Sir Andrew Agnew, Baronet, of Lochnaw, brought the present action against the Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Crown and of the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and as representing the Board of Trade, to have it found and declared that the whole soil and ground of the sea-shore above low-water mark of ordinary spring-tides, adverso of the sea-board lands after mentioned, pertained heritably in property and belonged exclusively to the pursuer, as proprietor of the respective lands. There were also conclusions declaratory of the pursuer's property in and right to the oyster beds, scalps, and fisheries above the low-water mark, and to the salmon fishing ex adverso of the said lands, but these were abandoned by a minute, consented to by the defender, which reserved right to the pursuer to proceed with the abandoned conclusions in a new action.

The pursuer was proprietor of extensive estates in Wigtownshire, some of which are bounded on one side by the sea. Of these, the lands of Kerronrae and Kirkland of Kirkcolm, the lands of Clenary, Salquhary, etc. in the parish of Kirkcolm, and the lands of Soleburn Croft, Low Auchneel and others, in the parish of Leswalt, were washed by the waters of Loch ryan on the east; the lands of High Auchneel, Mark, Knocknain, Galnoch, Larbrax, and others, all in the parish of Leswalt, were bounded by the Irish Channel on the west; while the lands of Crugaltown, Craigtown Cavens, and Polmallet, and others, are terminated on the east by Wigtown Bay or the Solway Firth. Some of these lands were included in the barony of Lochnaw, conform to a charter under the Great Seal in favour of Sir James Agnew (therein designed James Agnew, younger of Lochnaw), Baronet, dated 29th March 1699. The barony is described in the pursuer's titles as "All and Whole the barony of Lochnaw, comprehending All and Haill the five-merk land of Lochnaw, with the tower fortalice, mansion-house, buildings, yeards, orchards, milns, multures, and pertinents thereof, with the tenants, tenandries, and service of free tenants and whole pertinents thereof whatsoever lying within the parish of Leswalt and sheriffdom of Wigtown," &c. The other lands, which are not included under the barony, had been held for a very long period by the pursuer and his ancestors under Crown titles, and are thus described:—"All and Whole the lands of Larbrexgressie, alias Balgressie, and Auchentroich, the lands of Cardrain and Ayne, with houses, biggings, yeards, orchards, parts, pendicles, and pertinents of the same," &c.

None of the pursuer's titles contained any express grant of the foreshore or of oyster or salmon fishing, nor was there any mention of the boundary of any of the lands lying on the sea-board.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 3) "The lands and others described in article one above written were erected and incorporated into a barony, to be called in all time coming the barony of Lochnaw, conform to a charter under the Great Seal in favour of the deceased Sir James Agnew (therein

* "NOTE.—This case involves some points of great importance and o interest, touching the rights of proprietors having estates adjacent to shore on the one hand, and the rights of the Crown and the public, o Crown for the public, on the other.

"It was not disputed, but, on the contrary, expressly conceded, on t of the Crown, as defender in the present case, that the shore, or foreshore called,—that is, the ground between low and high water mark of ordinar tides,—is alienable, subject always to certain uses, such as the anchoring lasting of vessels, passage, and others, which must always remain veste Crown for the public; and, on the other hand, it was expressly state part of the pursuer that he did not and could not claim the shore in except subject to the right of the Crown therein for all such public uses referred to, and that he had no objection to that right being reserved most ample manner. In this view of the matter it is probably of litt tical importance whether the radical right of property of the particular p shore-ground immediately in question in the present case is to be held the Crown or in the pursuer, for it does not appear that any uses of thes of ground have been contemplated, or could well be taken, by the Cro the public, greater or more than the pursuer has expressed his readines cede, and has stated that he always has conceded. It is possible, however, other places, and in different circumstances, or even in the places now pute, the foreshore might, as was suggested on the part of the Crown, be siderable value in respect of the discovery of minerals underneath the s dependently altogether of the ordinary public uses which have been rese

"The question, therefore, which was discussed before the Lord Ordin not whether the foreshore is alienable, but whether it is or is not to be having, so far as claimed by the pursuer in the present case, come to hi the Crown, and now belongs to and is possessed by him as part of his subject to the reserved right in the Crown for public uses. It was not the pursuer, and certainly no title-deed or other evidence has been prod referred to by him to the effect that the foreshore was ever transferred or to any of his predecessors by express grant. But his contention wa that the mere fact of his lands abutting on or lying adjacent to the s sufficient, under his titles—which are neither bounding nor otherwise terms exclusive of the shore, but are of the most comprehensive charac contain, beside the specific lands conveyed, clauses of parts and pertinent most ample and unqualified terms—to give him the right claimed; 2d, t barony title, with its clauses, also of the most ample and unqualified na parts and pertinents, is at any rate sufficient to infer, and must in law to include in itself, a right to the foreshore; and 3d, that at any rate, the least favourable view for the pursuer that can be taken of his case, be held that, in virtue of his titles, and the possession which has follo them, his right to the foreshore, as claimed by him, has been sufficientl lished.

"In the view which the Lord Ordinary has taken of the proof, it is u sary to determine whether the first two of these pleas are in themselv irrespective of the state of the possession, sound or not; although certai will be afterwards seen, some of the authorities and precedents go the le supporting the affirmative. The Lord Ordinary's judgment in the prese ıe defender reclaimed, and argued;—I. Under the pursuer's title alone, t from any possession, he has no right to the fore-shore. Part of his ınded on a combined view of the pursuer's titles and the possession which ɔved to have been had under them.

There can be no doubt, the Lord Ordinary thinks, that the proof prepon- es greatly in favour of the pursuer. He thinks, indeed, that it establishes ıe exclusive immemorial possession on the part of the pursuer and his pre- sors that could have been expected, or that could well have been had, con- ing the nature of the subject—shore-ground having no peculiar advantages d the public uses to which such ground must always be liable, let the pro- ary right to it be whose it may. It appears to the Lord Ordinary to be actorily established by the pursuer, not only that he and his predecessors for time immemorial been in the possession and occupation of the foreshore spute, and have taken from it stones and sand for the building and repair- f houses and dykes, and for the making of roads and walks, and wrack and for the manuring and cultivation of the lands, whenever and as often as ion required. Not only so, but the Lord Ordinary thinks it is also proved while such has always been the nature of the possession of the pursuer and redecessors, by themselves, their tenants, and dependants, it has also been ıd that the advantages derived from such possession have been valuable, uniformly treated as such by all concerned. Accordingly the tenants on ochnaw estate appear to have taken their farms and paid additional rent ıat footing and assumption. On the other hand, the proof shews that the ntages now referred to were not possessed by the public generally, or by party or parties at all other than the pursuer and his predecessors, and their ıts and dependants, but, on the contrary, that all others were prevented in ıus ways and at various times—in short, as much and as often as circum- es required—from interfering with the exclusive possession which it is clear ursuer and his predecessors have all along had, and understood and believed alone had right to. At the same time, it must be acknowledged that there me evidence of acts of possession by other parties; but, having regard to whole proof, the nature of the subject, and all the circumstances, the Lord nary has felt himself unable to attribute such acts of possession to any t of property in or asserted by these other parties. He thinks, on the con- r, that they have been sufficiently accounted for, where not mere trespasses, he footing of having been allowed by the pursuer and his predecessors, from ngs of good neighbourhood, or on other grounds in no degree derogating ı the paramount right of ownership and of possession which he must hold to ɔ been all along in the pursuer and his predecessors.

The Lord Ordinary may add, that he did not understand at the debate that Crown seriously disputed the state of the possession to be very much of the ıcter now described. What was maintained by the Crown seemed rather e that the acts of possession and enjoyment proved by the pursuer were more ulated to support rights of servitude than a right of property. The Lord inary, however, cannot think so. It appears to him that the acts of posses- and enjoyment referred to were far too numerous, varied, and exclusive in r character to be limited to servitude rights merely. The possession and yment established to have been had by the pursuer and his predecessors t be looked at as a whole, and so looking at them the Lord Ordinary is un- ı to draw from them any other conclusion than that they shew the pursuer his predecessors to have dealt with the shore ex adverso of their lands as nging to them in property, subject, it may be, to the burden of certain pub- ses, and not as having merely a variety of servitudes over it, as property nging to the Crown or some other party.

Having regard, then, to the fact that, while the pursuer's admitted property, by him under Crown titles, and, so far as the present question is concerned, large extent under a barony title, lies adjacent to the sea, and that there is ing to be found in the titles by way of reservation, or a bounding descripsea-board lands is possessed under a barony title, part under an ordinary crown title, and in neither case is there mention of a boundary by the tion or otherwise, to exclude the shore, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that under these titles, fortified and explained as they are by the possession which has been had under them, it must be held that the shore in dispute belongs to the pursuer, subject to those uses of which the public, and the Crown for the public, cannot be deprived. It may be, he thinks, very fairly presumed that such was the object and intention of all concerned when the pursuer and his predecessors obtained right to their lands from the Crown, and it is not easy to discover any good or substantial reason for its being otherwise. It is obvious that there has been no intention, when the pursuer's crown titles were granted, to convey the shore between low and high water ex adverso of his land to some party other than the pursuer or his predecessors, or that intention would have been long ago carried out. It is scarcely conceivable, indeed, what object or interest any party other than the pursuer and his predecessors, whose lands lie adjacent to the shore, could have had in obtaining a right by itself, and unconnected with any other property whatever, merely to the shore in question. And it is also inconceivable that the Crown could have had any real or substantial interest in withholding from the pursuer and his predecessors, as the owners of the adjacent lands, a right of property in the shore, the public uses thereof being necessarily reserved.

"In accordance with and in confirmation of these views, arising from the nature and terms of the pursuer's titles and the other facts of the case, the weight of authority appears to be decidedly in his favour. Thus Lord Stair (ii. 1, 5), in treating of things which cannot be appropriated by any one in particular, but are common to all, such as the sea, navigable rivers, and others, alludes to shore in the following passage of his Institutions:—'So all nations have free passage by navigation through the ocean, in bays, and navigable rivers; and have also the benefit of stations or roads and harbours in the sea and rivers; and have the common use of the shores for casting anchors, disloading of goods, taking in ballast, or water rising in fountains there, drying of nets, erecting of tents, and the like. Yet doth the shore remain proper, not only as to jurisdiction, but as to houses or works built thereupon, and as to minerals, coals, or the like found therein; so is not in whole common, but some uses thereof only.' Except, therefore, as regards the public uses here referred to by Lord Stair, it is clear, at least on his authority, that the shore is alienable by the Crown, and may be appropriated by a private individual; and, for the reasons already adverted to, the Lord Ordinary must hold that it was conveyed, and was intended to be conveyed, to the pursuer and his predecessors under their crown titles. This view is further supported by Lord Stair in another passage of his work (ii. 3, 60), where he states that lands being disponed as here, with parts and pertinents, 'all is carried thereby that falls under the denomination of the lands disponed, a cælo ad centrum, and all that in the disposition was accustomed to follow it, not only as servitudes, but even contiguous parcels of land, which were not known as distincta tenementa or parts of any other tenement, except what the law reserves or the express provision of the superior;' and although the learned author goes on to observe that the law reserves 'all those things which are called regalia or jura publica,' he nowhere, that the Lord Ordinary can discover, says that the shore, so far as it may be appropriated by individuals, is inter regalia.

"The authority of Mr Erskine (Institutes, ii. 6, 17), while generally to the same effect, is even more unequivocally for the pursuer as regards the matter in question, for he says that 'by our constant practice the proprietors who border on the sea enclose as their own property grounds far within the sea-mark;' and he refers to the case of Bruce, Nov. 25, 1714, M. 9342, where it appears to have been expressly found that 'sea-greens are not inter regalia,' and that 'the sea-greens might belong to the neighbouring heritors as part and pertinent without a special grant.'

"Mr Bell, again, in his Principles, states the law in almost the very terms of the Lord Ordinary's finding in the prefixed interlocutor. After some explanasea-flood, &c., but only a grant of lands with pertinents de nded by the sea. So that the alternative questions arise—(1) gard to the shore, which it is unnecessary to specify, he says (sec. 642), , as in England, held to be property reserved to the sovereign, but to be granted as part and pertinent of the adjacent land, under the the Crown's right as trustee for the public uses.' And in the next 43) he goes on to state that 'the shore, so far as capable of appropria- in England be part of the manor of a subject. In Scotland it may be by the royal grant, subject to the public use, and grants of the adjacent nder that implied burden.' And the doctrine thus stated Mr Bell support and illustrate in various ways, all tending to shew, in con- ith the Lord Ordinary's judgment in the present case, that the owner ds adjacent to the shore is, in the absence of an excluding boundary ion, or other qualification or limitation in his title, to be held to have to the shore, but subject to what must always be held to be the ight of the Crown as trustee for public uses. Nor can the Lord find that Mr Bell, any more than Lord Stair or Mr Erskine, says that is one of the regalia which cannot be carried by a clause of parts and , but can only be carried by an express grant or by a barony title with prescriptive possession. The passages in his Principles to which has already been made shew very clearly that he entertained no such dition to the institutional writers who have now been referred to, many ises to the same effect were cited in argument to the Lord Ordinary, gst others the following:—

Magistrates of Culross v. the Earl of Dundonald, 15th June 1769, Mor. here it was decided that a crown charter of lands described as bounded conveyed to the grantees the right to the beneficial occupancy of the preference to an after crown grant purporting specially to convey the as reserved crown property.

v. Downie, 27th May 1807, Hume's Decisions, p. 552, where it was a bank of shelly-land contiguous to the sea-shore, and covered by the dinary tides, was not inter regalia, but a pertinent of the adjacent he report of this case is particularly valuable for the opinion it contains resident Ilay Campbell, to the effect that the shore with its adjuncts, a-weed and the like, are not inter regalia in the sense of being in- but must in the general case be held to belong to the proprietor of the ands as pertinents thereof without a royal grant, provided always he pede the uses of navigation, which is the single restraint of his right.

This case is also valuable for the explicit statement Gillies, to the effect that 'the Court could not hold the shore to be out of a crown grant wherever it was not expressly inserted in it,' but he contrary, 'the conveyance of an estate which is notoriously bounded a conveys the shore as effectually as if the words bounded by the sea he charter.' of his lands, or of wrack or ware, had a sufficient title to resist an action by another party having lands lying near but not adjacent to the sea-shore, concluding for right to gather wrack and ware thereon. In this case the Lord Ordinary (Wood), in the note to his judgment, which was unanimously adhered to by the Court, appears to have entered into a very full and discriminating examination and review of all the authorities and precedents up to that time bearing on the question determined in the present case, and shewed very conclusively, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, that the result here arrived at is right. It is true that the Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope) in that case reserved his opinion how far the Marquis of Ailsa, who obtained the judgment, was to be held as having a full proprietary right to the shore, or merely to the sand, wrack, and ware; but the Lord Ordinary must own that, looking at the opinions of all the Judges in the case, as well as the prior decisions, he is unable to see any sufficient ground for drawing any such distinction; and, at any rate, he thinks that the proof in the present case, which has been already noticed, is amply sufficient to remove all ground for the distinction, supposing that room for it might otherwise be considered to exist.

"Lord Saltoun v. Park and Others, 24th November 1857, 20 D. 89, where it was held that a proprietor of lands forming a barony bounded by the sea, although not mentioned as the boundary, had right to the sea-weed and ware, and that an averment on the part of farmers and residents in different parishes, that they and the public had been in use to take the sea-ware and sand for upwards of forty years was not relevant. The Lord Ordinary (Ardmillan) in this case in terminis decided, in accordance with the opinion expressed by him in the note to his interlocutor, that a royal grant to lands, whether erected into a barony or not, and whether stated to be bounded by the sea or not, if de facto bounded by the sea, comprehends the shore with its adjuncts of sea-weed, &c. And although the Court, under a reclaiming note, limited the judgment to a right to sea-weed and ware cast on the shore, which was all that was necessary for the case, they expressed no opinion to the effect that the Lord Ordinary's findings were in themselves erroneous or ill-founded in law.

"There comes next the judgment of Lord Jerviswoode in the case of The Lord Advocate v. Maclean of Ardgour, 23d May 1866, 38 Jurist, 584, and 2 Scottish Law Reporter, 25, where the very question now determined by the Lord Ordinary in the present case was directly raised as between the Crown and a subject, proprietor of lands adjacent to the sea-shore, and decided in favour of the latter. It is true that the judgment in that case is that of a single Judge only, not reviewed and affirmed by the Court; but it is also true that, although the decision was wholly adverse to the Crown, it was acquiesced in. Not only so, but the report in the Law Reporter bears that, although a reclaiming note was boxed for the Crown and sent to the roll, it was afterwards refused before it came out for advising, on a note being lodged for the Crown desiring that it should be so. There was in that case, as here, a proof of the state of the possession, and the Lord Ordinary held it to be entirely with the private party. But here also there has been a very full proof, the import of which the Lord Ordinary, for the reasons already given, holds to be with the pursuer, the private party.

"And, lastly, there is the recent case of Hunter v. the Lord Advocate and Others, 25th June 1869, 7 Macph. 899, where, although it was held not to be indispensably necessary to decide the question determined in the present case, yet the circumstances were such as to raise questions very closely approaching to it, and as to which, consequently, remarks fell from some of the Judges which are of value here. In particular, Lords Deas, Ardmillan, and Kinloch, as the Lord Ordinary reads their reported opinions, appear to have entertained and expressed views very much in accordance with the principle upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded in deciding the present case. Lord Kinloch (911) expressed himself as follows:—'I entertain a decided opinion, to the expression of which I think the parties entitled, that, according to our law, the sea-shore is t is patrimonio principis more than are the adjacent lands. In legal theory, a sovereign is proprietor of all lands to which no one else can shew a title. Then the Crown gives off lands locally situate on the sea-shore I am of opinion at, whether the title declares the sea to be the boundary or not, there is ereby given off a right to the sea-shore as part and pertinent of the lands. The ght is, and can only be granted subject to the public uses of the shore for navition, fishing, passage, recreation, and the like. And to the effect of maintaining ese uses there may theoretically be said to be a trust vested in the Crown.'

"With such authority in the law of Scotland as that which has been now ferred to the Lord Ordinary does not see how he could allow himself to be uch influenced by the partial quotations which were made to him, as the sult doubtless of much elaborate and learned research by the junior counsel for e Crown, from the reports of cases decided in the English Courts, and from the orks of English, French, American, and other foreign authors. It is by the w of Scotland the Lord Ordinary must be governed, and when that law is ear, as the Lord Ordinary, on the strength of the authorities and decided cases which he has referred, holds it to be, it is not only unnecessary, but would e idle to enter into any examination of the law of other countries upon the ubject. He must be allowed to say, however, that one, and, as it seems to him, bout the most valuable of the English decisions to which he was referred on he part of the defender, appears to be strongly adverse rather than favourable o him. The Lord Ordinary alludes to the case of The Duke of Beaufort v. the Mayor, &c. of Swansea, 9th Feb. 1849, 3 Welsby, Hurlstone, and Gordon's Exchequer Reports, pp. 413–15, where it was held that the sea-shore between high and low water mark may be parcel of the adjoining manor, and that where, by an ancient grant of the manor, its limits are not defined, modern usage is admissible in evidence to shew that such sea-shore is parcel of the manor.

"The Lord Ordinary may also explain that he has not adverted to many cases and authorities even in the law of Scotland which were cited in the argument, because they appeared to him to be not only not directly in point, but to have merely a remote and inferential bearing on the question which has now been determined. He thinks it right, however, to notice in a few words the well-known case of The Officers of State v. Smith, as decided in this Court 11th March 1846, 8 D. 711; and Smith v. The Officers of State, as decided in the House of Lords 13th July 1849, 6 Bell, 847; for, besides having a bearing on the points involved in the present case, it elicited to some extent the opinions on these points of Lords Brougham and Campbell in the House of Lords. The Judges who took part in the judgment in this Court were Lord Wood, as Ordinary, who merely referred to the judgment he had previously pronounced in the case of Patterson v. the Marquis of Ailsa, which has been already noticed as unequivocably favourable for the pursuer in the present case; the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Medwyn, who reserved entirely their opinion on the question what is the true nature of the Crown's right to the sea-shore in circumstances similar to those which occur here; and Lords Cockburn and Moncreiff, the former of whom appears to have expressed himself as holding that, even in such circumstances, the radical and dominant right of property must be held to be in the Crown. But Lord Moncreiff appears, on the other hand, to have expressed himself very distinctly to be of an opposite opinion, viz., that a barony title, or even an ordinary crown title, to lands adjacent to the sea, with parts and pertinents, carries the property of the sea-shore, subject to a trust right in the Crown for public uses. And although in the Court of last resort Lords Brougham and Campbell stated that they reserved their opinion on that question, as unnecessary to be decided, the former noble and learned Lord is reported (496) to have observed, in the course of his remarks, that he took the same view of the matter as Lord Moncreiff.

Agnew v. Lord Advocate.

Cockburn, and Lord Chancellor Campbell incline to the side of the Crown, while Lord Moncreiff and Lord Brougham take the opposite view. See also Lord Cockburn's opinion in Patterson v. Marquis of Ailsa.[1] In Lord Saltoun v. Park[2] it was not decided that a barony title gave the right of property in the foreshore, but only an exclusive privilege of taking sea-ware, a sort of legal servitude, founded neither on property nor possession. In the later cases[3] there is little except an opinion by Lord Kinloch adverse to the Crown. In Magistrates of Culross v. Geddes[4] it was only decided that lands might be gained from the sea. The cases cited by the Lord Ordinary are not in point. Innes v. Downie was only a question between a proprietor forty years in possession and members of the public, and did not proceed on title. Campbell v. Brown was only a question as to the boundary between two conterminous feus. Boucher v. Crawford went no further than Geddes' case. In Magistrates of Culross v. Earl of Dundonald the right to foreshore was raised, but the interlocutor went no further than what was held later in Lord Saltoun's case. In M'Alister's case no one concurred with Lord Gillies. He and Lords Moncreiff and Kinloch are the only Judges who have given a clear opinion on this question; and Lord Moncreiff's opinion was given in a case between a heritor and one of the public only.[5] The text-books are in favour of the Crown's contention;[6] and so are the English and American authori-

"The defender, it is true, founded, per contra, on the remark of Lord Campbell (p. 501), 'that whatever may be the effect of the grant of a barony described to be upon the sea-shore, there is no foundation in law for the position that the simple grant of a piece of land will pass the sea-shore by which it happens to be bounded.'

"But the Lord Ordinary must own that he is unable to see how this incidental observation of Lord Campbell can be held to affect the present case, where the pursuer does not merely and simply hold lands adjacent to the sea-shore, but holds them under a barony and other crown titles, with parts and pertinents, followed by possession and occupation of the shore for time immemorial.

"After a full and careful consideration of the present case in all its features, and especially of the pursuer's crown titles, defined and fortified by the possession which has followed on them, the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived is that the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for by him, under reservation of the Crown's right in trust for public uses. It is unnecessary, and it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the Lord Ordinary now to state or define with exactness what these public uses are, for that question has not been raised in the present case, and was not discussed or argued by the parties. It is left to the public, or to the Crown for the public, to vindicate and protect the reserved rights, whatever they may be, when and in whatever circumstances it may be thought necessary or desirable to do so."

egard to the practice, though there is no case known in which the s alienated the foreshore to a different proprietor, nor even to the rietor, on a separate disposition—this being now accomplished by ere are many instances of express conveyance of the foreshore lands. Apart from authority, it is plain that the foreshore is r territory, being alternately dry and covered with the sea, an n which the Crown has a peculiar interest for the public good. se of ambiguity or doubt as to whether the Crown has conveyed ore, it must be presumed not to have done so, but rather to ned it in order the better to carry out its public trust. This is ing of Lord Stowell, as quoted by Lord Cockburn in Smith's re he lays down that a grant from the Crown must be strictly d, and the clearest evidence of transfer required. If the foreonsidered as one of the regalia minora, like salmon fishings, the le alone cannot carry it without possession, though Stair, supra, ght differently.[3] A decision in favour of the pursuer would y be a grant of the whole foreshores of Scotland to the seaprietors; for this case was chosen by the Foreshore Association al one. The element of barony title, which applies to certain of makes no difference, this being a question of boundary, not of e, like salmon fishing. The only difference between the foreshe rest of the land, as originally supposed to have been in the he Crown, is in the matter of public uses; but that makes proof r much more arduous, there being a manifest propriety in the taining the property so as to carry out the trust. On the anavigable river, a Crown grant of lands bounded by such a ld not, while a grant of lands bounded by a private river would, bed up to the medium filum, though the water itself is public in s.[4] The pursuer's argument would give him right, like the proprietors at Greenock and Port-Glasgow, to build on or enclose low low-water mark.

to the possession had under the titles:—The pursuer's tenants took sea-ware, and had a special clause thereanent in the old ugh not in the later ones. He himself quarried stone; so did s and the public. As to oyster fishing, the right below lowrk was in the hands of a neighbouring proprietor, who had l on the foreshore, and the pursuer never had any possession,[5] was adverse possession on the part of the public, and no evieir being debarred by the pursuer, except in one instance as to d another as to sea-ware. If the sea-shore is open and unenere is no possession whatever which would necessarily be referred y, e.g., the taking of sand is a servitude known to the law. It r been decided whether taking sea-ware is or is not. And as in of salmon fishing, the possession here too must be prescriptive, stinctly referable to the vindication of property, and to no other lower right. Nothing has been done here by the pursuer which the Crown could reasonably have prevented, even if it had expressly reserved the foreshore to itself. In the cases of Lord Saltoun, Patterson, and Lochalsh (Innes v. Downie), taking sea-ware, shells, and sand, was allowed without determining as to the property of the shore itself. Such practice are explained as the exercise of servitudes, and are, besides, so harmless that it would have been invidious to interfere. It is said of the manufacture of kelp in last century, on the shores of Lochryan in particular, that it cannot be a servitude, as the material is not used for the benefit of any dominant tenement. That requisite must be very widely construed, so as not to exclude the watercourse for a mill, which is used for the benefit of all the world; pasturage accruing to a burgh as dominant tenement,[1] or to a house only.[2] It would be essential that the kelp should be manufactured on the prædium dominans.[3] Building, reclaiming, and working minerals, are the only unequivocal vindications of property.

It was argued for the pursuer;—This is a case very similar to that of the Lord Advocate v. Maclean of Ardgour,[4] in which the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, which decided in favour of the sea-board proprietor, was acquiesced in by the Crown.

I. The true import of the evidence of possession is, that it was long established, indeed immemorial, and exclusive of all others.

II. Even apart from any possession, the pursuer has a title which implies a grant of the foreshore. It is only lately that it has been contended that a separate or express grant of the foreshore is required to take it out of the Crown. The real question is whether the territory which is alternately submerged and dry, is an accessory of the land on the one side, or of the sea on the other. If there were no tide the margin of the sea would be a proprietor's natural boundary. Now, it is admitted that the patrimonial interest of the Crown in the foreshore is alienable and may be granted to a subject; and the question whether it has, in fact, been alienated, may depend on general principles of construction, the actual history of the transaction between the Crown and its subject, the nature of the subject, and the conveniences or inconveniences of the grant. In England and America such uses as are here proved establish the right of a grantee of lands to the foreshore, there being no distinction between the land which is constantly and that which is intermittently dry, but the only question is one for the proof—viz., What does the manor include?[5] It is admitted, at least with reference to the decisions of the Court, that no doubt had ever been expressed as to the foreshore passing with a general crown grant of the land adjacent to the sea in the case of The Officers of State v. Smith. But the same is also true of the institutional writers.[6] The other cases were, without exception, either between competing landowners, or between landowners and the public when the latter sought to increase the burden of public uses.[7] So that this claim of the Crown is, if Maclean's case be put out of view, quite argument; but both propositions seem to be well founded, provided the third is a correct deduction from the facts proved. If it be so, this is sufficient for judgment in the present case, and may render superfluous the consideration of some more speculative points. But as we were told from the bar that the case was intended to raise for judgment the general nature of the beneficial right in the foreshore, I shall shortly explain the steps by which I reach the question of possession on which the case, in my opinion, entirely turns.

It would be hopeless, within any moderate compass, and is altogether unnecessary, to analyse the large list of authorities on this subject. I prefer rather to state their import briefly, and to endeavour to extract from them the general principles to which a consideration of them ought to lead. With some modifications, which I shall explain, I concur in the views of the Lord Ordinary. I agree with him in thinking that most of the elementary principles on which questions of this class depend have been fixed by a series of well-weighed judgments pronounced by the highest authorities in Scottish conveyancing.

We have little or nothing which is new to learn in this department of jurisprudence. English analogies may mislead us; for although in such a case as the present, if I rightly understand them, they would probably lead to the same result, there are important distinctions between the systems on this subject, as Mr Bell well points out in his Principles. The safest guides we have are to be found in the decisions of the great feudalists of the two last generations, and they leave nothing which is material undetermined.

The nature of the right which the Crown has with us in that portion of the soil or territory of the realm which is subject to the flow and ebb of the tide is clearly fixed. It is settled in this country that the sea itself below low-water mark, with the soil which it constantly covers is, as a general rule, extra commercium. It is one of the regalia majora as far as the national dominion extends, and is not capable in general of becoming the property of an individual, but is held in trust by the Crown for the community.

Some uses and incidents of the sea, and even in some special circumstances the soil itself, may be appropriated, as in the case of harbours, minerals, salmon fishing, and even, as was found in the case of the Duchess of Sutherland, mussel beds; but still, as a general proposition, it is true that the sea and its bed are inalienable, and are not ordinary subjects of commerce.

With the ground above low-water mark it is different. It also is vested in the Crown as regards all the public uses of navigation, and such like, to which it is subject, and to that extent is inalienable. But as the land is ordinarily capable of being beneficially used, so, subject to the public uses, it is ordinary part of the soil of the kingdom, remaining like all the rest of the land vested in the Crown until granted out, and when granted out held under the Crown as feudal superior. Lord Stair, in the passage quoted by the Lord Ordinary, expresses himself with his usual precision. The shore, he says, "remains proper. It does not become "proper," but remains so, subject to and notwithstanding the public and inalienable rights over it. That is to say, in its patrimonial character and as respects its beneficial enjoyment, it is held by the Crown, and conveyed by the Crown, as other land is held and conveyed.

Of course, therefore, the right of property in the shore can only pass from the Crown to a subject by a crown charter, and such charters when granted will be construed according to those feudal rules with which we are familiar. The fact that all the land in Scotland holds of the Crown, and that the crown investitures are regularly renewed, renders this a subject with which our conveyancers are specially conversant. No light can be thrown on this subject from such dicta as that of Lord Stowell in the case of the "Elsebe,"[1] in reference to a claim to gift of prize money, although probably the principle contained is of general application. This is a question of feudal grant, depending exclusively for its solution on feudal principle, and involving elements both of technicality and fact which can only be judged of according to the rules of our own system. But there is a speciality attaching to crown charters of the land above low-water mark which es not apply to crown charters relating to other land. The same presumptions ply to both. The soil, no doubt, is subject to certain public uses; it is in elf of little profit to the owner, but it has no exceptional or peculiar character regards the mode of transferring it.

[1] 5 Robins. Adm. 173.

It is certainly not among the regalia minora, and therefore is not one of those neficial rights of property vested in the Crown, which from their rarity or ue cannot be carried without an express grant. Indeed, as regards its patrimonial character, it is not inter regalia at all. This is matter of express decim. Lord President Campbell, in the case of Innes v. Downie (Hume, 552), the note of his opinion preserved on his session papers, says,—"Property of e land adjacent to an heritor's shore is not a regale. Rocks with sea-weed and e like are pertinents of the adjoining property without a royal grant." Lord ncreiff, in the case of Ker v. Dickson, thus states the law:—"The Lord Ordiry adopts the opinion of President Campbell in the case of Innes v. Downie, th May 1807, as reported by Baron Hume, which, besides being of high thority in itself, appears to be in perfect agreement with all the other authoies, that the sea-beach or rocks within flood mark are not inter jura regalia, t subjects of private property for all purposes not inconsistent with the public e." Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, in the case of the Marquis of Ailsa v. Patterson, ted the law in similar terms. From its nature, indeed, the sea-shore, covered ice a day by the tide, possesses nothing in itself of that character of special ue which characterises the regalia minora. Its only value arises from its ing an accessory of the sea as regards its public uses, and of the land as regards s capability of being used to private profit. But it follows that, if the shore be t inter regalia, it may be transferred by the same forms as any other land may transferred; and so it has now been clearly settled, that if land be granted the Crown, and be described in the conveyance as bounded by the sea, the antee has right down to low-water mark. This was decided in the first of the es of the Magistrates of Culross in 1769 in a question with Lord Dundonald, ho had a posterior express grant of the sea-shore; and after the opinions of rd Glenlee in the case of Brown v. Campbell, of Lord Medwyn in the case of er v. Dickson, of Lord Justice-Clerk Hope in the case of Nicol v. Blaikie, as ell as the analogous cases of Smart in the House of Lords, and Berry v. Holden, e rule may be considered as fixed.

It has been, however, maintained by the pursuer, that it is to put his right on o low a level to assimilate it to ordinary property in land; that the sea-shore an accessory of the adjacent land; and that the right to the adjacent land, if have not an excluding boundary, necessarily carries it. In the case of Smith Officers of State Lord Campbell is reported to have said that 'there is no undation in law for the proposition that the simple grant of a piece of land ill pass the sea-shore by which it happens to be bounded." On the other and, Mr Bell, in his Principles, states the result of the decisions, in contrast ith the law of England, to be this: He says (642),—"The sea-shore is not, as England, held to be the property reserved to the sovereign, but presumed to granted as part and pertinent of the adjacent land, under burden of the rown's right as trustee for the public uses." In my opinion both views are o unreservedly expressed. On the one hand, there is very high authority in he direction of Mr Bell's view. A note of two cases reported by Tait indicates he opinion held by the lawyers of last century on the subject:—"In determing a cause concerning an oyster fishing between Ramsay of Prestwick and the ork Building Company the Lord President gave it as his opinion that the lveus maris, properly so called, and which is constantly covered with water, elongs to the Crown for behoof of the public. 30th November 1763.

"But as to the shore within the flood mark, covered at flood and bare at ebb, would appear that it remains the property of the contiguous heritor, subject the common uses of navigation. So argued as to lime rocks, summer 1772. ir John Hall v. Dirleton."

The same doctrine was expressed by Lord President Campbell in the case of nnes v. Downie, by Lord Meadowbank in the case of Campbell v. Brown, by ord Gillies in the case of Macalister, 15 S. 490, and by Lord Corehouse in the case of Suttie, 15 Sh. 1037. It was again distinctly repeated by Lord in the case of Hunter, decided last year.

These authorities are among the highest in this department of our dence, and it is idle to speak of their opinions as obiter dicta. They w these cases the grounds of judgment. Nevertheless, I incline to think Bell's conclusion from them is too broadly expressed. As applied to th case, they must be taken with two important qualifications. In the fir these opinions were not delivered in any question with the Crown. they related, as the three last cases did, to questions between a subject and his own vassal, the true construction of the crown grant could n If the vassal had clearly no right to the shore by the terms of his gra not in a position to challenge with effect that of the superior. On t hand, if the superior, having right to the sea-shore, feued out the land ing the shore without any excluding boundary, it might be fairly mainta the vassal's right was co-extensive with that of his author.

But, secondly, I imagine that this doctrine can go no further, in a with the Crown, than to establish that a grant from the Crown of la on the sea-coast may include the shore, if there be no words which ex provided the state of possession indicate that such was the nature of t And this leads me to point out how important this element of posses the practical solution of this question.

The sea-shore, in its natural state, is capable of beneficial possession the extent to which it is so it may be assumed that it has always bee cially possessed. But there is no example of the Crown using the sho natural state for purposes of profit. Indeed, without possessing grou high-water mark the property of the shore would be generally useless ficial purposes, at least for most of them. Neither is there any exa gift of the shore to any one, excepting to the proprietor of land co Nor, in general, has there been inserted in crown titles any words whi limit the right of the grantee in this respect. In small portions of the c sidered favourable for purposes of navigation the Crown may have so e its grants as to exclude the shore. But in general the land round the the island has been granted out in large baronies, like that now in que to burghs which are seaports; and in both it may be inferred that the b occupation of the shore had accompanied their occupation of the dry la

We may thus easily see how the real question which the Court ha sider in these cases was, how far the title would support a possession most of them was not doubtful, and which in few of them was disputed. the coasts of Scotland, especially on the west, the possession of the sea adjoining proprietors was, during last century, practically universal. and lucrative manufacture—that of kelp—was carried on by means of pation; and the crop was reaped periodically, as regularly as, and more than that growing on the land. The Crown never pretended right to inter the owners in this use of the shore, simply because it never had occurre Crown to be doubtful that the charter to the land included the shore a this accounts for the fact that throughout the series of decisions in q seems to have been assumed that the Crown had, and could have, little in the matter, excepting as trustee for the public.

Accordingly, in almost all the cases in question, even where the p was not introduced as an essential element, the existence of it was a The case of the Magistrates of Culross v. Cochrane well illustrates t that case Lord Gardenston said:—"The right of the town of Culross is from the Crown, confirmed and explained by possession. The subject grant is bounded by the sea. If this does not comprehend the shore, t valuable property still in the hands of the Crown, which is supposed the subjects having estates on the coast,—I mean the sea-ware all ro land. On the other side, the grant is of a later date, and there has possession." It will be found, on examining the cases, that in none of t the title to the sea-shore been sustained, excepting where it either app was assumed, that possession followed upon the grant.

Agnew v. Lord Advocate.

On the other hand, if no possession was ever had by the vassal or his predecessors which could truly indicate that the shore was included in his titles, I would hold that it was not included in his titles, as I should in the case of any other adjoining strip of ground which he had never possessed, or which had been possessed by others. The more the uses of the shore are accessory to those of the land adjoining, the more significant would the absence of possession become. Cases may no doubt occur in which the surface of the shore is incapable of beneficial possession, and in which there may be valuable minerals beneath the surface. In such a case I should think the shore not included in a general grant of the adjoining soil, as there would then be nothing to indicate that it was so. In the great majority of cases, at all events, possession will be sufficient to determine the right.

In the present case I think the proof of possession is as complete as the nature of the subject and the circumstances admitted of; in other words, that the pursuer and his authors have had the full beneficial occupation of the shore in question, and have possessed it without challenge for time immemorial, for all the purposes for which it can be used. I think it unnecessary to go at length into the evidence, as I concur in the views of the Lord Ordinary in regard to it, and have arrived at my conclusion without much difficulty. In regard to the loch Ryan shore, where the sea-ware is most abundant, the proof of possession is strong, as there the benefit to be obtained from it was material, and formed a not unimportant element of profit to the proprietor as well as the tenants on his estate.

I am not moved by the argument that all the acts spoken to might be as well referred to a right of servitude as to one of property. I think that where land has been occupied without challenge in every way in which it can be beneficially used by the vassal, and not used at all by the superior, or by any one else, the presumption is against servitude, and in favour of a right of property, being the title of possession. I think so especially in a grant from the Crown; for it is more reasonable to presume that the possession was consistent with the grant than that a right had been acquired against the Crown by prescriptive use beyond its limits. Reference has been made to the case of Lord Saltoun in support of this argument, but it lends very slender assistance. There was no proof of possession in that case, which was decided on the title, which granted certain privileges in regard to sea-ware, on which the Court thought it sufficient to proceed; and they thereby waived the question of right, which the Lord Ordinary had decided in favour of the proprietor.

But in the present case there is the less reason for raising this point, that in one respect the possession is free of all question. The manufacture of kelp on the sea-coast was carried on as a regular trade, not as an adjunct to the neighbouring farms, with which, indeed, it had no connection whatever. In this instance, as in all the other instances round the coasts of Scotland, the commercial manufacture of kelp was a direct assertion and enjoyment of the right of property in the shore which produced the sea-ware. There can be no doubt from the leases produced that this traffic on the Lochnaw shores lasted for nearly a century, and that even now the sea-ware is an important addition to the tenant's possession.

In regard to the coast opposite the Irish Channel, and that opposite the Solway Firth, as the sea-ware was less abundant, the acts of possession were fewer. But they seem to have been all which the nature of the shore admitted of. Sea-ware was collected, although in a smaller quantity, from the west coast, and stones were quarried within flood mark on the side next the Solway, as they were also on the Loch Ryan side, and to some extent on that of the Irish Channel. Sand and gravel were also taken from the shore all round the property. I hold it also to be proved that this possession was maintained and asserted as exclusive, although trespassers not unfrequently found their way there.

I think the proof for the Crown entirely fails to displace the testimony for the pursuer. The acts of taking ballast and beaching boats are truly incident to navigation; and the evidence regarding the oyster fishing, to which it was believed Sir W. Wallace had right, is entirely beside the present question.

On the whole, I think the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the summons as now restricted, and that on the ground, not that the right to the sea-shore has been acquired by prescriptive possession, but that the possession is conclusive as to the extent of the grant.

LORD COWAN.—The summons concludes to have it declared by decree of the Court "that the whole soil or ground of the shore of the sea above low-water mark of ordinary spring-tides, ex adverso" of the lands specified and belonging to the pursuer, "pertain heritably in property and belong exclusively to the pursuer as proprietor of the said respective lands."

The lands referred to are described in articles 1st and 2d of the condescendence. Those in article 1st were erected and incorporated into a barony of Lochnaw, conform to charter under the Great Seal, dated March 1699, the said lands having long previously been held by the family of Agnew under crown titles. The lands mentioned in the 2d article had also been held for a very long period by the family under crown titles, but it is not alleged that these lands have ever been erected and incorporated into a barony. None of the crown charters or relative deeds contain any express grant of the foreshore; but the several lands mentioned are de facto upon the sea-shore, and although the sea boundary is set forth in the title-deeds it is undoubted that the lands extend along the shore of Loch Ryan on the one side for about five miles, and on the other side along the shore of the Irish Channel for several miles. A copy of the Ordnance Survey map produced with the summons shews the situation of the pursuer's lands and estate to be as now generally described.

The 4th article of the condescendence avers that, in virtue of their crown charters and relative deeds, the pursuer and his ancestors have been in possession for time immemorial of the portions of shore adjoining to and forming the boundary of their lands, as part and pertinent of their estates, and have constantly, and without challenge, dealt with the shore as their property, by exercising various proprietary rights and acts of possession of every kind of which the subjects were capable.

The summons and record contain assertions of the pursuer's right to the whole oyster beds or fisheries on the shore, and to the exclusive right and privilege of dredging and gathering oysters from the said shore above low-water mark, and also of the whole salmon fishings in the sea ex adverso of his lands. The conclusions of the summons to this effect, however, have been abandoned by the pursuer, with consent of the defender, as appears from the minute No. 5 of process, referred to in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of date 20th January 1872. The only question for decision under this record has regard to the rights asserted by the pursuer to the foreshore.

The action is directed against the Lord Advocate as representing the Crown, and the defences stated are twofold: First, that the Crown, not having made any grant to the pursuer or his predecessors of any of the subjects, the defender ought to be assoilzied; and, second, that the writs founded on, not constituting a title in themselves to the foreshore claimed, have not been followed by prescriptive possession to the effect of conferring on the pursuer, under these writs, that right to the foreshore which he claims.

The questions thus raised for the decision of the Court are, in the first place, the effect of the crown charters as regards the foreshore ex adverso of the pursuer's lands and estate, there being no sea boundary expressed in the titles, in carrying right thereto to the grantee, irrespective of possession; and, secondly, assuming the crown grants to afford sufficient title for prescriptive possession of the foreshore, whether such possession has been proved as will suffice to establish the right in the grantee; or, to state this last matter in another way, whether the grant of lands contained in the pursuer's baronial title and other crown charters has been so explained, by proof of exclusive prescriptive possession of the foreshore, as to carry right thereto as effectually as an express grant.

Two preliminary observations may be made as essentially affecting the argument, viz.: (1) That it is not disputed by the Crown, but, on the contrary, it is at the basis of their case, that the foreshore, subject to the public trusts with regard to it under which the sea and its shore are vested in the Crown, may be in property to a subject; and (2) that the crown charters founded pursuer, although containing no special or express grant of sea-shore, ied by possession of the foreshore sufficient in endurance, and as and complete in its character as the subject admits of, will carry the y right thereto as much as a special or express grant from the Crown.

first of these questions it is clear that by the law of Scotland the pro- ight to the solum of the sea-shore is in the Crown, as much as the the sea itself adjoining the coast. This is laid down by all the autho- here are important public purposes and uses to be served, which can l by means only of the right to the shore being held radically vested own. Still, subject to such public uses, it is not disputed that the ay convey the solum of the shore in property; and the differences that are to be found in the opinions of lawyers have regard rather to the whether an express grant of the sea-shore be necessary to carry the right lands given out by the Crown are de facto sea-bounded, than to the whether the shore is in patrimonio principis and alienable. Now, se case to be here dealt with; and, apart from possession having fol- nesitate, notwithstanding the passage in Mr Bell's Principles quoted d Ordinary's note, to affirm that even the pursuer's baronial title can y itself to convey to him the proprietary right to the sea-shore. That ave been expressed to a different effect by eminent Judges is true; ccurred in cases to which the Crown was no party, and where the only to be decided was between parties holding opposing grants from the On a careful revision of the authorities and decisions, and specially of cases of Smith v. Officers of State, and of Gammell v. Them, I am un- m any other opinion than that, failing a special grant or an express by the sea in the crown title, and failing proof of possession, no right y in the shore can be asserted by the proprietor as against the Crown. gether, I do not think that the doctrine of Balfour, one of the earliest stitutional writers, has been in any essential respects departed from: havand landis pertenand to him lyand adjacent to the sea may mak bill, or molest the king or his lieges to win stanes, quarrel, or ony uther is awin profit or commoditie within the flude marke of the sea foiranent landis, except he quaha stoppis the uther be speciallie infeft within the mark, alsweill as without the samen" (Balfour's Practicks, p. 626); and ctrine he refers to a case, The King contra The Laird of Seafield, 29th . The doctrine laid down at so early a period was in substance that which Baron Hume, one of our most esteemed lawyers, who filled the chair this University now half a century ago, taught his pupils. Having his lectures, of which I have preserved full notes, I can safely say that indispensable, where the proprietor had only a general title from the at to give him a right to the shore he should have enjoyed immemorial puted possession.

nds held under crown charters which are de facto sea-bounded, though does not contain a boundary by the sea, carry with them as part and certain privileges or servitude rights in relation to the adjoining shore, sition which has been repeatedly recognised in the decisions of the Thus in the case of Patterson v. Park, 1857 (20 Dunlop, 89), further than to recognise the exclusive right of the proprietor of la under baronial title, which were bounded by the sea de facto, to the and ware cast on the shore ex adverso of his lands, and to prevent it b ried away by others: no special infeftment with an express grant of w ware was considered to be necessary to carry as a pertinent to the propri privilege of collecting sea-ware ex adverso of his lands, that being a right thought) inherent in the grant of lands de facto bounded by the sea Saltoun's right of property in the sea-shore it was found unnecessary mine in that case, although an opinion was expressed by the Lord (Lord Ardmillan) that the pursuer had vested in him the property of shore. The important matter as regards those cases, however, in so fa practical issue of the present case is concerned, is that in none of the doubted that the title founded on by the proprietor might be the found prescriptive possession of the shore to the effect of vesting it in the pr subject to the public uses.

But while I venture, contrary to the views that have been stated by whose opinions are entitled to the highest respect, to doubt whether i held that the property of the sea-shore is carried to a subject without grant, merely because of the lands contained in the charter being de f bounded, it is certain—and indeed the Crown do not dispute the propo that use and enjoyment of the shore by such possession for the pre period as a proprietor with a special grant would exercise will suffice to the crown grant, and confer on the grantee a right as effectual as if t had been specially conveyed by the charter. And this being so, I do n it at all necessary to enter further into the more general question, bei fied that the possession which has been instructed is sufficient to carr pursuer the right which he asserts in the conclusions of his summons.

As regards the character of the possession which will have the effect o right to the adjoining proprietor, Sir Matthew Hale, after stating the law land to be that the ground between the ordinary high-water and low-wa does prima facie belong to the king, although such shore may be, and co is, parcel of the manor adjacent, and so may belong to a subject, proceeds (Hargrave's Tracts, p. 27),—"And the evidences to prove this fact are co these:—Constant and usual fetching gravel and sea-weed and sea-sand the high-water and low-water mark, and licensing others so to do; enclo embanking against the sea, and enjoyment of what is so inned; enjoy wrecks happening upon the sand, and such like." I do not know t better description of the kind and extent of possession that will suffice port the right here in question could be given. The law of Scotland this respect be held to be well defined in the words I have quoted. N ever, that all of the possessory acts stated can be expected to be found existed in every locality. It must be sufficient that all the possession h had and enjoyed of which the shore adjoining the lands is capable in any able sense.

There are decisions in reference to rights connected with the shore although the royal grant was a sufficient title to lead to inquiry into the e possession alleged, that possession was found not established by proof, proprietor's claim consequently disallowed. The case of the Duke of P November 1832 (11 Shaw, p. 14), with regard to the right of lobster fish that of the Duke of Argyle, December 1859 (22 Dunlop, 261), in refe mussel fishing, may be cited as examples. On the other hand, in t of the Duchess of Sutherland, January 1868 (6 Macph. 199), while the n of a special grant of mussel fishing was negatived by the Court, a gene to the lands with fishings was held a good title to mussel fishings, if su ported (as it was in that case) by exclusive prescriptive possession.

Agnew v. Lord Advocate.

What, then, is the evidence of possession or of use and enjoyment of the ore between high-water and low-water mark on which the pursuer founds, nd what is the extent of these possessory acts as appearing from the proof?

1. From the earliest date it is established that, under his baronial title and her charters, the pursuer and his tenants have all along the shore, on both des of his estates on Loch Ryan and the Irish Sea, been in the habit of gather- g sea-ware, and of using it in the cultivation of their farms.

2. The granite boulder-stones to be found along the coast have, after being rried or cut on the shore, been used for the purposes of the estate, in the erec- on and repair of buildings and dykes upon the farms along the shore; and it specially proved that these stones were largely used in the erection of Loch- w Castle and offices between the years 1820 and 1830,—the stones being ssed on the beach in sheds erected for the purpose. The evidence of John awford, Thomas Moreland, and A. H. M'Lean is specially referred to as to this atter.

3. As regards the sea-ware and weed growing on the rocks or washed up by e tide, the use of it has not been confined merely to the gathering of what was be found upon the shore, but the ware has been made the subject of special propriation and patrimonial benefit by the pursuer and his predecessors.

Thus, in the first place, as appears from the documentary evidence, prior to 830,—when the manufacture of kelp from sea-ware became no longer the sub- ct of profit,—various tacks, dated in 1715, 1759, and 1799, were granted to dividuals, conferring on them right, as lessees of the proprietor, "to cut down nd intromit with the wreck within the loch of Lochryan, and the bay of Cru- ltone," being parts of the barony of Lochnaw, "and to draw and carry the ids wreck yearly to the shore side or next dry ground, and to win and cause urn the same thereupon," with power to the tenant to sell the same as his own operty. The three tacks produced, granted in the years foresaid, are respec- rely for twenty-one years. And in reference to this profitable use of the sea- are as kelp there is explanatory parole evidence given, especially by the old itnesses Thomas Moreland, William M'Miken, and Alexander Martin, and hers. And these witnesses state that when the sea-ware was let for the anufacture of kelp the tenants of the farm adjoining the shore were allowed ly to gather what was drifted on the land by the tide.

In the second place, the farms on the estate have been let to the tenants in ore recent times, with special liberty contained in the leases to take the wreck nd to cut it opposite their several lands, and to use the same as manure for eir farms, but in no other way; and from the parole evidence it appears that consequence of this privilege the farms on the estate have been let at a higher ntal than they would otherwise have been.—See M'Lean's evidence, and that M'Cubbin, and the other tenants, besides the witnesses already named.

And, farther, in the third place, the evidence given by several of the witnesses tablish that parties not tenants on the estate, but strangers, were prevented om interfering with and taking away the sea-ware and also stones from the ore; while in one instance, in the year 1850, interdict was obtained from the heriff of the bounds against a party who had been collecting and gathering reck and sea-ware, and carting off the same, and which no doubt had the effect f deterring others of the public from repeating the offence.

That certain of those acts apply only to Loch Ryan was said to limit their ffect. I do not think so. Having regard to the baronial and other crown harters under which the pursuer and his predecessors have for centuries been eated with the whole estates as a unum quid there is no good ground for the istinction pointed at.

Such, then, substantially is the evidence which the pursuer has led of the ossessory acts on which he relies; but throughout the proof there are also tatements in reference to sand and gravel taken from the shore by the pursuer nd his tenants, and their constant use of these materials when required for the state.

On the part of the Crown, again, there has been evidence led to the effect of ne persons having occasionally taken sand to make mortar for buildings, especially from one part of the shore, and also of occasional gathering of sea-weed by the occupiers of houses adjoining the shore for the use of their gardens or other small possessions. It is evident that these acts were not done in exercise of any right, and are to be explained either from their not being noticed by or known to the proprietor and his tenants, or, if known, from being tolerated as of no serious innovation on their proprietary rights. It has also been proved by the Crown that it has been, and is still, the practice of vessels bringing cargoes of coal and lime for the farmers, and others in the locality, to run their vessels on the beach for the discharge of their cargoes, and also for such vessels taking sand from the shore for ballast; but it is obvious that this custom is among the public uses to which every grant of shore is inherently subject. Although the Crown may in express terms give the property of the shore, the grant does not divest the Crown farther than is consistent with those public uses of it as regards navigation or otherwise, to secure which the Crown still remains trustee for the public. This beaching of vessels, therefore, or taking sand for ballast, cannot affect the right of the pursuer, any more than it would had his crown title contained an express grant of shore. Whether by grant or by possession, the property in the shore can be taken only subject to the public uses of which the Crown is the guardian.

One other matter has been the subject of proof by the Crown, viz., the possession and enjoyment by other parties than the pursuer of the oyster fishings in the loch of Loch Ryan; but this does not appear to be of any material moment. Supposing the right to the oyster fishings to be with General Wallace and not with the pursuer, it is a right which, as has been expressly found in other cases, may be the subject of a separate grant. It is no way inconsistent with the proprietary right to the shore being in the pursuer for every other purpose. Hence it cannot be alleged that decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons as now restricted can in any way affect the right in General Wallace or any other party to these oyster fishings. Whether the crown charter would have been a good title to prescribe a right of oyster fishing, if followed by prescriptive possession of such fishing, may or may not be doubtful; but as the pursuer has not had such possession, and at all events as he has now departed from that part of his action, I think the defence on this ground also does not rest on any substantial ground.

Lord Benholme.—I have listened with great interest to the opinions that have been delivered. They appear to me substantially, if not in every particular, to coincide; and for that reason, and because I could not hope, either in fulness or precision, to emulate their perfection, I shall confine myself to one or two simple observations on the result at which they both appear to have arrived. I think it is of great importance that we should now agree in stating as our opinion that where an estate is on the sea-shore, held by titles that do not, by express grants or specific boundary, extend the right of the proprietor beyond the high-water mark, there is no presumption that the foreshore is a pertinent of the land. That was doubted apparently in some cases, where distinguished Judges have given opinions that might appear to tend in a contrary direction, but to these cases we know that the Crown was not a party, and that it is only in later times that this matter has been at all made the subject of Crown investigation; and, so far as I can discover, the Crown have successfully maintained the affirmative of that proposition which I have just stated, that there is no presumption in favour of a proprietor, who by his mere position, without express grant, or definite boundary, or distinct possession, maintains his pretensions to the property of the shore. This is a very important principle, and I am glad that we all agree, as I understand we do, in the assertion of it. But there is another principle equally important, and extremely interesting to proprietors upon the shore, and that is, that even in such a case as I have supposed possession may affect the pretensions of the party, and that a possession long continued and of a certain definite description, may ascertain by explanation, if not by prescription, that a proprietor is entitled to the sea-shore. The nature of that possession which will so entitle the proprietor to the sea-shore has perhaps not herto been made the subject of so many decisions as would entitle us to define ctly what its extent or limit is; but this I will say, that a possession for a s of years,—nay, in the case before us, of centuries,—of the right of cutting n the rocks sea-ware for the purpose of manufacturing kelp is one of the t decisive symptoms of property that can well be imagined in the shape of session. I am old enough to recollect when that was a very valuable right, , as your Lordship has mentioned, it was invariably enjoyed by the proprietor he boundary was by the rocks that bore sea-weed. The kelp shores, espe- ly on the west of the island, afforded a very large portion of the rent, and it a great loss to such proprietors when, by the introduction of Spanish barilla, kelp was thrown out of use. I may mention as a curious fact in regard to e shores, that they were capable of a certain cultivation; and I know a part he shore which was let by a proprietor to a tenant who employed a species of ivation, by chipping the rocks, so as to obtain an artificial surface more urable to the growth of the sea-ware,—to the attraction of the seed, I sup- e, and the introduction of the weed into the rocks,—than before that opera- n took place. Here, then, was a regular crop, and the foreshore was made as servient to that artificial use as the land itself. In the present case there is most complete evidence of this kind of possession, which is a species of en- ment in itself almost decisive. The enjoyment of mere waif and stray cast n the shore is very different, and much less important. In the case of Saltoun ink there was the one and not the other, and we made some alteration on Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, or at all events expressed our opinion that the d Ordinary's views had gone rather too far, in holding that without posses- n there could be a presumption of property in the sea-shore. I do not think t I ought to weaken the effect of what has fallen from your Lordship and n Lord Cowan by repeating in detail the principles upon which this case is e decided. I think, by adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and by observations made in the judgment we are pronouncing, our view of this t of the law is made very definite and clear.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur in the result at which your Lordships have all ived, that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. This is loubtedly a very important case, and the decision we are to pronounce, if it therwise maintained, may decide many cases. At the same time, it is clear t it may not decide all the cases as to the foreshore, although it is said to be rt of pattern or trial case: for, according to the view which we are now ing, there must be a concurrence not only of title, but of possession, sub- ntially equivalent to that which has here existed, before this decision can be recedent for other cases.

I shall endeavour shortly to state my views on the subject, which are sub- ntially those that have been already explained.

The sea-shore, meaning thereby the space between high and low-water mark ordinary spring-tides, is certainly, in some respects, a peculiar subject. In sense, it is undoubtedly inter regalia,—that is, in so far as regards public e, for navigation and other public purposes; it being the genius of our law t that which the Roman civil law held to be public is with us vested in the reign, who is the representative of the public. In so far as it is vested in n for public uses, it is, as your Lordship has observed, inalienable; at least, is practically so, because, although it might perhaps be alienated for the herance of that public purpose, such as building docks or harbours, it cannot alienated so as to extinguish or defeat any part of these public purposes. , subject to these public purposes, it may be alienated; and I am inclined gree with your Lordship that the whole shore, so far as it is alienable,— t is to say, the property of it subject to these uses,—is not a regale. It is ng the majora regalia that the sea-shore in its full right as a public subject ts; but, in so far as it can be separated from public uses, I doubt whether a regale at all. As to its being one of the minora regalia, I do not think can say that there are two regalia incorporated in that one right. There is general right among the majora regalia, and there is this power of alienating the shore as property; but I doubt whether the qualified right of property, subject to the public uses, is in itself a regale. Now, the way in which it may be alienated is the question that we are in a great degree to determine here. There are three conditions in which the matter may stand: 1st, The grant may contain an express grant of the foreshore along with the adjoining lands; 2d, it may contain a grant of the adjoining lands, excluding expressly the foreshore; and 3d, It may contain a grant of seaward lands, that is, lands bordering on the sea, without anything in the grant itself to indicate whether the shore is given or is withheld. Now, in the cases where it is either expressly given or expressly retained by the Crown from the grant there can be no difficulty. But the question that arises is quid juris, where there is a grant which does not on the face of it shew, either by description or boundary, whether the sea-shore is given or not. If such a case were to occur in a perfectly pure form on the simple title, without anything extrinsic to explain it, the case would be a difficult one, and I cannot say that my opinion upon it is made up; but I am inclined to hold that the shore would not by implication necessarily pass in a general grant of the adjoining land. I think that probably its liability to the public use would raise a presumption against the implied grant. It is rather to be implied that the Crown would retain such a subject altogether, unless it expressly gave it out, and I doubt whether the circumstance of the estate being a barony makes in this respect any difference. A barony has some privileges. The proper characteristic of a barony is that it confers jurisdiction. That is the original meaning of it, and it also implies union and some other facilities. But I doubt whether it interferes with the question whether there is or is not a presumption that the sea-shore accompanies a grant of the terra firma adjoining. But such a pure case without anything to explain the grant is not likely to occur, and certainly does not occur in the present case, for we have a great deal to explain the grant, and I take it that the object is to find out from the possession that has followed what is the meaning of the grant. I agree with a remark made by your Lordship, that the possession is not so much a means of acquiring the shore as a means of shewing whether or not the shore is included by signification in the grant that is made. If the possession is such as to indicate that in granting these lands, or this barony, the shore was meant to go as much as the adjoining lands, that is an interpretation of the grant which ought to receive effect. I think it follows from that view that it does not necessarily require that it should be prescriptive possession. If the possession is such as in the circumstances shews that that was meant by the words used in the disposition clause, this is sufficient to explain the grant as being a grant of shore as well as a grant of adjoining lands. These are the principles on which I am inclined to decide this case; and it just resolves itself into the question, whether the possession that has here taken place for a great length of time is or is not such as to raise the belief and conviction that the shore is a part of the subject granted. I think it is, and for one or two reasons which I shall shortly state. This is a case in which there are no words pointing at a right to the shore in the title itself, either by boundary or anything else, and in that respect it differs from the very important case of Morton v. Covingtree,[1] an Orkney case, in which there was a competition between a heritor next to the sea and Lord Morton, general grantee of all the Orkney lands, who was in the rear rank away from the sea, at least as to the ground in dispute. Both had in their titles a grant of wreck and ware,—differing in that respect from the present case, but it was held that a grant of wreck and ware, coupled with a proximity to the sea, was a preferable title to that of Lord Morton. In that case references were made to some old dicta of Skene in his book on the Signification of Words, and it was indicated that the granting of sea-bounded land with a grant of wreck and ware was sufficient to give a right to the sea-shore and to the exclusive possession of it. The case, however, was not decided upon that view, but upon possession, and there it is that I think the case is of importance as shewing the characteristics of that possession which will amount to property. Of course all this is unavailing if you

annot extend your title by possession, and I have already stated, what I think we are all agreed upon, that a general title may be supplemented by characteristic possession. Now, a great distinction taken in that case was the cutting of kelp, and the case (occurring as it did in the year 1760) shewed that at that time kelp had not been long introduced, at least into Orkney;—and so it was that Mr Covingtree of Newark, who was next the sea, had cut kelp on the rocks, while Lord Morton had not done so, and had only possessed the privilege of taking drift-weed from the shore and manuring his lands with it. That was what led the Court to their decision. The cutting of kelp is very particularly founded on; and the report in Morrison, 13,528, says, "Of late the manufacture of kelp was introduced into that country. The weed proper for making it is not the loose ware thrown in by the sea, but what is there called tang, which grows upon and adheres to the rocks, and is cut off from them at low water. Newark's tenants began to carry on that manufacture successfully upon the shore of his own lands; and thereupon the Earl's tenants attempted to do the same on those shores, but were interrupted." Now, the possession there was not very long, but no difficulty in that respect was got over by the reference to the words in the clause of wreck and ware; and this was the decision of the Court:—"The Lords found that the Earl of Morton, as heritor of a part of the urislands of Watland and Skealon, has no right to cut ware or tang for making of kelp upon the rocks or shores of Newark and Air; and decerned and declared accordingly; and assoilzied Newark from the process at the Earl of Morton's instance, reserving to the Earl and his tenants the servitude of carrying off from the shore of the two urislands of Watland and Skealon, or Air, what wreck and ware shall be cast thereupon, in proportion to his penny-lands in the two urislands, conform to use and wont." Now, that decision shews the plainest possible distinction between the right of cutting a growing weed from the soil, used for the manufacture of kelp, which was not a mere predial servitude, but an absolute right of property, and a servitude right of getting merely the drift-ware, which was no part of the soil, but was thrown on the shore by the winds and waves, and to which the Earl of Morton's right was restricted according to the proportion of his lands, and for the use of his lands, this being a purely predial servitude, while the other was a right of full property in the soil. In the present case we have the right of making kelp exercised for a very long time in the plainest way by the pursuer of this action and his ancestors, and therefore we have the exercise of a plain and indisputable right of property that is so extensive as to be very important. The other matters might in themselves be less characteristic of property, though I think some of them go very near it,—I mean the taking of sand, and those other things; but then there comes an element in favour of the pursuer that cannot be overlooked, for it is plain that he prevented others from doing such things. Now, a man who has a servitude can take what he wants for himself, but I am not aware that in general a man having a dominant tenement with a servitude, if he gets what he needs for himself, has any right to interfere with other people taking it from the same subject. There are questions whether, if there is not enough for all, the dominant tenement may not take to the exclusion of the servient tenement; but where no question of that kind arises the claim of a man not only to take things for his own use, but to prevent others from doing so, is more the exercise of a right of property than the exercise of a simple right of servitude. Now, of that claim there is abundance here, because, besides licences being granted to others to do the things in question, there are clear cases where others were prevented from doing that which they would have been entitled to do, as far as this party was concerned, if he was only a servitude holder; for a servitude holder can only take what he needs for himself, and has no right to interfere with others who may have leave from the proprietor, and who cannot be challenged by one who is not himself a proprietor. I think that the exercise of these several rights to the extent that I here proved is sufficient to convert this grant of lands, which may mean with shore or without shore, into a grant of lands with the shore, and that thus the shore is equally his property with the dry land itself. On these grounds I adhere without difficulty to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

THE late Mr Francis Gordon of Kincardine died on 27th 1857, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 13th M 1851, conveying to trustees, for the purposes therein written, all l other heritable estate, of whatever kind, and all debts, sums of m effects, and moveable property of every description, which shou to him at the time of his death, and, particularly, all and whole th Kincardine O'Neil. By the contract of marriage between Mr Francis Gordon and his second wife, entered into in the year 1826, the said Francis Gordon bound and obliged himself, his heirs, and executors, to pay to the said Isabella Gordon, her heirs, executors, or assignees, a free yearly annuity of £400 sterling.

Mr Gordon was survived by his wife, by his son James, who died on 27th March 1871, and by his only daughter, Mrs Johnstone, otherwise Mrs Johnstone Gordon, who died on 20th January 1863.

Mrs Johnstone Gordon was survived by her husband, who is since dead, and four daughters, one of whom has since then died unmarried, the others being the claimant, Mrs Scott, and the claimants, Anne E. A. Johnstone Gordon (afterwards Mrs Muir Mackenzie) and Emily Johnstone Gordon.

On the death of James Gordon it became incumbent on the trustees (1) To entail the lands of Kincardine on Mrs Scott of Gala, Mrs Johnstone Gordon's eldest daughter, and the substitute heirs of entail, in terms of the ninth purpose of the trust-deed, and subject to whatever burdens or limitations may be imposed by the other provisions of the deed, and the truster's marriage-contract above referred to; (2) To pay over the residue to the two younger daughters of Mrs Johnstone Gordon, with the exception of £1000 thereof payable under the trust-deed to Mrs Scott, who succeeded to the estate of Kincardine.

Besides the furniture in Kincardine Lodge, which was liferented by the widow, the trust-estate, as at the date of the death of James Gordon, the truster's son, consisted of—(1) The lands of Kincardine, yielding a rent (exclusive of the mansion-house, offices, garden, and home farm) of about £900, and yearly drawings from thinnings of wood of about £200; (2)

Cash amounting to somewhat more than £7000, of which £70 secured on bond and disposition in security.

In an action of multiplepoinding brought by the trustees a q was raised between Mrs Scott and her sisters, the Misses Joh Gordon, as to whether the annuity of £400 contained in the sai nuptial marriage-contract in favour of the said Mr Gordon's widow be thrown as a burden on the entailed estate accruing to Mrs S on the residue accruing to the Misses Johnstone Gordon.

Mrs Scott claimed—'1' A conveyance of the said estate of Kin and others in favour of herself as institute, and the heirs-substi entail mentioned in Mr Gordon's trust-settlement, and that free fr annuity payable to his widow, and from the burden of any of the l bequeathed by the said settlement and codicils, except in the e the personal estate being insufficient for the payment thereof.

Mrs Scott pleaded;—'2' On a sound construction of the said tru position and settlement Mrs Gordon's annuity is primarily a burde the residue of the said trust-estate, heritable and moveable, othe the estate of Kincardine, which is the subject of special destination

The Misses Gordon claimed—(1) That the free yearly annuity o sterling, provided and secured to the said Mrs Isabella Gordon, the of the truster, the said Francis Gordon, by antenuptial contract o riage entered into between them, of date 1st and 4th September payable by equal moieties of £200 on the 20th day of June an day of December yearly, during her life after his decease, with th interest of said annuity as long as the same should remain due af terms of payment above specified, should be found and declared primarily a burden on the truster, the said Francis Gordon's la Kincardine O'Neil and others, specified and described in the said disposition and settlement, and thereby directed to be entailed. (2 the said trustees and the said Mrs Elizabeth Isabella Johnstone G or Scott were bound to free and relieve the said claimants, and the r and remainder of the means and estate, heritable and moveable, truster, the said Francis Gordon (excepting the said lands directed entailed as aforesaid), of and from the said annuity of £400 provide secured to the said Mrs Isabella Gordon as aforesaid.

The Misses Gordon pleaded;—(1) The annuity to Mrs Gordon h a tract of future time is heritable in its nature, and forms a burde marily upon the heritable estate of the truster. (2) The truster h directed his whole estate heritable and moveable, other than the directed to be entailed, to be realised and divided, the said annu primarily a burden on the said lands so directed to be entailed. (3 said annuity being primarily a burden on the said lands directed entailed, the claimants are entitled to be relieved thereof.

The Lord Ordinary, on 14th November 1872, pronounced the foll interlocutor:—"Finds that, according to the true construction of th trust-disposition and settlement, the free yearly annuity of £400 pro to Mrs Isabella Gordon, the widow of the said Francis Gordon, h antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between them of da and 4th September 1826, is primarily a burden upon the residue o trust-estate of the said Francis Gordon, other than his lands of Ki dine O'Neil, and the other lands specified and described in his said disposition and settlement, and thereby directed to be entailed; su the first claim stated for Mrs Elizabeth Isabella Johnstone Gord Scott and her curator ad litem, and repels the first and second c stated for the claimants, Anne Elizabeth Augusta Johnstone Gordo Emily Matilda Elibank Johnstone Gordon, and decerns: Reserv

Gordon v. Scott.

NOTE.—By the antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between the , Mr Gordon of Craig and Kincardine, and his wife, the claimant, Mrs , he bound and obliged himself, his heirs and executors, to pay her a free annuity of £400 during her life after his decease, restricted to £300 in nt of her entering into a second marriage. By his trust-disposition and ent, in which he conveyed his whole estate, both heritable and moveable, rustees, for the purposes therein set forth, he directed his estate of Kin- and others to be entailed, and failing his son marrying and having law- e, he appointed the residue of his means and estate thereby conveyed, should remain after satisfying other trust-purposes, to be paid to the n of his daughter, excepting such of them as should succeed to the en- state. The estate of Kincardine now falls to be entailed upon his grand- er, the claimant Mrs Scott of Gala, and the substitute heirs of entail men- in his settlement, and the residue remaining after satisfaction of the other rposes falls to her two sisters, the claimants Misses Gordon. The estate cardine and the said free residue are each of them sufficient to meet Mrs 's annuity, and the question on which these claimants are at issue, and has now been decided by the Lord Ordinary in the competition between s whether that annuity is a primary burden upon the estate of Kincar- upon the free residue. The decision of that question depends upon the ction of Mr Gordon's trust-disposition and settlement.

e Lord Ordinary understands the rule of law, as fixed by the decisions, at the heritable and the moveable succession must respectively bear the r burdens appropriate to each, unless the testator in his settlement gives directions to the contrary, or gives directions with reference to the dis- his means and estate which by clear and necessary implication plainly at a particular burden or debt is to be paid out of that part of his suc- upon which it would not fall but for these directions—(Macleod's Trus- 8th June 1871, 9 Macph. 903, and cases there cited). In the present e Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the directions expressly given by Mr to his trustees in his settlement with reference to the disposal of his clearly shew that it was his intention that they should fulfil and dis- the obligations contained in his marriage-contract out of the estate, herit- d moveable, thereby conveyed to them, other than the estate of Kincar- hich he directed them to entail.

the second trust-purpose of his settlement Mr Gordon directed his trus- the event of his son (who, as stated in the narrative of the deed, was l from managing his own affairs) marrying with their consent, and hav- mily, to convey under strict entail to his said son's eldest son, and the ersons therein mentioned, his estate of Kincardine and others. The third rpose is in the following terms:—'Thirdly, for the purpose of realising er estate, heritable and moveable, and above conveyed, and of fulfilling charging the obligations contained in the marriage-contract executed by my dear spouse, Isabella Gordon, as well as for implementing and pay- legacies and donations which may be left by me in any last will or other , however informal, which I may execute, or which may be found in my stody or that of any other person after my death.'

e period when the entail of Kincardine fell to be executed was his son's This is shewn by the directions to the trustees contained in the fourth, h, eighth, and ninth trust-purposes. These provided (4) for the mainten- the son wherever the trustees should consider most for his advantage mfort; (7) for the occupation of Kincardine Lodge, offices, and garden, ome farm, by his wife, or, if she approved, by her and his son together, as his son continued unmarried, and for the sole possession of Kincardine offices, and garden by the son if he should marry with the approbation of stees; (8) in the event of the son marrying with such approbation, for

This interlocutor was reclaimed against by Miss Emily M. E. Jo Gordon, and by Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie and others, under a trust-disposition dated 15th and 16th October 1872, by the said Miss Anne E. A. Johnstone Gordon, now Mrs Mu kenzie, whose trustees had been sisted, and allowed to reclaim the said judgment of the Lord Ordinary by an interlocutor dat November 1872.

The reclaimers argued;—According to the theory of Scotch annuity, being an obligation having a tract of future time, would n fall on the heritable property, and the fact that the property is dis be entailed makes no difference.[1] There is no express provisior matter, for the truster evidently expected his son to survive his w which case this question could not have arisen. That being so, t fall back on the common law rule. The payment of the residue entail of the estate are to be unico contextu, and that could only by throwing the annuity on the entailed estate.

Argued for the respondent;—A money annuity is not a natura on heritage. No doubt at common law the heir is liable for it executor. But this is an accident, and probably arose from the i the heir of a debtor should be liable for that of which the heir of a has the benefit. But this cannot be said of an annuity to a widow other estate" means all estate which is not otherwise destine trustees were to realise the estate other than Kincardine, for the inter alia, of satisfying the truster's obligations under the n contract.

the application of the yearly revenue of his whole other means and e the benefit, maintenance, and comfort of his son and his son's wife an and (9) failing the son marrying and having lawful issue, for the exe the entail of Kincardine, in so far as the destination in the second trus should then apply. Until that entail came to be executed on the so the duty of the trustees was to hold the lands of Kincardine and other to be entailed; to realise the whole other trust-estate, and fulfil and the widow's annuity and other marriage-contract obligations; to pay the legacies and donations, among which are included the sum of £1000, directed the trustees (sixth purpose) to pay to his widow, 'besides t ances made by her marriage-contract;' and to apply the free yearly remaining for the maintenance of his son, and also of his son's family s marry with the approbation of the trustees. The trust-disposition an ment is not well drawn; but upon a careful consideration of its pro seems to the Lord Ordinary to be clear that the testator's intention that the directions which he accordingly gave to his trustees are, that his annuity should be fulfilled and discharged, and that the legacies and e left by him should be paid out of the means and estate thereby convey trustees other than the estate of Kincardine, which he directed them and that the said estate of Kincardine should upon the death of his s tailed free from the burden of these legacies and donations, and of the annuity. This construction is in accordance also with the directions e in the ninth trust-purpose, whereby the trustees are directed, on the his son, without issue, to pay 'the residue and remainder of my said m estate, heritable and moveable (excepting the said lands directed to be as aforesaid),' to the children of his daughter, excepting such of them s succeed to the entailed lands,—that is, as the Lord Ordinary considers, due of the trust-estate, exclusive of the lands directed to be entailed whi remain after fulfilling and discharging the marriage-contract obligation legacies and donations, and maintaining his son."

LORD BENHOLME.—This is a process of multiplepoinding raised by the trustees and executors of the late Francis Gordon of Kincardine against Mrs Gordon or Scott, wife of Mr Scott of Gala, and others, for the purpose of ascertaining the equal distribution of the trust-estate of Mr Gordon. Mr Gordon died in the year 1857, leaving a widow, a son, and a daughter. It appears that the son was weak in his mind, and esteemed by his father incapable of managing his own affairs; and as for the daughter, she had, in respect of a provision made upon her at her marriage, renounced all claim on her father's succession. The widow, besides other gifts, was entitled to an annuity of £400, and I may observe that although this multiplepoinding raises several minor questions in regard to the distribution of Mr Gordon's estate, the only point that has been decided by the Lord Ordinary, and the only point to which your Lordships' attention was called, was the question upon what part of this estate, whether upon the heritable landed estate of Kincardine O'Neil, or upon the money, the residuary part of it, this annuity of £400 was a primary burden. "Secondly, In the event of my only son James marrying with the consent of my said trustees, or quorum foresaid, and having a family, for the purpose of conveying and disponing to his eldest son and the heirs-male of his body the said lands of Kincardine O'Neil, and my said other lands above described, all lying within the said parish of Kincardine O'Neil, under strict entail, with all necessary clauses; whom failing, to his second son and the heirs-male of his body, and so on through the other sons of my said son; whom failing, to the eldest daughter of my said son and the heirs-male of her body; whom failing, to the second daughter of my said son and to the heirs-male of her body, and so on through the other daughters of my said son; whom failing, to the eldest son of my said daughter by her present or any future husband, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the second son of my said daughter by her present or any future husband and the heirs-male of his body, and so on through her other sons; whom failing, to the eldest daughter by her present or any future husband, and the heirs-male of her body; whom failing, to the second daughter of my said daughter by her present or any future husband and the heirs-male of her body, and so on through the other daughters of my said daughter; whom all failing, to my own nearest heirs and assignees: Thirdly, For the purpose of realising my other estate, heritable and moveable, and above conveyed, and of fulfilling and discharging the obligations contained in the marriage-contract executed by me and my dear spouse, Isabella Gordon, as well as for implementing and paying the legacies and donations which may be left by me in any last will or other writing, however informal, which I may execute, or which may be found in my own custody or that of any other person after my death." "Sixthly, For the purpose of paying to my said spouse, besides the allowances made by her marriage-contract, the sum of £1000 sterling on the first 20th of June or December twelve months after my death." "Ninthly, Failing my said son marrying and having lawful issue, for the purpose of paying and applying the residue and remainder of my said means and estate, heritable and moveable (excepting the said lands directed to be entailed as aforesaid), on my said son's death, to the children of my said daughter, whether of her present or any future marriage, and that equally; and in the said event the said lands directed to be entailed shall be entailed by my said trustees, or quorum foresaid, as aforesaid, so far as the foregoing destination in article second hereof will then apply, excepting always from any share of said residue the person or persons succeeding to the said entailed lands, who shall have right only to £1000 sterling out of such residue on my son's death: Declaring hereby that the period of vesting of the provisions hereby made in favour of the children of my said daughter shall be as at the death of their mother if she shall have survived my said son, or as at the death of my said son if she shall have predeceased him."

Jan. 22, 1873. Gordon v. Scott.

Now, what took place was this:—The truster's son died unmarried in the year 1871, his sister (the daughter of Mr Gordon) had died in the year 1863, having three daughters, who are parties to this multiplepoinding, and whose interests are at stake in regard to the point which we have to determine. Thes daughters were, in the first place, Mrs Scott, who married Mr Scott of Gala; another lady, who married Mr Muir Mackenzie; and a third, who is still unmar ried. As regards the estate of Kincardine O'Neil it falls to be conveyed unde strict entail to Mrs Scott of Gala with a number of substitutes; and, in respe of her becoming the institute in the entail of that estate, she does not share i the distribution of the pecuniary residue of the estate except to the extent o £1000. Now, the question occurs, whether the annuity of £400 to which th widow is entitled shall be made a burden on the rents of the entailed estate which Mrs Scott is entitled, or shall be paid out of the pecuniary residue, whic I think, chiefly consists of an heritable bond for about £7000. It is very cle that there is here no question of intestate succession. In a question of intest succession, the circumstance that this provision for the widow bears a tract o future time, being an annuity, would have had a very important effect in th solution of this question, because, by our intestate law of succession, such pro sions bearing a tract of future time fall to be paid, cæteris paribus, out of t heritable succession. They fall as a natural burden on the heir. But in th case there is nothing left to the determination of intestate succession. Eve thing is settled by distinct provision on the part of the testator. He has by h trust-deed appointed an entail to be executed, of which Mrs Scott is the fi institute, with a provisional substitution; and, in respect that she takes th heritable estate, she is debarred from sharing in the pecuniary part of the su cession which forms the residue, except to the extent of £1000. Now, as th pecuniary succession goes to the two younger sisters, the question arises, a they not bound also to provide for the widow's annuity amongst other deb of the testator which fall to be defrayed out of their portion of the succes It has been ingeniously argued that it naturally falls on the successive heirs entail who take the landed estate (they drawing the rents for an indefinite peri of time) to pay the annuity that is due to the widow. There was a good de of plausibility in that, but I see no ground in law for it. This is a pecunia obligation which may be discharged by purchasing an annuity, and there is nothi in my opinion in that circumstance which goes so far as to throw this obligati upon the heiress of entail in the present case, because the succession of the testa here is to be regulated not by the rules of intestate succession but by his ow personal declaration. It appears to me, my Lords, that the part of his tru deed in which he appoints the trustees to realise his other estate, heritable a moveable, and fulfil and discharge the obligations contained in the marria contract between him and his wife, clearly ascertains that the fund out of whi not only his legacies and donations were to be paid, but also the provisions the marriage-contract between him and his spouse were to be defrayed, was t moveable succession or residue. Indeed, the very character of the residue seem to me to impose the obligation that is here mentioned upon that part of his su cession. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, whi deals with that question and that question alone, is a right decision.

On appeal the Sheriff (Glassford Bell) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the interlocutor appealed against correctly sets forth the time when, the place where, and the circumstances under which the pursuer sustained the injuries for which he now seeks reparation against the defenders; as also the general nature and extent of said injuries; but, quoad ultra, and in as far as said interlocutor finds that the defenders are not responsible to the pursuer for said injuries, and assoilzies them from the conclusions of the summons, recalls the same, and finds on the contrary, that it is proved that the defenders, in violation of the legal obligation incumbent on them as carriers of passengers for hire, as well as in violation of the rules of their company, failed to keep the door on the off-side from the Glasgow platform, in the compartment of the railway carriage in which the pursuer was travelling, properly shut and fastened, in consequence of which, while the train was proceeding between the Bishopbriggs and Lenzie Junction Stations, and while the pursuer was in the act of leaning with his elbow on the said door, it suddenly flew open, and the pursuer fell out upon the line and sustained the injuries which necessitated the immediate amputation of his left arm, besides severely impairing his health and physical system: Finds that the pursuer, who wrought as a moulder, had been earning wages which averaged about 35s. a-week, but he cannot now work as a moulder, and is not able to earn more than from 10s. to 12s. a-week: Finds, in these circumstances, and under reference to the annexed note, the defenders liable to the pursuer in the sum of £150 sterling in name of damages and solatium: Finds them also liable in expenses; allows an account," &c.*

* "NOTE.—It is not without hesitation that the Sheriff has differed from the view taken by the Sheriff-substitute of this case; but after mature consideration he cannot help being of opinion that the facts are such as throw responsibility on the defenders. One thing is certain, to begin with, and is not disputed, that when the pursuer fell out of the carriage in which he was travelling the door through which he fell was open. Now, although the mere occurrence of an accident may not always afford prima facie evidence of negligence, in some cases res ipsa loquitur, and the accident may be of such a nature that a presumption of negligence arises from its occurrence—(See Hodges on Railways, 4th ed., 532). Here the door should have been securely fastened, and it was open, and the defence is that it was fastened when the train started, and that it must have been subsequently opened by the pursuer himself. The onus of proving this lies, it is thought, with the defenders. In M'Aulay, December 9th, 1846, Lord Jeffrey said,—'I concur in the view of Lord Fullerton, that, in all cases of this kind, the proprietor is entitled to no presumption of innocence. He must prove that it was an accident, and failing his proving that, the pursuer is entitled to her verdict.' The defenders' leading witness, Walter M'Taggart, the sole guard on the train, cannot be said to be an entirely neutral party, for he was guilty of a serious breach of duty if the door was not fastened. He swears—'Before the train started from Glasgow I satisfied myself that all the carriages had the doors on the right side going from Glasgow shut and locked. That is the off side under the defenders' regulations;' and again, 'I locked every one of the doors on the right side at Glasgow before the train started. The train had ten carriages and two break vans, being one carriage more than usual for the train at that hour.' The first observation upon this is, that if it is true then the off side door, not only of the compartment in which the pursuer travelled, but of various other compartments, must have been unlocked, and not again locked, as they should have been, at Cowlairs, because it is proved beyond all doubt that when the pursuer fell out and the train was brought to a stand a number of passengers turned the handles of the doors on the off-sides of their carriages, and not finding them locked walked out on to the line to see what had happened. The train had stopped before this only at Cowlairs and Bishopbriggs, and the

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and it was argued for em, that the presumption being that the door was shut, the onus lay ers could not have been interfered with at the latter place, because they were t on the side next the platform at which the train drew up. There were three rd class carriages in front, and the pursuer was in the one next the engine. ter Ferguson, one of the defenders' porters at Cowlairs, says that he there locked and then relocked two of these carriages. But this cannot be true if means that he relocked all the off-side doors of these two carriages, because it proved that persons who were travelling in them found them unlocked after accident happened; and if Ferguson did not unlock them then they cannot re been locked by M'Taggart at Glasgow. William Hay, the defenders' other ter at Cowlairs, says he unlocked some of the doors there, but that he shut d locked all that he had unlocked. This is a vague statement, which does t much affect the case. The important fact is, that whilst the defenders may t have been under any obligation to the public to keep the doors locked, their law (see rule 290 of No. 13) made it a part of the duty of their guards and sters to keep the off-side doors locked, and, in point of fact, this duty must ve been neglected on the present occasion. If so, it becomes less impossible at the duty to the public of keeping the doors properly fastened may also have en neglected. The guard M'Taggart admits that he did not personally fasten e doors at Cowlairs, but he says the porters stated to him that they were all ht, and that he saw by taking a glance along the train that the handles were a position which indicated that they were turned so as to keep the doors sed. This is very loose evidence, and cannot be regarded as sufficient to tablish the fact. What is much more material is, that it is proved by the stinct depositions of several witnesses that the off-side door of the compartment in which the pursuer was, which was on the near-side at Cowlairs, but where else, was not opened there, that the handle of the door was never ached, and that no one either went in or out of the compartment, which was ready full, either at Cowlairs or Bishopbriggs. The door, therefore, must have en in the same condition at both of these places as it was when the train left lasgow. Some evidence has been led with the view of shewing that if the ndle had not been properly down in the sneck the motion and jolting of the riage as it proceeded must have caused the door to fly open long before the nsuer fell out. But this is hypothetical. The door may have been jammed tty stiffly in its place, and may have required a certain pressure from within fore it opened. The defenders' own witness, James M'Laren, their general perintendent, says,—'It is possible that a door might be shut nearly close, t not quite close, and that the sneck should not have been in its place, and at in this case the handle should have been horizontal and apparently all ht;' and the witness adds, 'The doors when closed are flush with the outside e of the carriage, but there is a thin strip of iron or wood beading, about a arter of an inch thick or less, outside, to keep the carriage water-tight.' Up this point, then, it seems impossible for the defenders to escape from the lemma that, if the door had been properly fastened, it would not have flown en, and that, if it did fly open, it had not been properly fastened. The defenders' final suggestion therefore is, that the pursuer must have put his arm t and turned the handle himself. Now, as to this it is not, in the first place, be denied that the pursuer when he entered the train was to a certain extent der the influence of liquor; but it is not proved that he was in such a conion as not to know perfectly well what he was doing, and it is proved that conduct in the carriage was in no way offensive. The pursuer himself says, 'I was quite capable at the time, but might have felt the drink in my head. . . . I was not the worse of liquor at all. My head might have been a le light with drink.' His fellow passenger, Agnes M'Kechnie, says,—'He l been drinking, but seemed able to take care of himself;' and another senger, Mrs Janet M'Lean or Clelland, says,—'He had got a glass of spirits, nobody would have thought there was anything wrong with him, either in upon the pursuer to prove that it had been left open, and that failed to discharge that onus. It was not sufficient to prove that was not locked, because it was the duty of the company's servants the door, but not to lock it.[1] Besides, the pursuer, by rashly against the door, contributed to the accident in such a degree t if he proved neglect against the defenders he had no recourse them for damages.

Argued for the pursuer;—It was the duty of the company's not only to fasten but to lock the off-side doors, in terms of t rule of the company, and upon the evidence it appeared that the not even been fastened. The company, therefore, was liable.[2]

talking or walking.' The account which the pursuer gives of what oc the carriage immediately before the accident happened is corroborated witnesses, so that his recollection must have been pretty correct. swears is, that no one entered or left the compartment at Cowlairs; t passing Bishopbriggs he rose to look out at the window and lit a mat went out, and immediately afterwards he lit another, and lighted his it; that he then went with the pipe in his mouth to look out at the that he had his elbow on the ledge of the door, and was going to look that before he got out his head the door opened and he fell out; that had not been opened by any one before that, and that neither he no inside the compartment had touched the handle of the door. Variou who were in the same compartment confirm this. James O'Hara, moul —'No one that I saw touched the handle of the door on the right side have seen if any one did so.' He then describes, as the pursuer does latter went twice to the window and leant his arm on it; and adds,—' thing I saw was the door opening and him falling out. I was observir the time. I must have seen if he had leant his hands out of the sp the door.' He farther states, what seems important, 'I account for opening the second time and not the first time from the train ha going at full speed when it opened, and so the carriage was not smo time. When pursuer first leant out it was not going so fast.' Peter says,—'As the pursuer was putting his head out of the window I saw fly open and him fall out. He did not put his hands outside so far He could not have done so without my seeing him at the time. He time to lean heavily against the door before it flew open.' Mrs Clella —'The door flew open immediately on the pursuer going to it, and body going against it. It seemed all right before that.' Miss Agnes M one of the defenders' witnesses, says,—'The pursuer put his hand on but did not look out of it. The door thereupon gave way. Pursue threaten to leave the carriage before he fell out.' Finally, Mary another witness for the defenders, says,—'Pursuer when he looked ou to stand without any support. I thought him able to take care of hin was quiet in the train. There was no quarrelling. . . . I did n hands outside the door. I think I would have observed if his hands outside. I did not see any one touch the door handle from leaving G the accident.' There is not one particle of evidence contradictory which not only does not support, but goes directly to subvert the t the opening of the door was an act of the pursuer's own. The simple fore remains, that through the negligence of some one, for whom the are responsible, there was an unsecured door through which, on its un opening, the pursuer fell and got himself maimed for life, and there to shew that he was contributory in any way to this misfortune, o defenders are entitled to be relieved on any other ground from th resulting from sending a passenger carriage in an unsafe condition line."

No. 57.

Jan. 23, 1873. Cassidy v. North British Railway Co.

RD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The grounds upon which this action is brought are explained in the summons: The defenders ought to pay damages to the ner, "inasmuch as the pursuer having paid his fare as, and having been, a nger to Kirkintilloch in the train which left Glasgow for Kirkintilloch on evening of Wednesday the 20th day of July 1870 years, at a quarter before t o'clock; and the defenders, or their servants, for whom they are responsible, iolation of the legal obligations incumbent on them as carriers of passengers ire, as well as in violation of the rules of the said railway company, having d to keep the door on the off-side from the Glasgow platform, in the com-ment in which the pursuer had taken his seat, locked and fastened; and the ner, while the train was proceeding, having risen from his seat for the pur-of looking out of the open window in the said door, and when he was in act of leaning his elbow on the said door, it suddenly flew open, and the ner fell out upon the line, whereby he sustained severe bodily injuries."

he Sheriff-substitute has found in this case upon the proof that it has not a proved that the door was not locked and fastened in violation of the rules, he has further found that it has not been proved that the injuries to the ner arose from the fault of defenders. The Sheriff-principal has taken a erent view of the case, and I am of opinion that he is right.

omething has been submitted to us in argument on the question of onus, though in some cases that is a very material consideration, I do not think it ecessary for us to deal with it in this case, for in my opinion it has been rly proved that, as a matter of fact, the accident to the pursuer resulted from negligence of the defenders, and so there is no room for question here whether onus thrown upon either party has been discharged.

t is quite clear from the evidence that the door of the carriage in which the ner was was not locked, and that it ought to have been locked under the es of the railway company. In regard to this rule, that the doors on the side of the carriages must be locked, it is argued for the defenders that the blic are not interested in the observance of this rule, and that it is merely a tter between the railway company and its servants. I cannot agree with s remark, and although I do not think that the evidence that the door was t locked is essential to the result at which I have arrived, yet I think that it ght not to be left out of view. The evidence, however, goes further than this, d besides proving that the door was not locked, it proves that it was not tened. Now, if the door was not fastened at the time when the accident ppened there are only two ways in which that could have occurred, either, t, somebody must have opened it after the train started from Cowlairs, or, ondly, it must never have been fastened at all. As regards the first of these ernatives—and this is the turning point of the case—it is clearly stated in e evidence that no one in the carriage did open it, and many who were in the rriage were examined. As to the pursuer the evidence is that he was somewhat ttered, but that he could take care of himself, and no one saw him put his nd out of the window, which they would almost certainly have done if he had. think the evidence of Agnes M'Kechnie is very much to the point, and I was uch struck by it. She says:—"After leaving Bishopriggs he rose and looked t of the right hand window of the carriage for a moment. He looked up and wn the train. He leant on the door with his head and shoulders out. I can-t say if his hands were out. I did not see them out. He sat down after that, d rose a few minutes after. He then put his hand on the door, but did not ok out of it. The door thereupon gave way." So, upon the whole evidence, the question,—Did the pursuer open the door himself?—must be answered yes no, I have no difficulty in answering it in the negative.

This being so, the evidence is clearly in favour of the pursuer, for the only ternative is that the railway porters did not shut the door. Now, the evidence r the pursuer is, that at the time of the accident the door was open, and that did not open it, and against that there is the evidence of the railway porters, o say that they shut and locked the door. But it is proved that they did not lock the door, and so we cannot trust their memory when they say that th shut the door. It is said that the door was certainly locked at Glasgow. I a not sure of this, for the evidence goes to shew that nobody unlocked it at Co lairs. But whether it was locked at Glasgow, and unlocked at Cowlairs, whether it was never locked at all, does not much matter, for in either case t door was not locked through the negligence of the defenders' servants.

It was further said that the guard saw all the handles horizontal, whi shewed that the doors were fastened. But this evidence is not reliable, for was only when the train was in motion after leaving Bishopriggs stati that he observed that all the handles were horizontal, which they mig have been although the door was not close shut. The evidence does not sh that before starting from that station—which was the last stoppage before t accident—he saw that the door of the carriage in which the pursuer was fastened.

Now, as we have already seen, the evidence shews that the pursuer did n open the door himself. If, as is alleged in the statement of facts for the defend there had been quarrelling between the pursuer and his wife, or any other c cumstance to shew excitement on his part, it would have been more probab that he should have opened the door, but it is proved that nothing of the s occurred. I am therefore of opinion that we should adhere to the judgment the Sheriff.

Lord Cowan.—I take the same view of the case. I am not at all sure th it is not enough for judgment that the door of this carriage was not locked. think that these regulations as to locking carriages may be held as imperati on the company as the regulations in regard to signals, and as regulations in t one case as in the other, in the observance of which the public safety is co sidered. Where the rules as to signals have not been observed the railw company are certainly liable in damages for injuries occasioned by their no observance on the part of their servants. I apprehend that the regulations to locking the off-doors of carriages are not mere internal arrangements of t company, but a matter in which the passengers have a very material inter But it is not necessary to decide this case on that ground, though it is a po which cannot be left out of view in estimating the general evidence applica to the proper shutting and fastening the door of this carriage out of which t pursuer fell. It is quite certain that this door was not locked, otherwise th accident could not have occurred; yet to this the company's officials depone they do to the door having been properly shut. This is not the conclusion wh the evidence as a whole has led me to adopt. I think it proved that the do was not shut. Whether it was left open at Glasgow or at Cowlairs is of lit consequence, for undoubtedly when the train left Cowlairs it ought to have be in a safe state, with all the doors properly shut. As the door was clearly n shut when the pursuer fell out, it must either have been left open at Glasgow Cowlairs, or some one must have subsequently opened it. I think it prove that no one in the carriage opened it, and the only alternative, assuming it h have been fastened at Glasgow, is that it was opened by the company's servan at Cowlairs and not again shut. I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff's interlocutor is well founded, although some of the findings may require to b modified.

Lord Benholme and Lord Neaves concurred.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the even libelled occurred in consequence of one of the doors of th carriage in which the pursuer travelled not being properly close and fastened by the handle being turned and the bolt inserte into the holder: Find it proved that the door of the carriag was not opened by the pursuer: Find that it was the duty of th servants of the defenders, for whom they are responsible, to clo and fasten the door of the carriage by turning the handle an

:OBERT DONALDSON, joiner, Lockerbie, applied for the benefit of cessio rum in the Sheriff-court of Dumfries. In the note appended to state ffairs given in under sec. 4 of 6 and 7 Will. This property was purchased at the price of £200 from the cerbie Building Society in or about the year 1867. When the purchase effected only £50 of the purchase money was paid, a bond being then ted to the society for the remaining £150. The portion of the hase money actually paid was advanced by the petitioner's wife and ghter, who had saved that sum in keeping lodgers in the house, and as intended that on this account the conveyance should be taken in e of his wife. By an oversight, however, this was not done, but it taken to petitioner, and the property remained in the petitioner's e down till March 1871, when, in conformity with the original ngement, he conveyed it to his wife, still subject to the bond for £150. and prior to the date of the conveyance to his wife petitioner was not r solvent but was actually in good circumstances, being more than able neet his liabilities, and having always something to the good." In the mination before the Sheriff the petitioner stated that he was not "in- ed to sign a deed of revocation of said disposition."

Villiam Thomson and Company, who were creditors, objected to the nting of the cessio, because the pursuer refused to sign a deed of revo- on.

the conveyance in question to his wife as a condition precedent to ob ing his cessio is not a sufficient reason for refusing it: Therefore re the interlocutor appealed against: Finds the pursuer entitled to the be of the process of cessio bonorum; and with these findings in fact and remits the case back to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed accordingly.

The respondents, Thomson and Company, appealed to the Cou Session. They argued that the petitioner was bound to revoke the position to his wife before getting decree in his favour. The dispos being a donation inter virum et uxorem was revocable. The wife follow the fortunes of her husband.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the Sheriff is right. The peculiarity of the is that there is no suggestion of fraud or improper conduct on the part o pursuer of the cessio. He seems to have made a full disclosure of his a The only objection is that he has conveyed a house to his wife. Now value of the house, after deducting the debt to the building society, is £50. The disposition of the house was intended as a provision for the and, if the pursuer was solvent at the time, was the performance of a n obligation. The objection stated by the creditor is not that the disposition granted after bankruptcy, or in contemplation of bankruptcy, but that th suer refused to execute a revocation of the disposition. It is doubtful if he revoke. If it is revocable sequestration would operate a revocation, and revocable, the creditor is not entitled to call upon him to execute a deed of cation as a condition of obtaining liberation.

PRESIDENT.—The question in this special case is whether the testamen- tings left by Thomas Edmond are sufficient to convey to his wife his as well as his moveable estate. This depends on the meaning of the themselves, and on a construction of the 20th section of the Titles to Land 868. With regard to the writings themselves, it is not impossible to spell em an intention that his wife should have the heritable as well as the move- perty; and I should be disposed to say that such was his intention. But ot sufficient for the disposal of the present question, because the statute does that, whatever the way or manner in which the intention has been ex- it is to have effect given to it. The clause begins by enacting that lands conveyed by testamentary deeds as well as by dispositions. In the second provides that no testamentary deed shall be insufficient to convey lands on nd that the word "dispone" has not been used. Now, it would not have essary to have enacted these two provisions if the statute had contained ng provision that any expression of intention would be enough to convey The third part of the clause is thus expressed,—"Where such deed or writ- hat is, a testamentary or mortis causa deed or writing, purporting to or bequeath land,—"shall not be expressed in the terms required by the law or practice for the conveyance of lands, but shall contain, with to such lands, any word or words which would, if used in a will or it with reference to moveables, be sufficient to confer upon the executor anter, or upon the grantee or legatee of such moveables, a right to claim or receive the same, such deed or writing if duly executed in the m required or permitted in the case of any testamentary writing by the l Scotland, shall be deemed or taken to be equivalent to a general disposit such lands." In order to bring a testamentary writing purporting to convey within the meaning of this part of the clause it is necessary that it contain which would be sufficient to express a gift of moveables. It is not enoug the granter shall nominate an heir as he would an executor and universal le It is plain that there must be words—I do not say of conveyance, but of with reference to such lands, or, in other words, a gift of the lands. He granter does not use words of bequest of the "property." Now, if he had stopped there we might have had a strong arg that heritable property was meant to be included. But he goes on to de from the general bequest, by the enumeration of "money, bonds, debets, ness, and other affects whatsoever." I think, upon the rules of construction a able to discharges and other writs of a like description, enumeration be held to derogate from a generality. The only word at all general follows is "affects." We have already decided in Pitcairn's case that "e does not include heritage. I am therefore of opinion that the heritable goes to the heir-at-law and not to the widow.

Lord Deas.—The most favourable way for the widow in which to take writings is to consider them together as forming one writ. Taking them a are only two words which can be said to support the contention for the —these are the word "business" and the word "heir." The use of the "heir" cannot, however, be said to import a conveyance of the whole he property. As to the word "business" I cannot construe it as includin equivalent to the words "lease of the hotel." The whole length the goes is, that words of gift shall have the same effect with regard to herit they would have with regard to moveables. The evident intention statute was to dispense with any technical word or words formerly nec in our law for the disposition of heritage. It was not intended to di with a distinct expression of the testator's will. He must use words of gi say what it is which he intends to be gifted. If he wishes to bequeath his heritable property he has only to say so; or if he wishes to bequeath a it, he has only to say distinctly what part. It may be very probabl this man thought he had given his widow the lease of the hotel. B statute does not go the length of making a mere probability sufficient was never sufficient before. It dispenses with technical words, but it do substitute conjecture for words of a distinct or definite meaning.

Lord Ardmillan.—I have had great difficulty in this case, and it i diffidence that I say I cannot concur with your Lordships in the opinio have pronounced.

I quite admit and refer to the words which I made use of in the previo of Pitcairn. In that case we were of opinion that the word "effects," in i textual position, did not mean heritage. I am still of the opinion whic pressed in that case. What the clause of the statute provides is, that a b shall be effectual as regards lands, if, (1) moveable property would have carried by the words of the writing; and, if, (2) the meaning of the writ plainly to comprehend heritage. If, then, the true meaning of this writing he meant to convey to his wife the house in which he conducted his bu the statute will come in to make the bequest effectual.

We must construe the writing, but in doing so we must read it in the afforded by some circumstances in the case which are of importance. writer had long carried on his business of hotel-keeper in this particular of which he had a long lease: he had no child; his nearest heir was an In these circumstances he executed this first writing, which we must re connection with the subsequent writings on the same paper. When tak that way it comes to mean "in the event of my wife surviving me, I h appoint her my heir and executrix, and bequeath to her the whole of m

erty in money, in bonds, in debts, in business, and in other effects whatsoever," &c. If that be the meaning of these writings, then you have a conveyance to his wife of his property in his business. And his business was that of an innkeeper conducted in that house. The house was held on lease, and used for his business; and it may naturally and reasonably be viewed as within the meaning of property in business. I go no further than saying that it appears to me to mean an effectual conveyance of the lease of that particular house to his wife. I do not say that was a good conveyance of the other heritable subjects. I consider, however, that by "business" there is meant something beyond money or debts, and something beyond furniture, plate, &c., which may be included in the word "effects"; thinking so, I cannot help coming to the conclusion that he meant to leave her the business, and the goodwill of the business, and the house in which it was carried on. If he meant this, the bequest is sufficient under the recent Act. If it is within the meaning and the scope of the description in the writings, then the power of conveyance is helped out by the provision of the statute. The meaning of this man's writing, reading it fairly and bearing in mind his position, is evidently to bequeath his business, which was his inn, and the goodwill of it, and the lease of the inn, without which the goodwill would be of no use. The statute then comes in and gives effect to the words of the bequest, so as to make them habile to convey heritage.

I agree entirely with your Lordships in holding that it is very undesirable and inexpedient to extend the provisions of this statute too far. It was not meant to enable the Court out of every loose expression to spell out an intention to convey heritage, and give effect to it, as though it were sufficient conveyance, and so defeat the rights of the heir. The meaning must be plain. But I humbly think it plain enough in this case.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred with the Lord President.

THE Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find and declare, in answer to the first question, that the testamentary writings of the deceased Thomas Edmond are not expressed in terms valid and sufficient, under the 20th section of the 'Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland Act, 1868,' to operate as a general disposition mortis causa of the deceased's heritable estate in favour of the party of the first part; and find and declare, in answer to the second question, that the party of the second part is entitled to succeed to the said Thomas Edmond's heritable estate as his heir-at-law ab intestato, and decern."

THIS was an action of reduction of a policy of assurance brought by the Life Association of Scotland against Jane Foster and others, who had acquired right to the policy by an assignation from the late Mrs Foster, the insured. In the month of May 1871 Mrs Foster made to the pursuers a written proposal for an assurance of £300 upon her life. In the proposal it was stated that her age at next birthday was fifty-two years; and to the proposal was appended a declaration in the following terms, signed by Mrs Foster on 19th May 1871:—"I, Mary Waugh or Foster, before designed, do hereby declare that I am at present in good health, not being afflicted with any disorder, external or internal; that the preceding statements are true, and that I have not withheld or concealed any important circumstance. And I" (the party in whose favour the assurance is to be effected) "do hereby agree that this declaration shall be the basis of the contract between me and the Life Association of Scotland, and that if any untrue averment be made therein, or in the anwers to questions by the society's medical officer in reference to this proposal, all sums paid on account of the assurance shall be forfeited, and the assurance be null and void.

Of the same date a number of questions contained in the printed form used by the pursuers were put to Mrs Foster by James Moffat, the medical officer acting on behalf of the pursuers; and her answers to the questions were in her presence written down by him, and afterwards signed by her, along with the declaration after mentioned. The fourth of the questions was as follows:—"Are you now, in your own opinion, in perfect health?" Mrs Foster's answer was, "Yes." The fifth question was "What ailments and medical advice have you had?" and to this Mrs Foster answered—"Never had any ailments except those diseases common to childhood, such as measles, &c., and never had medical attendance except during my confinements." The sixth question put to Mrs Foster was as follows:—"Have you had rheumatism, gout, rupture, fits, asthma, spitting of blood, disease of the chest, or any affection of the kidneys or urinary organs?" and to this question Mrs Foster answered "No." To these statements made by Mrs Foster in presence of the medical officer there was appended the following declaration, signed by Mrs Foster:—"I, the person whose life is proposed for assurance, declare that the above statements are faithful and true; and I undertake that, in the event of my having rupture, either now or at any other future time, I will constantly wear a properly-adjusted rupture truss."

The pursuers alleged (Cond. 6)—"In reliance and on the faith of the said declaration and statements made by Mrs Foster as aforesaid being true the pursuers issued to her a policy, dated 24th May 1871, No. 18,213 A, upon her own life, for the sum of £300, which policy bears to be upon the basis of the said declaration of 19th May 1871, and acknowledges that she has paid (as she did, in fact, pay) the sum of £15, 2s. 6d. as the premium for the assurance for one year from 1st April 1871. By the said policy it was, inter alia, expressly stipulated and agreed, 'That if anything averred in the foresaid declaration forming the basis of the assurance, or in the relative statements, be untrue, this policy

d assurance shall be void, and all moneys paid in respect therof shall forfeited to the Association.'" (Cond. 7) "The pursuers have discovered, and it is the fact, that at and for several months prior to the date the said declaration and answers, and of the said policy, Mrs Foster d inguinal hernia or rupture; farther, at and for months prior to the id dates, a tumour or swelling on the groin had made itself distinctly rceptible. She was fully cognisant at, and for several months prior to, e said dates, of the existence of this tumour or swelling. This tumour swelling was caused by the hernia or rupture under which Mrs Foster boured, and it would at once have indicated to any medical man the prence of the disease; but its existence was not mentioned by Mrs Foster." ond. 8) "The said rupture afterwards became worse, and the medical man ho attended Mrs Foster on 16th November endeavoured to effect duction of the rupture, which was then incarcerated, by the usual eans, but it was found that the rupture could not be entirely reduced. n 18th November the said rupture or hernia was found to be strangutted, and the necessary operation was performed on the same day; but, vertheless, gangrene set in, and Mrs Foster died on 30th November. er death was the direct result of the rupture from which she was suffer-g, as aforesaid, at and prior, as well as subsequent, to 19th May 1871." ond. 9) "The existence of the said rupture was a fact highly material the contract of assurance entered into between the pursuers and Mrs ster. If she had disclosed the existence thereof, or of the tumour or elling whereby the same was manifested, to the pursuers or their edical officer, the pursuers would have had the rupture carefully exnined; and unless it had proved to be reducible, they would not have tered into a contract of assurance upon the life of Mrs Foster at all; d even if the rupture had proved to be reducible, they would not have tered into such contract until it had been reduced and supported by proper truss. Further, even in that case, an additional premium would ve been charged for the risk." (Cond. 11) "Further, in failing to disose the existence of the said tumour or swelling by which the said rupre was manifested, Mrs Foster withheld or concealed an important and terial circumstance affecting the risk undertaken by the said policy."

The defenders denied that Mrs Foster was suffering from rupture at the te of the policy, and stated that she had no knowledge or suspicion that e was suffering from such a complaint until she was suddenly taken ill.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The averments made by Mrs Foster, as foresaid, having been untrue, the said policy, and the assurance bearing be thereby effected, has been and is null and void, in terms of the conitions to that effect contained in the said declaration of 19th May 1871, nd in the policy itself. (2) At all events, the said policy is reducible nd ought to be reduced, in respect that in making the said statements Mrs Foster made misrepresentations, and concealed facts highly material to the contract of assurance upon her life.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Before farther nswer, allows to the parties a proof of their respective averments on record; appoints the said proof to be led before the Lord Ordinary, under The Evidence (Scotland) Act, 1866; and appoints the case to be enrolled that a diet of proof may be fixed, but grants leave to reclaim against this interlocutor." *

* "NOTE.—At one part of the debate the defenders seemed inclined to ask a judgment on relevancy without any proof at all, but ultimately both parties appeared to be satisfied that a judgment on relevancy on the record as it now stands, without any farther admissions, would hardly be satisfactory; and the

The defenders reclaimed.

After hearing counsel, the Court allowed a proof before answer. It appeared from the proof that the deceased, at the time when she applied true question ultimately discussed before the Lord Ordinary was, whether there should be a proof before answer, or a jury trial.

"The Lord Ordinary concurs with the parties in thinking that it would be unsafe to dispose of the case on relevancy on the present record, and without proof. The questions of law, whether the statements in a declaration in a policy must in all cases be absolutely true in every particular, that is, in exact accordance with actual fact, or whether it is enough that they are true to the knowledge and bona fide belief of the declarant, also how far the question of materiality is admissible, are extremely delicate, and can only be satisfactorily dealt with when the actual facts are elicited. In all the cases which were referred to the facts were in one shape or other before the Court.

"But then the point arises, in what form is the inquiry to be taken? The pursuers moved for a proof before answer. The defenders keenly resisted this and insisted on their absolute right to have trial by jury.

"The Lord Ordinary cannot accede to the doctrine contended for by the pursuers, that in every case the mode of proof is a mere question of discretion for the Lord Ordinary or the Court, unfettered by any rule whatever. The Act of 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. 100), section 27, was founded on as giving the Lord Ordinary in every case power, when he thinks that there should be no trial by jury, to dispense with issues, and 'determine the manner in which the proof is to be taken.' But besides that this section is modified under powers of the Act by the Act of Sederunt of 1870, it has been expressly decided that the words in question do not give the Lord Ordinary any absolute discretionary power to fix the mode of proof. Thus in the recent case of Nicol v. Britten, 15th January 1872, 10 Macph. 351, it was held that in an enumerated cause, even when both parties consented, it was absolutely incompetent to allow proof by commission.

"It rather appears to the Lord Ordinary that the clause in the Judicature Act of 1825, being section 28, enumerating the causes appropriate to the Jury Court is still unrepealed, and that the only modification of the rule prescribed by the Judicature Act is contained in the 4th section of the Act of 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. 112), which provides that, 'If both parties consent thereto, or if special cause be shewn, it shall be competent to the Lord Ordinary to take proof in the manner above provided in section 1st hereof (that is, before the Lord Ordinary) in any cause which may be in dependence before him, notwithstanding of the provisions contained in the Act passed in the sixth year of the reign of George IV. cap. 120, section 28.'

"If this be so, as there is no consent in the present case, the only question is whether there be 'special cause shewn' why the case should not be tried by jury, for the present action seems to be an enumerated cause, though it is brought by the insurance company, and not by the holder of the policy.

"The Lord Ordinary at first thought that there was no sufficient special cause shewn for depriving the policy-holder of his right to demand a jury trial, for in all such cases there is a risk of delicate questions of law arising; and to hold that this risk is sufficient to substitute a proof before answer for a jury trial would be to do away with jury trial in such causes altogether.

"On farther consideration, however, the Lord Ordinary has come to think, though with great difficulty, and with much hesitation, that the specialties in the present case do constitute 'special cause' for a proof before answer.

"There is no averment of fraud or wilful misrepresentation on the part of the late Mrs Foster, and although 'concealment' of material facts is alleged, it is not maintained that there was anything but the most perfect bona fides on the part of the insurer. Although parties are at issue on many material facts—for example, the very existence of rupture at the date of the policy is denied—still it is plain that the true ultimate question will not be so much a question

e the insurance, and for a year prior to her death, had a small swelling out the size of a walnut on the groin, which did not cause pain or interre with her health, and that she was ignorant of the fact that such relling was a symptom of rupture. It further appeared that the rupre must have subsisted for some months prior to death, and that it ight not have caused any pain, or made its existence known to the ceased.

The pursuers argued;—The only thing which the insurance office oked to was the truth or untruth of the statement. It was of no portance that the insured believed that she was free from disease. rue" meant true in point of fact. The word "faithful" meant at an honest answer had been given to the spirit of the question. the statement had been wilfully untrue, the policy would have been ducible at common law. The contract made in the declaration meant mething more. It meant that the insurance company were conacting with a person who had not rupture. If they had dealt with r on the footing that she might have rupture, the terms would have en different. There was a mutual mistake, and the contract was therere reducible. There was no allegation of fraudulent concealment, but ly that there were here signs which would have indicated to a person ordinary intelligence that there was something wrong, and which ght to have been disclosed. People have no right to state facts not thin their knowledge, and make them the basis of a contract. The swers given here were the basis on which the premiums were calculated. If any of the answers were untrue the policy is void. The sured gave a warranty of the truth of the statements. At common w, a person who applies for an insurance on his life is bound to disse everything which he knows to be material to the risk.[1]

The defenders argued;—The words of the declaration, being proposed the insurance company, must be construed strictly against the company. e declaration by the assured, that the statements were "faithful and e" meant no more than that so far as she knew they were true. "Faithl" meant that the insured acted in good faith. "True" meant true in knowledge of the declarant, who could only speak of her own belief. it were taken to mean absolutely true, the assured would have to state re than she had any means of knowing. The question appealed to the t as a question of law regarding the true import and construction of the licy and relative writs. Now, when this appears certainly the case, the Lord dinary thinks that he is not absolutely bound to raise the question by way of ls of exception or motions for a new trial, but that the certainty of such being e nature of the ultimate question forms a 'special cause' warranting a proof fore answer.

"The Lord Ordinary does not disguise his own opinion that such questions more satisfactorily determined on a proof before answer than after a jury al. But he is conscious that his very leaning against jury trial in such cases ay lead him unduly to stretch the provisions in the Act of 1866. As the matter of some importance, and as it is desirable that, as far as possible, some rule guiding principle should be laid down, the Lord Ordinary has granted leave reclaim."

knowledge of the person to say what she has suffered from. There was no guarantee of the truth of the statement. The whole responsibility was taken off the insured by the examination of the medical officer, who had no right to assume a knowledge of symptoms on the part of Mrs Foster, but ought to have satisfied himself by a personal examination.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In the month of May 1871 the now deceased Mrs Mary Foster made to the pursuers a proposal for an insurance of £300 on her own life, which was accepted, and a policy of insurance was completed accordingly. On the 30th of November following the insured died of inguinal hernia or rupture.

The pursuers in this action contend that the policy is void and the premiums forfeited, because the insured had rupture at the time of effecting the insurance, and because in the declaration and relative papers which form the contract between the parties she warranted that she had not then and never had rupture.

A second ground of action on which the pursuers seek to have the policy declared void is, that the insured concealed or failed to disclose a fact material to the risk.

The evidence shews that Mrs Foster had at the date of the policy and of the proposal a swelling in her groin, of no great size, which to a medical man would or might have indicated the existence of rupture, but that it gave her no pain or uneasiness of any kind, and she attached no importance to it whatever, and never thought of it as a circumstance requiring her to resort to medical advice till the month of November, when in consequence of some unusual exertion the swelling increased suddenly in size, and was found on examination to be of a serious character, and ultimately proved fatal. It is also established by the medical evidence that a rupture in the incipient and undeveloped condition in which this was at the date of the insurance very generally escapes the observation of the person affected, and raises no suspicion in the mind of any one not possessed of medical skill that it indicates anything more serious than the temporary swelling of a gland. Indeed it has been the condition of the argument throughout that Mrs Foster had no knowledge or suspicion that she was affected by any malady, and believed herself to be in perfect health.

The first question, therefore, for the decision of the Court is, whether it was a condition of the contract between the parties that Mrs Foster warranted herself free from rupture.

We have heard a great deal of argument on the authorities and on the principles of law applicable to such questions, which, however, are very well known and ascertained both in Scotland and England. The only real difficulty regards the construction of this particular contract, and the question is, whether by the terms of the contract there was a warranty that the insured was free from rupture or whether her assertion on the subject amounts to no more than an assurance that, so far as she knew or had any reason to believe, she was not affected by that disease.

In the policy there is a proviso "that if anything averred in the declaration forming the basis of the assurance or in the relative documents be untrue the policy and assurance shall be void," &c.

The declaration thus referred to is appended to the proposal, and in it the insured declares "that I am at present in good health, not being afflicted with any disorder, external or internal; that the preceding statements are true, and that I have not withheld or concealed any important circumstance;" and she agrees that the declaration so made shall be the basis of the contract, and that "if any untrue averment be made therein, or in the answers to questions by the

is not alleged by the pursuers that there is any untrue averment in the s of the declaration itself. They admit that Mrs Foster was within the neaning of the words "in good health," and not "afflicted with any disorder, nal or external." Neither could it be maintained that there is any untruth e answers to the questions in the proposal, called in the declaration "the ding statements." But the untruth is said to be contained in one of the ers to the questions put to the insured by the society's medical officer. It nes necessary, therefore, to examine carefully not only the particular answer l on by the pursuers, but the whole paper in which it occurs, and the nature at document, and its relation to the other documents forming the contract surance.

e paper in which these questions are contained is sent by the insurance any to their medical officer, and contains, first, the questions to be put to nsured, printed, with spaces for the answers to be inserted in writing. Then rs a declaration to be signed by the insured in the following terms:—"I, erson whose life is proposed for insurance, declare that the above statements ithful and true, and I undertake that in the event of my having rupture, r now or at any other future time, I will constantly wear a properly adjusted re truss." The next part of the paper consists of questions to be answered e medical officer, and among these occur the following:—"6. Describe ondition of the several cavities and their viscera. If anything be abnormal, ver slightly, state the particulars." "If there be rupture, describe its nature osition, and state whether he wears a sufficient truss." "Is he in every respect perfectly free from disease?" Lastly, there is appended the opinion e medical officer and his certificate that the questions addressed to him have "faithfully answered to the best of my knowledge and judgment."

e first, second, third, and tenth of the questions put by the medical officer e insured relate to matters of fact necessarily within the knowledge of the ed, and an untrue answer to any of these would amount to wilful falsehood. eventh, eighth, and ninth questions demand particulars of the history and h of the parents, brothers, and sisters, and other relations of the insured, of which may, and probably will be, within the personal knowledge of the ed, but others can be known to him only by hearsay or surmise. Some of questions accordingly are answered by Mrs Foster with qualifications, "not r knowledge," "as far as I recollect," "not exactly known to me." The ining three questions are concerned entirely with the health of the insured lf, and must be taken and construed together. These questions, with the ers given by Mrs Foster, stand as follows:—"4. Are you now, in your own on, in perfect health?" "Yes." "5. What ailments and medical advice you had?" "Never had any ailments, except those diseases common to hood, such as measles, &c., and never had medical attendance except during onfinements." "6. Have you had rheumatism, gout, rupture, fits, asthma, ng of blood, disease of the chest, or of the brain, or liver, or any affection e kidneys or urinary organs?" "No."

is on the last negative answer,—taken in connection with the declaration ded to the proposal, which provides that "if any untrue averment be therein or in the answers to the questions by the society's medical officer" olicy shall be void,—that the pursuers rely as a warranty that Mrs Foster ree from rupture.

Of the three questions regarding her personal health, the first make appeal to her own knowledge and feelings, "Are you, in your own o portion of the answers to this catechism (where there are no qualifying ther in the question or in the answer) is to import a warranty and is not. The very fact that Mrs Foster was allowed to give qualified to some of the questions was also calculated to mislead her as to the d effect of the others.

l, it seems hardly probable that these answers were intended by the themselves to import a warranty. They instruct their medical officer though there be no dishonesty, may therefore constitute a failure in the duty of disclosure which will lead to the voidance of the contract. The fact undisclosed may not have appeared to the insured at the time to be material, and yet if it turn out to be material, and in the opinion of a jury was a fact that a reasonable and cautious man proposing insurance would think material and proper to be disclosed, its non-disclosure will constitute such negligence on the part of the insured as to void the contract.

The only question therefore is, whether the existence of the swelling in Mrs Foster's groin was such a fact, and that question in the present case we are to decide as jurymen. My opinion is, upon a consideration of the whole circumstances as disclosed in the evidence, that the swelling which is proved to have existed at the date of the contract of insurance has not been shewn to be such a fact as a reasonable and cautious person, unskilled in medical science, and with no special knowledge of the law and practice of insurance, would believe to be of any materiality or in any way calculated to influence the insurers in considering and deciding on the risk.

The result of my opinion is, that the defenders ought to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons.

Lord Deas.—In this case the pursuers, the Life Association of Scotland, seek to reduce a policy of assurance on the life of the late Mrs Foster, on two grounds, which I shall take leave to consider in the reverse order in which they were argued at the bar,—1st, Negligence; 2d, Breach of warranty.

The alleged negligence on the part of Mrs Foster consists in her not having disclosed that she had a swelling on the groin, which, if mentioned to and examined by a medical man, would have enabled him to know that she had rupture, although she herself did not suspect anything of the kind.

The alleged breach of warranty rests upon the fact that she had rupture at the date of the assurance contract, whereas, to the question whether she had had rupture or various other specified diseases, her answer was "No."

Considering that for the last ten or twelve years life assurance policies are understood to be effected, in this United Kingdom, to the estimated amount of from twenty to thirty millions of money in each year, it would be difficult to over-estimate the interest and importance attaching to a case like the present, in which the truthfulness and good faith of the party insured are altogether undoubted. The circumstances are these:—

Mrs Foster was the widow of an innkeeper and farmer near Gatehouse of Fleet. After her husband's death she continued to carry on a considerable dairy farm for the benefit of herself and her children. It is reasonable to suppose, therefore, that her life was of some value to her family, the youngest being only seven years of age. On the 19th May 1871—being then in her fifty-second year—Mrs Foster made a proposal to the pursuers, through their local agent, for an assurance on her life to the amount of £300. It is stated in the record that the assurance was applied for on the urgent solicitation of the local agent, who was well acquainted with her. Whether this was so or not has not been ascertained, but supposing it to have been so, the agent did nothing more than the duty which all assurance companies inculcate upon their agents to procure them all the business they can—and, in this case, the agent is supported by the opinion of the pursuers' local medical officer, who certified that Mrs Foster's life was "a very eligible life for assurance."

The pursuers' printed form of proposal for assurance, supplied to Mrs Foster, contained a variety of questions with blanks for the answers, in the usual way, all of which questions, it is not disputed, Mrs Foster answered quite correctly. None of these questions related to her health, past or present. The questions upon that subject were all contained in a separate schedule, furnished by the pursuers to their local medical officer, to be read by him to the applicant, and the answers taken down and signed in his presence,—a printed direction to him being prefixed that "no third person should be present." I cannot say that this appears to me to be so satisfactory a mode of interrogation as the embodiment of these questions in the proposal itself, which the party has an opportunity considering deliberately, and of being reminded by others of circumstances ich might have been forgotten, and of being advised as to what might otherwise re been misunderstood. Be this as it may, however, the answers to the medical icer were prospectively made part of the contract by the declaration appended the proposal, which bore that "I am at present in good health, not being licted with any disorder, external or internal; that the preceding statements true; and that I have not withheld or concealed any important circumstance. nd I do hereby agree that this declaration shall be the basis of the contract tween me and the Life Association of Scotland; and that if any untrue aver-nt be made therein, or in the answer to questions by the society's medical icer in reference to this proposal, all sums paid on account of the assurance all be forfeited, and the assurance shall be null and void."

The society's medical officer, Dr Moffat, explains in his evidence that he read er to Mrs Foster the questions in the printed schedule thus referred to, riatim, in their order, and himself wrote down her answers, after which he used her to read them over, and then she signed the declaration at the bottom ereof, which was in these terms:—"I, the person whose life is proposed for surance, declare that the above statements are faithful and true, and I under-ke that, in the event of my having rupture, either now or at any other future me, I will continually wear a properly adjusted rupture truss."

The questions and answers with which we are more immediately concerned ntained in this schedule are the 4th, 5th, and 6th, which are in these terms: Quest. 4th) "Are you now, in your own opinion, in perfect health?"—(Ans.) Yes." Upon the answer to this question, I may observe, in passing, that its ntire accuracy is not impugned. (Quest. 5th) "What ailments and medical rvice have you had, trivial or otherwise? Names of medical advisers?" Ans.) "Never had any ailments, except the diseases common to childhood, such measles, &c., and never had medical attendance except during my confine-ents." Upon this answer I may observe that its accuracy likewise is not im-gned, unless indeed the swelling to be afterwards adverted to can be called a "ailment." There is a notandum upon this query to the effect that "the mes of medical attendants at confinements should be stated;" but the medical ficer either did not ask these names, or did not take them down. (Quest. 6th) Have you had rheumatism, gout, rupture, fits, asthma, spitting of blood, sease of the chest, or of the brain or liver, or any affection of the kidneys or inary organs?"—(Ans.) "No." It is upon the answer to this 6th question, upled with the terms of the declarations already quoted, and of the declara-ion in the policy itself, that the present action to reduce the policy is founded. he declaration in the policy bears,—"It is also expressly provided that if any-hing averred in the foresaid declaration, forming the basis of the assurance, or n the relative statements, be untrue, this policy and assurance shall be void, nd all moneys paid in respect thereof shall be forfeited to the association."

The medical officer admits, what, indeed, the form of query 6th and the nswer as taken down would presume, that he read over that query to Mrs Foster, and took her answer to it, in the negative, as one general query, although t embraces, in its terms, eleven different kinds of disease, and contains general words which may comprehend many additional diseases. He depones,—"I did not ask her as to rupture or any of the other diseases mentioned in it separately." This, certainly, was a very loose mode of interrogating the applicant on matters of such importance, but that may not be of much moment in the present case, because it is clear enough that if he had asked her, separately and expressly, "Have you had rupture?" she would have answered "No"—that being the only answer she could possibly have given without stating what she must have considered a wilful falsehood. Dr Moffat admits, in his evidence, that he did not explain to her the nature and symptoms either of rupture or of any of the other diseases specified in query 6th above quoted, and, on his attention being alled to that part of his printed instructions from the company which directed him to "institute an examination, by auscultation or otherwise," of the appli-ant's body, and to "describe the condition of the several cavities and their iscera," and if there was anything abnormal, however slight, to state the particulars, he depones that he examined "the cavity of the thorax only." And, being reminded that he had stated that Mrs Foster might have rupture without knowing it, and asked why he did not examine to see whether she had, his answer is,—"because she stated that she had no rupture, and I did not suppose that an insurance company would expect me to expose a woman in order to ascertain such a thing." Now, this might have been all very well if Mrs Foster had been asked whether she had any swelling on her person, and had answered that she had none. I observe, from the report of the case of Cazenove, that one of the printed questions in the list prescribed by the British Equitable Company was 5. "Whether had tumour or swelling of any kind? State its nature and position." But there was no such question either prescribed to be put, or actually put, in this case, and I can find no general question even which could be naturally supposed to comprehend it.

The written answer which Dr Moffat returned to the company, in compliance with the direction already quoted, to "describe the condition of the several cavities and their viscera," was "normal." To another direction, "if there be rupture, describe its nature and position, and state whether he (or she) wears sufficient truss," he returned no answer. To the question, "is she in every other respect perfectly free from disease?" his answer was "free." To the direction to "describe her present state, as regards positive healthiness and vigour: Is it above—only equal to—or below the average?" his answer was "Above the average." He had previously stated, in his report, that he had known Mrs Foster for about twelve months. And his opinion at the close, which I have already alluded to, bore that, "after careful consideration of the family and personal history, and other circumstances, I am of opinion that she is a very eligible life for assurance." His report bears the same date with the proposal, viz., 19th May 1871; and on the 24th of the same month the proposal was accepted and the policy signed in Edinburgh by the directors.

Up to this time it is clear, as indicated, to some extent, by the medical report, that Mrs Foster had enjoyed unusually good health. She had never required medical aid except upon the occasion of her childbed confinements, the last of which had occurred seven years previously. She had, consequently, no medical adviser whose name she was required to state in the proposal, and any evidence we have otherwise is to the effect that she was a very active healthy person.

On 15th November, however, of the same year in which the assurance had been effected—being about six months after the date of the proposal—she was seized with violent sickness and vomiting, and Dr Cox was called in, and found her, to use his own words, "suffering from gastric derangement, and treated her for that." It appears from her son's evidence that Mrs Foster took an active charge of the dairy, consisting of the produce of some fifty cows or thereby, that her daughter Jane, who usually assisted her, had been absent in London for about two months, and that the dairymaid had left suddenly about eight or ten days before Mrs Foster was taken ill, whereby her duties had been increased—that she had been working among a number of cheeses in the dairy shortly before she was taken ill, and that, in particular, she had succeeded, the very day before, in the difficult task of taking out of the cheese-press a heavy cheese which others about her had tried to take out and failed. The question was not put to any of the medical men, but I presume there can be no doubt that over-exertion may cause sickness and vomiting; and Dr Cox appears to assume in his evidence that it was not the rupture which brought on the sickness and vomiting, for he says that on the 15th and 16th he continued to treat her for a bilious attack, and considered her suffering from nothing else, and that what first indicated to him strangulation of the bowel was stercoraceous vomiting, which did not occur till the night of the 17th. He farther says that the violent vomiting was quite sufficient to cause the strangulation, and coupling this with the fact that the swelling had not increased from the time Mrs Foster had first observed it till between the night of the 15th and the morning of the 16th, when it doubled in size, the inference seems to be that the direct cause of the strangulation was, not the over-exertion, but the sickness and vomiting, although, except for accuracy, it may not be material to distinguish between the se cause and the other. Dr Cox having discovered on the 16th, by questions Mrs Foster, and examination of her person, that rupture existed, and on the ght of the 17th that strangulation had occurred, he called in Dr Shand and r Dickson on the 18th, when, the rupture being found not reducible, an operaon was performed, the propriety and skilfulness of which there is no reason to ubt, but, gangrene having supervened, she died on the 30th, her death being ns fairly attributable to the rupture.

In these circumstances the pursuers in their record and pleas seek to reduce e policy, on two grounds, which, as I have already said, I shall take leave to nsider in the reverse order from that in which they were argued, because I ink it contributes to clearness to ascertain, first, whether any negligence or lame can be attributed to Mrs Foster sufficient to void the policy, with or without forfeiture of the premiums, and then to inquire whether, although there may ve been no such blame, there was nevertheless a warranty that in point of ct she had no rupture—it being undoubted that if there was such a warranty he consequences of a breach of it have been incurred. The word warranty is ot indigenous in our practice, but it is the shortest and most convenient exression for the thing signified, and I adopt it accordingly.

The pursuers state, in article 7th of their condescendence, what may be taken o be substantially correct, that for months prior to the proposal of assurance rs Foster was aware that she had a swelling on the groin of the size of a walut, which, if it had been mentioned to a medical man, would have indicated o him that she had rupture, but the existence of which swelling was not mentioned by her. In article 11th of their condescendence the pursuers say,—"In iling to disclose the existence of the said tumour or swelling, by which the id tumour was manifested, Mrs Foster withheld or concealed an important and terial circumstance affecting the risk." And their second plea in law bears at the policy is reducible "in respect that she made misrepresentations, and ncealed facts highly material to the contract of assurance upon her life." This ea (as contradistinguished from their first plea, to be afterwards noticed), though expressed in the plural, can only be held, I presume, to refer to the ngle fact of her not having mentioned the swelling in question.

It must be remembered, with reference to this point, that not only was the estion not specially put to Mrs Foster, either in writing or verbally, whether e had any swelling on the groin, or any swelling at all, but, as I have already served, even the general question,—not unusual in printed forms of proposals med by assurance companies, whether the applicant is aware of any circumance not specifically mentioned, which he or she thinks it right or proper to mmunicate to the assurance company,—is altogether absent from the papers this case.

It is sufficiently clear upon the proof that at the date of the assurance Mrs ster did not know or suspect that the swelling on the groin indicated rupture; d in place of this ignorance on her part being inexcusable, or even remarkable, is abundantly proved that nothing is more common than such ignorance mong non-medical persons of intelligence and more liberal education than Mrs ster is likely to have had. If the swelling had not indicated rupture it is ot suggested, either in the record or by the medical witnesses, that it could ave indicated anything else of a serious nature, or to which Mrs Foster could asonably have supposed the pursuers would have attached importance, and which e might consequently have had a motive to conceal. The medical men say he swelling might have indicated a swollen gland, or what is vulgarly called 'a waxen kernel;" and they do not say that if they had examined the swelling nd pronounced it not to indicate rupture they would have attached importance o it on any other ground.

It is plain, I think, that even up to the time when Dr Cox became her medial attendant, Mrs Foster attached no importance to the swelling upon any round whatever. It had been stationary for nearly a year, and had never used her the slightest pain or inconvenience. The fact of its having doubled s size in the course of one restless night, coupled with Dr Cox's expressed esire to know how she had spent that night, and all other particulars, led her, for the first time, to think its existence worth mentioning, and then it apparent surprise that she heard from Dr Cox its nature and import aver, as is done in the record, that Mrs Foster "withheld or conceal the pursuers "an important and material circumstance affecting the risk to me to be to use words of no relevancy to the objection I am now unless their meaning be, either that she purposely withheld or conc circumstance, which is contrary to the import of the evidence, or that to disclose the existence of the swelling was so inexcusable as to be to intentional concealment, which is, I think, equally contrary to the the evidence. To plead (as in plea 2d) that the policy is reducible " that she made misrepresentations" on the subject, is to state a ple neither on averment nor fact.

Assuming now, however, that neither blame nor negligence affe validity of the policy can be attributed to Mrs Foster, the importan remains, whether there was a warranty that, in point of fact, she ha ture.

That there may be such a warranty in a contract of life assurance doubt. And if there was such a warranty here I could just as little the policy on Mrs Foster's life is void.

The all-important question, therefore, comes to be, whether the con to be construed as importing the alleged warranty. And that questi will be found to resolve substantially into another—in what sense is "untrue" used in the declarations which formed the basis of the cont reference to the answers returned to the society's medical officer. Th this view, can only be solved by a careful consideration of the conte whole documents.

The contract of life assurance is a contract of good faith on both si assurers may stipulate for any warranty they please, and if the assur takes that warranty, although it may be of something not within h knowledge, he or she must abide the consequences. But when the intend that there is to be a warranty of that sort they must make it that such is their intention. They must use unequivocal language, su sons of ordinary intelligence may, without difficulty, understand. paration of the printed documents is in their hands; and, by the form documents, the answers and undertakings of the assured are necessa moulded as to make it equitable to construe what is doubtful unfavo the assurers. It is not to be presumed that, in a contract of life as party undertakes to warrant a fact which, at the time, he neither know the means of knowing, and ambiguous words are not readily to be con that sense.

Now, the word "untrue," upon which the case really turns, may be more senses than one. Sometimes it means untrue in point of fact, and times it means untrue in the knowledge of the party. This last appe to be the more natural meaning of the two, where the party is required of his or her own ailments, diseases, and health; particularly when t "untrue" and "true" are used along with other words or phrases, as they are here, indicating that the object was really to get a faithful a what the party knew about herself.

There are two declarations of date 19th May 1871—the one append proposal, and the other appended to the answers, made to the society's officer, both of which I have already quoted at length, and which I s analyse. The first begins thus,—"I do hereby declare that I am at p good health, not being afflicted with any disorder, external or internal appears to me to be the language of a party speaking, to her own know what she could not fail to know absolutely, and as to which it is not that her answer was absolutely true. contended both by Mr Balfour and by Mr (now Lord) Shand, on behalf of pursuers, that if the answers to question 5th either as to the precise age, or cause of death of the applicant's father or mother, had not been precisely ct in point of fact—for instance if the mother had died at the age of ninety inety-eight in place of ninety-nine—or had died of something else than old —that would have voided the policy; and they both admitted that such was legitimate and necessary result of their argument on the matter of warranty. t certainly seems to me a startling result. The Lord Advocate, for the pur-s, refused to say whether he took that view or not, and I am not disposed old the pursuers committed to it. But the alternative must be, that the arations cannot be read as making every answer a warranty, but that you t look at the matter of the question and answer, as well as the whole con-t, to see whether there is a warranty of the particular answer or not.

he declaration I am now examining goes on, "and that I have not withheld oncealed any important circumstance." I have already had occasion to rve, in dealing with the plea of negligence, that this also is language expres-of the knowledge of the applicant, and, when the declaration goes on farther ay, "that this declaration shall be the basis of the contract," "and that if untrue averment be made therein, or in the answers to the questions by the ety's medical officer," the premiums should be forfeited and the policy void, ink the fair construction of the whole is that the declaration refers generally hat may turn out to have been untrue, to the knowledge of the applicant.

he language of the declaration, appended to the answers to the society's lical officer, "that the above statements are faithful and true," favours the e construction. The impression which such words naturally convey is, that applicant has faithfully stated, to the best of her knowledge, the truth of ry thing in reference to which her personal knowledge was appealed to.

he declaration embodied in the policy is just a repetition of the declarations 19th May, and therefore requires no special notice.

o come now to the questions as to health. These are all in the list of ques-s to be put by the society's medical officer, and Nos. 4, 5, and 6 must be en together, in order to see whether No. 6 is to be read as intended to elicit applicant's knowledge of her own state of body, or a warranty of something within her knowledge.

have quoted these questions already in the first part of my opinion, and it is icient here to remark upon them that No. 4, in the clearest possible manner, s nothing but a faithful opinion; No. 5 just as clearly requires an answer ording to the knowledge of the party, "what ailments and medical advice re you had?" and No. 6, in the natural sequence, particularises the more ious ailments which were inquired about, by bringing them, by name, under notice. It could hardly, I think, be expected to occur to any one, answer-; these three questions in succession, that No. 6 was intended to be answered a different footing from Nos. 4 and 5, unless something had been added to licate that such was the case.

The whole questions as to ailments, diseases, and health are thus framed in language of parties asking for faithful and honest information from the appli-nt, as to what he or she knew of himself or herself, rather than of parties quiring a warranty of matters of fact; and, taking the phraseology of the ques-ns in connection with the phraseology of the declarations, I think the whole re not calculated, so clearly and unequivocally, to convey to the mind of the plicant that he or she was undertaking a warranty of facts, known and un-own, as would be necessary to constitute so onerous an obligation.

The contention is that, if the applicant had any one of the diseases falling ithin the extensive range of the 6th question, however latent and undeveloped at disease might be,—a growing calculus in the bladder, for instance, which d never yet occasioned any sensible uneasiness—or if she had disease of the art, or some congenital malformation of that organ which, at the date of the licy, had never manifested itself in any way—never given her the slightest in referable to such a cause—and, consequently, had never been suspected by self, or anybody else, to exist, and only found to have existed by post mortem examination, the policy was to be void and all the premiums forfeited. know too well, and have been painfully reminded by recent instances, tha affections may exist for long periods unsuspected, and may manifest them only by sudden death or by death occurring within a few days or weeks first symptoms of illness; and, although I do not question the legality assurance companies taking a warranty to protect themselves against such rences, I certainly think there is no hardship in requiring them to make fectly clear to the applicant, by the language of the contract, that such warranty the applicant is required to undertake, more particularly whe assurers insert, as the pursuers here do, all their questions about ailment eases, and health, in the schedule of questions to be put by their medical which the applicant does not see till she comes into his presence, when, in of having the safeguard suggested as necessary by Lord St Leonards in An v. Fitzgerald, of having a lawyer at her elbow, the pursuers' rule is that no person shall be present.

The Lord Advocate said that life assurance tables of premiums are f upon the footing of the policies importing such a warranty as here cont for, so that they could not afford to dispense with that warranty. I had understood that the premiums were fixed with reference to tables shewin average value of human life, taking into account that men are subject ordinary diseases of the country and climate, and that, nevertheless, the bu of life assurance companies was not unprofitable when well conducted, great success of the pursuers' company shews their business to have been this as it may, however, I cannot entertain a doubt that it is one reason an others why many prudent people insure their lives for the benefit of their lies, that there may be undeveloped diseases lurking in their system, o genital peculiarities, unknown and unsuspected, and yet that the result o that they live to pay premiums which, if saved and accumulated, would exceed the amount assured and payable at death. Most people would I think, in effecting a life assurance if informed in plain terms, that he candid their statements, it could not, by possibility, be determined, til were dead and dissected, whether their families would be entitled to an under the policy, or whether, on the contrary, all the money paid for it shape of premiums would be forfeited. Many, I think, would decline alto to enter into the proposed contract, and, if this would be so were such an nation given of its nature, I cannot think that assurance companies, by ping up the matter in generalities, or using language which is not cle unequivocal, ought to be allowed to prevent the applicant from considerin his eyes open, whether he will enter into such a contract or not.

The case of Duckett v. Williams (2 Crompton and Meeson, 348) was th case quoted at the bar in which it can be held to have been in decided that the words "not truly stated" meant not true in fact, whate knowledge or belief of the party might have been. That was a case of r ance by one assurance company (The Provident) with another (The whether to the full or only to a partial extent is not stated. An acti brought by the Provident to recover the sum re-insured. The report bea "the defence was that the life was not insurable." The jury returned a that the life was not insurable, and the Court refused to disturb that In a second action for a return of the premiums the jury found that the l insurable. But on a motion to set aside that verdict, the Court, having b ment of parties looked into the evidence, came to the conclusion that, at t when the policy was effected, the person whose life was insured had upo disease which tended to shorten life, and consequently (I infer) that his l not insurable at the ordinary rate of premium.

That was not the case of a party insuring his own life, but a contra insurance which may be entered into on either of two different footings it is necessary to distinguish. The statements of the party whose life is may be made part of the contract, as in the case of Sir William For Company, 9th March 1832 (10 S. and D. 451). Or the one insurance c may accept the risk in reliance solely upon the statements made by th last, so far as can be gathered from the report, seems to have been the nature he contract in Duckett v. Williams. The terms of the proposal are not n, but the declaration annexed to it, which is fully quoted, bears that the tees of the Provident thereby declared that John Stephenson, in whose life had an interest to the amount of £5000, was in good health, and had not ured under any of the diseases therein enumerated, "or any other disease ch tends to shorten life"—that this declaration or statement should be the is of the contract between the two companies—"and that if any untrue ment be contained herein, or if the facts required to be set forth in the above posal be not truly stated," all moneys paid should be forfeited, "and the rance itself be absolutely null and void."

he knowledge and belief of John Stephenson as to his own diseases and lth were thus, so far as appears, no part of what the Hope relied upon in acting with the Provident. Whether the disease he laboured under was wn to himself, or whether it was latent and unknown to him, does not ter. The last is not, I think, to be presumed. In such a case, or in any where an applicant, on the strength of his own inquiries, ventures to make ments as to the diseases and health of a third party, with a view to obtain surance on the life of that third party, he would require, I think, to be very ious as to the wording of the contract to avoid the inference that he takes himself the risk that he has accurately ascertained the facts he sets forth he basis of the contract. If the statements of the third party as to his ses and health be made part of the contract, it may be that the applicant l be responsible only that there has been a full and faithful disclosure of all relates thereto. But if the third party be not appealed to in the matter, one ther of the contracting parties is necessarily taking the risk of an imperfect stigation, and a contract expressed as the contract was in Duckett v. Wil- may quite fairly be held to lay that risk upon the company proposing the surance.

or it is material to observe that in that contract there were two things agreed ither of which, apparently, was to infer nullity and forfeiture,—1st, "that y untrue averment be contained herein:" that might naturally enough refer class of averments as to which vigilance and good faith could alone be rea- bly expected. But then there came "or" (2d), "if the facts required to be forth in the above proposal be not truly stated." There are no such words as e in any of the declarations in the present case—no distinction indicated ween untrue averments and facts not truly stated. But it was upon the last- tioned words alone that Lord Lyndhurst commented and proceeded in ivering the judgment of the Court. "The point," his Lordship said, "is ther the facts stated were not truly stated within the meaning of the decla- on and agreement," "and looking at the context, we think it clear that the ties did not mean to restrict the words in the manner contended for."

he fatal fact in that case was that Stephenson, on whose life the assurance affected, had on him, at the time, a disease which tended to shorten life, which rendered his life not insurable,—at least not at the ordinary pre- um. Now, when an applicant for insurance on his own life is asked to wer questions about his own diseases and health, he may naturally conclude, not warned to the contrary, that he does all he is expected to do if he faith- ly makes known to the assurance company all that can possibly be known anybody. But when the same questions are put about the diseases and health another, to an applicant for insurance on the life of that other, the applicant not the same reason for concluding that his personal knowledge is alone ealed to; for personal knowledge he has none, and he cannot tell the com- y undertaking the assurance all that can possibly be known on the subject. is not surprising, therefore, that, in Duckett v. Williams, the Court, looking he context,—that is to say, taking the words in which it was agreed that ain consequences should follow if the facts required to be stated were not ly stated, in connection with the whole terms and nature of the contract,— e to the conclusion that the words "not truly stated" were intended to n, and did mean, in that case, not correctly stated.

I have gone thus at length into the case of Duckett v. Williams b was the only case commented and relied on by the Lord Advocate in su the warranty contended for in the present case. I have not, howev carefully to consider all the other cases, cited in the previous argu which dicta more or less favourable to the pursuers' contention were have fallen from Judges of high authority. It appears to me, howeve estimating the value of these dicta regard must always be had to the which they incidentally occurred, and that if dicta were to be place dicta, those of Lord Mansfield in the case of Sir James Ross in 1780 (stone, 312) would commend themselves as more generally applicable t that can be set against them. His Lordship is there reported to have s while the assured must make a full disclosure of all he knows; if he assurers be equally ignorant of any fact, the assurers must stand the risk of course, does not mean that there may not be a warranty of a fact u but it means, I think, that in an ordinary contract of assurance, by a his own life, the presumption is not in favour of warranty of a fact u but rather the reverse.

In Anderson v. Fitzgerald, decided in the House of Lords in June 1853 (4 Clark, 484), there were two wilful falsehoods embodied in the made by the party for insurance on his own life, viz.,—1st, That no near relations had died of consumption, whereas he knew that two of h had died of that disease; 2d, That no application for insurance on his been either accepted or refused by any other insurance company, wh companies had accepted such proposals made by him, and other six had them. The Judge who tried the case had charged the jury that they satisfied of the materiality of the statements as well as of their falsch after great difference of judicial opinion, it was decided by the House that it was not necessary in that case for the insurance company to p materiality, and consequently that the charge in that respect was e There was no other question in the case, except the question whether m fell to be proved, and incidental remarks in the course of such a case c regarded as laying down a general rule for the construction of the word or the word "untrue" occurring in other contracts, and in answering q of a different description from those which were untruly answered there

In the case of Cazenove, &c. v. The British Equitable Assurance C 6th May 1859 (28 Law Journal, Com. Now, it is true that in that case the company withdrew their plea upo and relied upon their objection that the statements were untrue; but i from the nature of the illnesses, their recent date, and the calling i additional medical attendants, that the applicant, while he remembered and slight illness, could not have forgotten the subsequent and serious and consequently that he had, to say the least of it, palpably failed in of disclosure in answering questions directly put to him upon matte within his knowledge. he case of Fowkes, &c. v. The Manchester and London Life Assurance ıtion, decided in the Court of Queen's Bench 1st May 1863 (32 Law remark as to the character of the averments, the untruth of which is to aterial although the applicant's father had died at sixty-one or sixty-two ə of, as averred, at sixty-two or sixty-three, or although his mother had ninety-eight in place of ninety-nine, or had died of some disease known ical nomenclature in place of old age; and yet, as we have seen, the of the declarations make no distinction between the consequences of the ı of any one of the averments, and of any other. Forfeiture as well as are equally to follow in either case. Consequently, before we can infer nty, we must see, as Justice Crompton said in Fowkes' case, that the clearly made it a condition that the things said to be warranted were to ally and actually true.

ce Blackburn, in the same case, adds a remark with which I entirely that in cases of instruments the language used by one of the parties is ınly other case I shall mention is the case, in this Court, of Hutchison National Life Assurance Company, 21st February 1845 (7 D. 467). I erved it for notice out of the order of its date to avoid breaking the con-of the reference I have made to the English cases; but I attach to it ıportance, as bearing, more directly than any of these other cases, upon ent question of warranty, and as being a well-considered judgment which, ate of the contract of assurance. It had been stipulated, as in all the ıat the declaration should be the basis of the contract, and the declaration ter alia, as here, that if any untrue allegation was made the premiums be forfeited and the policy void. The Court and the Lord Ordinary, l discussion, concurred in holding that there was no warranty against latent nown disease, and that, assuming Mrs Hutchison to have had no knowledge cion of the existence of the disease of the liver, her representatives were to recover the sum assured. I go along entirely with the judgment in wards caused her death. My opinion, both upon the point of negligence the point of warranty, is very clearly against the pursuers.

Lord Ardmillan.—In this very important and interesting case I endeavour to express my opinion so as to avoid recapitulation as much as I need not again read the declarations relative to the policy, as they h already read.

It will conduce to a clearer understanding of the case as it is now on the proof if we consider, first, the plea of the pursuers, that Mrs Fos held or concealed from the insurance company a material fact which bound to communicate, and failed to communicate.

I am of opinion that for this plea there is in the proof no foundation ing pursuers' allegations on record, and after attentive consideration of t I entertain no doubt of the entire good faith, honesty, and truthful int Mrs Foster. Indeed that has not been seriously challenged by the purs there is no ground whatever for doubting it. It is not necessary to ent details of the proof in this respect. The result is beyond doubt. I am that she did not withhold or conceal any fact which she knew, and which i duty to have communicated. I am quite convinced that at the date of t and at the date of her declaration, she was actually, honestly, and in ignorant of the existence of rupture, or of the existence of any sympto did to her indicate, or which can reasonably be held to be such as ough indicated to her, the existence of rupture, or of any other disease. T swelling referred to in the proof did not indicate to her, and cannot viewed as a symptom which ought to have indicated to her, either r any other disease. This innocent ignorance on her part is, to my min lished by the evidence, and my opinion is confirmed by the testimo Watson, an eminent medical man, speaking from the experience of a l tice. I think it scarcely admits of a doubt. Indeed the pursuers' ultimately put almost entirely on the more general plea, which I shall ceed to consider. It is not on the head of concealment that this polic reduced.

But the leading plea of the pursuers is, that apart from all question o ment, and assuming, as has been proved, the entire honesty and good Mrs Foster, still that this policy contains as a condition an absolute against rupture, whether known or unknown, and that on rupture havi quently been the cause of death the policy must be reduced as null and

I am anxious that my view of the real issue, the true controversy case, should be correctly understood and appreciated. I think there some attempt to escape from it. There has been some attempt to make turn on the effect rather than on the existence of a warranty.

The question is,—not whether an absolute warranty can be escape respect of the ignorance, even the innocent ignorance, of the party g warranty? If there be really absolute warranty unqualified and to t maintained, the warranty must be enforced, though the contract would one of extreme severity and ruinous result to the party assured. As served by Lord President Boyle in the case of Hutchison, such a const the contract as the pursuers contend for would practically put an end t surance. But the true question here is, whether in this case, under th there was an absolute warranty against disease, known or unknown,— against the existence of an obscure disease, confessedly not known t clarant, and proved to have been innocently unknown, that is to say, n ably within her cognizance,—a disease of which she was ignorant and ignorant. There is no presumption of such an absolute warranty in of insurance made by a party in a humble condition with an insurance the contract being framed and the words chosen by the insurance com

There is not only no presumption in favour of such an absolute all reasonable and equitable presumption is against it. It is, how alleged by the insurance company, and it must be clearly proved by th within the contract. In other words, it must be made clearly to a warranty against disease, known or unknown, was within the true and eaning of this contract. The Lord Advocate maintained that the mean- e parties was of no consequence if the legal meaning of the words has e out. I cannot admit that to be sound. I think that in a consensual he true and honest meaning of the parties, ascertained from fair con- of the words, is the legal meaning of the contract. In a bilateral con- e must be mutual good faith, concurrence of honest intention, consensus lacitum, and in a contract where, as in a policy of assurance, the highest evails, the mutuality of consent must be especially clear. That is the ing of my contract, which I desire the other contracting party to put ot that which, in my own favour, I wrap up in general phrase, or hide licity or generality of words, and mean to put upon it myself. Still hat be the true meaning of my contract, which neither party meant at but which afterwards, when fulfilment of the contract is demanded, I, rn benefit, attach to the words.

y of insurance should be so framed that he who runs may read. "No xpression should be there used by which the assured can be caught;" hic sermo sed quod praecepit Ofellus, certainly not rusticus abnormis These are the words of Lord St Leonards. They are in this case most ; and appropriate. So are the words of the same learned Lord,—"Unless sions in a policy are fully explained to the parties, a vast number of rill be led to suppose that they have made a provision for their families nce on their lives, when, in point of fact, the policy is not worth the which it is written." It was the belief of Mrs Foster that out of the eans of her widowhood she had provided by insurance for her orphan The pursuers say that, in consequence of the discovery of a disease to her, the policy is not worth the paper on which by them it was te warranty is a guarantee against all faults,—in this case all diseases, unknown. If it is established that the true reading of this policy is parties meant such an absolute warranty here, then there is an end of and the insurance of this poor widow, which she believed she had r her orphan family, is of no force or effect. tion. The policy, which she meant as a provision for her children, would be, according to the pursuers' contention, not worth the paper on which it is written. The question therefore is, does this contract of assurance, framed by the pursuers, and which ought to have been so expressed that he who runs may read, really contain, as its honest meaning, plain to the understanding of a layman, this absolute warranty against rupture, and ten other diseases, known or unknown?

be supposed that Mrs Foster would have entered into this contract if nown that she was giving a warranty,—a counter assurance,—against seases, including rupture, whether known or unknown to her? I think t. No person of ordinary intelligence would ever enter into a contract a warranty. The pursuers surely did not mean her so to understand act as to contain that warranty, for they must have well known that if inserted the words "known or unknown," she would never have so l. But can they now be permitted to put on the contract a meaning y did not venture to express, knowing that its expression would have the contract,—a meaning which they did not intend her to put on it? ably but very clearly of opinion that the pursuers cannot be permitted rpret and so to enforce a contract which they framed themselves, and ve made clear if they had chosen to do so. Lord Stair (4, 42, 21; 3, 3, 87), followed by all our best authorities, lays down two rules for ion of mutual contracts. The first is, the words are to be construed oferentem, against the framer of the writing; and the second is, that if e contracting parties be in humble life and acting without legal advice, s are to be understood in the "common and vulgar sense." To the t, and in the same just and equitable spirit, we have the words of Lord tice Cockburn in a recent case of Fowkes v. The Manchester Insurance ,—"The true reading of a policy is according to the way in which a r unlearned person) would read the words." That is the honest read- at is the reading which must have been intended. Any other reading one by which the assured could be caught. Therefore it is one which quity, justice and good faith, reject.

It is clear that if there be no such absolute warranty as a consensual condition of the contract the pursuers have no case. If there is only a representation, or statement short of warranty, then the undoubted and entire honesty and innocence and sincere good faith of the representation will protect the policy.

It has been strenuously argued by the pursuers that the answer by Mrs Foster to the sixth question put by the medical officer, comprehending eleven diseases at least, and answered in the one word "No," is an absolute warranty against all these diseases, known or unknown. It was also contended, and was the logical sequence of the argument, that all the other answers to the questions of the doctor when given in unqualified terms, affirmative or negative, are also warranties whether the fact was known or unknown. The argument, boldly and broadly put, was that every unqualified answer amounted to such a warranty, and that in a question of proper warranty, materiality does not enter into consideration.

A dexterous effort was made by my learned and very ingenious friend the Lord Advocate to escape from the breadth and generality of this plea, and to limit the argument to what he calls the particular warranty here in question. In the pleading by Mr Shand and Mr Balfour the argument was broadly presented in its more general aspect. In order to do full justice to the pursuers' case I shall deal with the argument under both its aspects. All the answers to which I now refer are in words unqualified. Either they are all warranties, or in regard to some of them a qualification is understood though not expressed. 1st, Is each of these answers an absolute warranty of the fact, known or unknown? It is said that each of them is a warranty, because they are within "the basis of the assurance."

Let us see how this stands.

The first step in the procedure is the proposal by Mrs Foster. She makes a declaration, appended to the proposal, in the following terms:—"I, Mary Waugh or Foster, before designed, do hereby declare that I am at present in good health, not being afflicted with any disorder, external or internal; that the preceding statements are true, and that I have not withheld or concealed any important circumstance. And I (the party in whose favour the assurance is to be effected) do hereby agree that this declaration shall be the basis of the contract between me and the Life Association of Scotland, and that if any untrue averment be made therein, or in the answers to questions by the society's medical officer in reference to this proposal, all sums paid on account of the assurance shall be forfeited, and the assurance be null and void."

She here refers to answers to questions by the society's medical officer. This reference must mean answers given or to be given, for, in point of sequence, the examination by the medical officer comes after the proposal, and after the appended declaration. When examined she makes the replies to the questions put to her, her answers being written down by the medical officer of the company, and the only attestation of these questions and answers is by a second declaration on a separate paper from the proposal, signed by Mrs Foster, and declaring that "the above statements are faithful and true." These words are, in my opinion, important. I read them as meaning true according to her consciousness, knowledge, and good faith. Then the medical officer reports his opinion, and then the insurance company, having before them the proposal with the original declaration, and the answers to questions attested by the second declaration, bearing that the answers are faithful and true, thus deal with the proposal and declaration. They state in the policy that it rests on the basis of the declaration, and then they provide in the policy that "if anything averred in the foresaid declaration forming the basis of the assurance, or in the relative leading these provisions strictly, the only declaration which is in words ed to form the basis of assurance is the first declaration appended to the posal. That declaration does not mention rupture, and, taken by itself, it ld not support the pursuers' case. It might well be contended that the wers to the questions of the medical officer, being separate from the proposal, not within the basis of this assurance. Such a contention could scarcely be llenged by the pursuers, for it would not rest on a construction more strict or re than that which the pursuers urge against the defenders. But I am not osed to take this very strict view of the provision in the policy. I think ; the statements in answer to the doctor, being relative to the proposal, and rred to in the first declaration, may be brought within the basis of assurance. , in order so to bring them within the basis, they must be proved. Now, only proof of them is to be found in the attestation that they are "faithful true." It was maintained by the pursuers' counsel that these words, ithful and true," should not be taken into consideration. I am not of that nion. The attestation cannot be considered without them, and without the station the pursuers have no proof of the answers. That second declaration taining the words "faithful and true" must either be admitted or excluded. it is admitted, the words "faithful and true" must be construed, and must ive due effect. If it is excluded, the answers are not proved. The true aning of the qualifying words "faithful and true" can scarcely be doubted. y must mean that the answers are made in good faith, and are true to the t of the declarant's knowledge and belief. From the dilemma in which the suers are placed in regard to this second declaration it is difficult for them to ape. The admission of the second declaration brings in the element of the larant's good faith as qualifying her answers. The exclusion of the second laration shuts out all proof of the answers. The pursuers have no case with- proof of the answers. They have no good case, if the words "faithful and e" are held as qualifying the answers.

Even assuming that the answers are so referred to as to be brought within the visions of the policy, the next point is, are all the answers to these ques- ns, which are given without special qualification, warranties, on the accuracy which the validity of the contract depends? Let us take one or two of the stions. Take the answer given to question seven, in regard to the declarant's ther, viz.—That she died at ninety-nine, of old age. Suppose it turned out be incorrect in point of fact, because, unknown to the declarant, the mother l died at ninety-eight and of a specific ailment, or from the effects of an ident. I put the question to the pursuers' counsel whether that answer, nestly made, to the best of her knowledge, would have been fatal to this icy. His reply was that it would be fatal to the policy. I then put to the suers' counsel a question with regard to the eighth answer, wherein the larant states that she has two brothers alive and both healthy. Suppose that t of her brothers, unknown to her, was at that time ill in India, or that, un- own to her, he had died in India the day before her declaration, would that ccuracy make void the policy. The reply again was that it would make d the policy. I must say that my learned friend at the bar seemed a little ubtful as to his reply. But if it be the meaning of their plea it seems to me be a result so extravagant, so unjust, and so ridiculous, as to amount to a uctio ad absurdum, fatal to any reasoning which involves such a result.

But I am quite ready to take the other alternative, and assume these ques- ns to the counsel to be answered the other way, as the Lord Advocate ap- red to suggest, though he sagaciously declined to choose between the two rnatives.

f so, then the pursuers do not maintain that all the answers made to the tor's questions without special qualification amount to warranties. In some ances the qualification that the answer is morally truthful, made in good h, and according to knowledge and belief, is assumed or accepted. Why uld it be excluded or rejected in regard to the sixth question? It appears to me that, if there is any answer to which that reasonable qualification applies, it is the answer to the sixth question. Consider it in relation to the questions which precede it. The fourth question is, "Are you now, in your own opinion, in perfect health?"—Ans. "Yes." This answer, necessarily given from her own consciousness, is not disputed to be honest and perfectly true, though she had the hidden disease which was afterwards ascertained. The fifth question is, "What ailments and medical advice have you had?" That could only be answered according to her knowledge, and it is not disputed that it has been answered honestly. The sixth question is, "Have you had rheumatism, gout, rupture, fits," &c., including eleven named, and twenty or thirty unnamed diseases. She answers "No." In regard to these questions it is stipulated by the insurance company that no third party shall be present. Alone and unaided she was questioned, and it is said that then and there she undertook a warranty against disease, known and unknown. It is proved that this most comprehensive list of diseases was simply read over to her: no explanations were given her, and separate questions in regard to each particular disease were not put. Her answer was taken to the whole in one single word. I cannot help saying that I think this mode of questioning a rustic, and a widow, was misleading. The pursuers now say that they meant the answer to their question to be a warranty absolute against all these eleven diseases, known or unknown. But did they so mean, and conceal their meaning? They did not tell her that. They gave her no warning that they would hold her innocent ignorance to be as false to her as a wilful falsehood. If they so meant, then the question as now pleaded was put in order to obtain an absolute warranty, yet that was not explained to her, and the question was not even put separately to her in regard to each disease. Then what is the meaning of the expression, "Have you had such disease?" I think that question must mean, have you had consciousness of such disease. Are you conscious of having had such disease? I do not think that any one could answer that question, put in regard to eleven diseases at once, in the affirmative, except from personal consciousness of having suffered from one or other of the complaints. This lady had no such consciousness. She could not, according to her knowledge, have truly answered the question in the affirmative. She therefore answered it in the negative, faithfully, and, according to her knowledge, consciousness, and belief, truly.

On the alternative view which I am now taking of the pursuers' plea, and taking because the pursuers desired it, I must assume that every answer given without qualification is not a warranty. I must assume that the qualification of moral truthfulness and good faith is implied and understood in regard to some. But that seems to me fatal to the logic of the pursuers' argument. I can see no reason to support the distinction. For, if equity demands that the qualification be understood in regard to the seventh and eighth answers, then, how can it possibly be rejected in regard to the sixth answer given to a question framed, as we have seen, and put to this poor woman with reference to eleven diseases at once, without explanation, and even without separation of the question as applicable to the different complaints? I really do not know which alternative is most unfavourable to the pursuers. On either alternative I am satisfied that they have no just or sound case.

We are dealing with a declaration on a subject within the scope of personal consciousness in regard to an obscure disease in the declarant's own body. She had never consulted a medical man on the subject. She had never felt pain from it. She had never been conscious of the existence of it. Nay, more, it is well proved that she was innocently, as well as honestly, ignorant of its existence. Only from her own consciousness could she reply to the question, whether she had ever had that disease. She replied in the negative. She could not honestly have replied otherwise. She attested her replies as "faithful and true." And they were so.

I shall now proceed, very briefly, to notice the legal authorities in respect of which the pursuers maintain that this policy of insurance, of which the honesty and good faith on the part of Mrs Foster is beyond dispute, and which she be-he question on which authority in point of law is required to support the of the pursuers is, not authority to prove the inflexible character of an ab- te warranty, if such a warranty has been here undertaken. I think the citor-General did not raise any doubt on that subject. I certainly entertain a. The question really is, whether, in this contract, the answers of Mrs er to the questions put by the medical officer of the company must in law eld as amounting to an absolute warranty. The authorities urged on us by pursuers have all been English decisions. They are most interesting and ortant, and I have given to them my most respectful and attentive considera- . But it is not to be overlooked that the leading Scottish authority on the ect is certainly against the pursuers.

he decision in the case of Hutchison v. The National Life Assurance Company bruary 21st 1845, 7 S. and D. 467), is of very high authority. The judg- t of Lord Wood as Ordinary, explained by him in an elaborate note, was ned by the unanimous judgment of the Court, each Judge giving a separate decided opinion in favour of the assured, and repelling the plea of absolute anty against an unknown disease. When it is remembered that these Judges, ming the opinion of Lord Wood, himself a Judge of high authority, were Lord sident Boyle, Lord Mackenzie, Lord Fullerton, and Lord Jeffrey, it must be nowledged that the decision is entitled to the highest respect as a Scottish hority: and in this Court it has never since been challenged or doubted.

but I have felt no desire to escape consideration of the English authorities. ' my own part I have always cherished, as not only important and authorita- , but as precious and even sacred, the great rules and principles of equity for ich we are indebted to the jurists of England. I have therefore carefully lied the decisions which the pursuers' counsel have so earnestly and ably ed on us, and studied them with reference to these great principles of equity, I have come to the conclusion that none of these decisions meet the true stion raised in this case.

After the remarks which have been already made on these decisions I shall presume to enter on any further analysis of them. In every one of them re the decision has been in favour of the insurance company special grounds judgment can be discovered which distinguish the case from the present. re is no case in which an answer to the question of a medical officer, given this answer was given to a question framed as this question was framed, and ted to the policy as this answer is related to the policy, has ever been sus- ed by decision as an absolute warranty against a disease of the existence of ich the declarant was innocently ignorant. The case of Duckett v. Williams been strongly pressed on us. That was a case of re-insurance, the policy g on the life of another, and the life being not insurable. I do not think case in point. Where a person proposing to insure the life of another, and in r to obtain a policy is speaking in regard to the health of another, and makes lute and unqualified statements of fact, in regard to which he can have no onal consciousness or complete assurance, then he is going beyond the scope is knowledge and out of his ground; and, doing so voluntarily and to promote own ends, he is held to guarantee what he asserts. Besides the party so lying for insurance, and the party whose life is proposed for insurance, viewed as standing in a certain relation to each other; they are held as ectively agents for each other in the matter, and they are presumed to be in munication. If the one whose life is to be insured knows the truth and the r who proposes the insurance does not ascertain it, but being personally rant, makes a statement contrary to the truth, such ignorance is, under the umstances, not excusable ignorance, for he ought to have ascertained the h before he made the statement, and such ignorance cannot avail. In the of Sir William Forbes and Co., (9th March 1832, 10 S. 451), Lord President e said that the proposer of the insurance, and Lord Mar, on whose life the rance was proposed, stood in the relation of agents for each other, and that proposer was bound to know what Lord Mar knew in regard to his Lordship's habits and health, since he ought to have ascertained it. In the Hutchison, to which I have already referred, the case of Duckett v. W was founded on by the insurance company, and the distinction betw case of Duckett v. Williams and such a case as the present was fully re and clearly explained.

With the exception of this brief notice of the case of Duckett v. Wil do not think it necessary to trespass on the time of the Court by minute in tion of the English authorities quoted, because I concur in the remark Lord Deas has made on these cases. In none of them have the pursu sented the authority of express decision; and the judicial dicta founded be viewed as applicable to the special circumstances of the particular There are also dicta, not without great weight and authority, in the op Lord Mansfield in the case of Ross v. Bradshaw (1 Blackstone, 312-14), Denman in Sweete v. Fairlie (6 Car. and Payne, p. 1), and of Lord Chie Cockburn, in Fowkes v. Manchester and London Assurance Company (3 T. 440). I do not suggest these as decisions opposed to those quoted pursuers. But I think that the dicta of these distinguished Judges a appropriate to the immediate question before us than are some of the remarks on which the pursuers rely,—remarks made in cases of a very description.

The observations of the Judges in the case of Fowkes relate to the on which, in my humble opinion, this case ought to turn. I must again you that the pursuers' counsel maintained that the intention of the parti of both the parties to this policy, is of no consequence, but that the wor be construed and enforced strictly. I cannot think that proposition well in law or in equity. In a consensual contract the true intent and mea the parties must be ascertained if possible. Chief-Justice Cockburn, in of Fowkes, says that the intention of the parties is to be ascertained, a the words are to be construed contra proferentem,—that is, against the the insurance company. The other Judges express the same opinio Chief-Justice Cockburn follows up his remark by saying that the tru of the agreement is "that in which it would be understood by a layman," an unlettered man.

Now, it does not appear to me possible, according to reason or justice, that this poor widow, Mrs Foster, meant to peril her insurance on the verity of a statement of fact which she made according to her belief consciousness, and of which she could not otherwise have personal kn Nor can I, in justice to the pursuers, suppose that they meant to entrap a warranty, and that they intended that she should so peril her insuran out meaning it. That would be a fraud. I cannot believe it. The int thus against the warranty on both sides.

One of your Lordships put the question during the argument, whe pursuers maintained the same law in regard to a congenital disease of th unknown and unsuspected during life, and only ascertained on post mo amination. If I do not mistake, the answer was that such congenital would be within this warranty. If the pursuers' argument is well fou life policy could have been validly effected at any time by such a person he may have lived for many years, and on his death the policy would clared void and all the premiums forfeited. It is often said that heart d more common now than formerly, and if the pursuers' proposition is s law it is right that the proposition and the law should be known.

I do not mean to say that I have felt this question free from difficult argument for the pursuers has been no less able than urgent; and th occasionally been judicial remarks made in England on the enforce warranty which, if applied to this case, might create difficulty.

But, on the prior question, whether there is in this contract an warranty against this disease, known or unknown, I think there is no s opposed to the case of Hutchison.

According to my conviction, there is no such warranty here. Jus equity and good faith forbid it; and it is a relief to my mind to feel Lang v. Bruce.

Mr Bruce, who had not lodged any objections to the notice sec. 322, put in answers to the petition, in which he admitted that l owner of the mill-lade, but denied that it was a land and heritage the meaning of the Glasgow Police Act, or that it was not pr fenced.

The mill-lade in question ran along or near the public road l through the village of Woodside, which formed the eastern bound Mr Bruce's property. The road was formerly under the care Barony Parish Statute-Labour Trustees, but by 9 and 10 Vict. c. Act to extend the municipal boundaries of Glasgow) was placed the charge of the Board of Police of Glasgow. Along the west side said road, between it and the mill-lade, there had formerly been a w paling, now fallen into disrepair, which was alleged by Mr Br have been erected and maintained for forty years by the Statute-l Trustees as a protection to the road, and which the petitioner ad that they or their successors, the Board of Police, had repaired in porary way for the safety of the public.

Mr Bruce (appellant) pleaded, inter alia;—(1) It being the d the Police and Statute-Labour Committee of the city of Glasgow (the petitioner represents), as coming in place of the Statute-l Trustees of the Barony Parish, to fence and protect the public roa the mill-lade in question, it is unnecessary and incompetent to the respondent to fence the mill-lade. (2) The said Statute-l Trustees and Statute-Labour Committee having for at least the las years fenced and protected the said public road from the said mil and the respondent and his predecessors never having been called during at least the last forty years to fence the said mill-lade, it is i petent in this process to change the prescriptive state of possessic the prescriptive use and wont, and duties and rights of parties.

By sec. 322 any proprietor aggrieved by such notice may deliver objections, the procedure in disposing of which is described.

By sec. 325 it is enacted that "if the proprietor or proprietors to whon has been given fail to comply as aforesaid with the requisition contained notice, it shall be lawful for the Procurator-fiscal to enforce the same at a by applying to the Dean of Guild for a warrant to execute the work specified, in so far as not altered or varied by the Magistrate or Dean of and the Dean of Guild may grant a warrant to execute such work, an thereafter ascertain and fix the cost thereof, and decern against the said pr or proprietors to whom notice was given for the proportions of such cost them, and may award expenses to or against any of the parties to such tion; but no such application shall operate as a relief to any proprietor prietors from liability for any penalties which had been incurred by him previous to the date thereof."

By the definition clause (sec. 4) "lands and heritages shall mean la heritages within the city, and shall have the meaning attached to that sion" in the Valuation Acts. tor, to state whether he is prepared to enclose the lade in question, in s of the notice by the Master of Works produced, or to erect such a ified fence along the lade as Mr James Cruickshank, after visiting premises, may specify."

r Bruce appealed, and argued;—That but for the proximity of the way the fencing of the mill-lade would be unnecessary, and that the d of Police, in whom the road was now vested, were the proper parties nce it. The defender was at least entitled to proof of his averment the Road Trustees had always fenced the road.

ND PRESIDENT.—This proceeding is purely statutory, and the petitioner, is the Procurator-fiscal of the Dean of Guild Court, has properly framed his on entirely on the statute. It proceeds on a notice given in terms of the 1 section, requiring the appellant, who is the proprietor of a mill-lade, to the same. Now, the statutory proceeding is plain enough, at least when whole clauses of the statute are brought to bear upon it. But in the mean- it may be useful to notice what the appellant's contention in the present is. He says that the proceeding is unwarranted; that though he is the r of this mill-lade, yet the only thing which renders fencing necessary is, the lade lies adjacent to the highway, and that the parties who ought to the fence are those in whom the road is now vested. These parties are the e Board, to whom the road has been transferred by the Police Act founded this case. He offers to prove that the road always was fenced by the Road ees, and says that it is their duty to go on fencing it or maintaining the , and that the only use of a fence is to protect persons passing along the

Now, all this appears to me to be utterly irrelevant. So long as this was a road in the country there was no one who had power to make the nt respondent fence it, and therefore, if it needed fencing, it was the ob- duty of the Road Trustees to erect a fence. But when this road is brought in the limits of the Glasgow Police Act, and under the Glasgow Police d, then the whole aspect of affairs is changed. Every proprietor is under Act obliged to fence his heritage, whatever it is. That being so, the neces- of fencing the road comes to an end. It is no longer the duty of the Road tees to fence, because the statute requires the owner of every heritage, and, g others, the respondent, to fence their heritage.

t us now see what the statute prescribes. The 384th section empowers the er of Works, by notice, to require any proprietor or occupier of lands or age to fence the same. That is the whole enactment. The notice itself is given in terms of sections 392-4, and it is not disputed that the notice his case was given precisely in terms of these sections. But section 386 es us back to the proceedings prescribed by a previous part of the statute, der to see what the course of procedure after delivery of the notices already tioned is to be. It carries us back to section 321 and following sections. ion 321 enacts that the Master of Works shall in his notice describe the t required to be done in a particular way, and shall specify the period red for its execution. It is not said that the notice given was disconform is section. Section 322 says that if the proprietor on whom the notice has served feels himself aggrieved thereby, he may within six days deliver to clerk written objections, whereon a certain procedure therein specified shall place. In this case the respondent did not avail himself of this oppor- y to state objections. The Procurator-fiscal therefore proceeded under the h section, which provides that if the proprietor fail to comply with the e given him within the specified time it shall be competent for the Procu- -fiscal to apply to the Dean of Guild Court for warrant to execute the work, empowers the Dean of Guild to grant warrant for the execution of the , and to ascertain and fix the cost thereof, and to decern against the pro- or for the same. Now, it is under this 325th section that the present peti- is presented, and the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild is thereby most strictly defined. What he can be asked to do and can do is to grant w perform the work, to fix and ascertain the cost when executed, and decern against the proprietor. Now, the prayer of the petition is exactl formity with the provisions of this clause. It bears to be all in term the effect provided for by the said statute, and particularly of the 321s and 384th sections.

Now, if the Dean of Guild had proceeded strictly in conformity terms of this clause, nothing would have induced the Court to interf stead of that, however, unfortunately in both interlocutors of 25th 26th September he has ordained the respondent, the appellant here, to fence required. Now, he had no right to do that under the Act of Pa That is not the policy of the Act at all. If the proprietor had erected under the notice served on him he was the proper party to do so. having done so, he ceased to be the proper party. To that extent, th think the Dean of Guild has gone out of the statute, and this must be But on the merits of the case I think there can be no question. The Guild, being satisfied of the facts, could do nothing except grant the craved. What I propose, therefore, to do is to recall the interlocut plained of, and to remit to the Dean of Guild to grant the warrant crav terms of his statutory powers.

Lord Deas.—It is clear that it was quite competent for the Master to give the notice referred to in the petition, and for the Dean of enforce the demand so made; and I do not think that by raising the who was liable to perform the operations, or to pay the expense of t proprietor of the mill-lade relieved himself from the necessity of ob orders of the Dean of Guild acting under his statutory authority. It forth in so many words that the object of the powers conferred by th was to prevent danger to the public; but it is plain that that was at reason why such large powers were given. These powers, no doubt, many things in which danger to the public is not involved. It is pl ever, that an open mill-lade such as this, so near to the public street, row of inhabited houses, is a thing which it is proper and necessary to tected by a fence for the safety of the public. I entirely agree with y ship that the Dean of Guild's visit to the spot was a proper and suffici of ascertaining the facts. I further agree that it would have been qui and competent to have granted a warrant to some one to execute the w an order for payment against the proprietor of the mill-lade, leavin work out any right of relief he might have against others. Such a mi such a position is not to be left unprotected until all questions of lia the expense of fencing it are settled. The questions of liability raise defender may be competently tried afterwards. Indeed, if it were eve that other parties were likewise bound to do the work, or were liable in the defender, that would not affect the competency and necessity of this provision of the Act. There is, in short, no relevancy in any of t tions raised upon the ground of ultimate liability. Neither do we determine whether this petition might have proceeded at common law. 296 is in very broad terms with regard to the powers of the Master o and the petition is entirely laid on the statute.

I am not, however, quite so clear as your Lordship seems to be as t the party himself might not have been ordained to do the necessary wo tions 321, 322, and 324 point not only to this, that the proprietor m complied with the notice, and so put an end to the matter; but they like a provision that the Dean of Guild might have proceeded to comp do so. At all events, the substance of what the Dean of Guild did right enough, for there could be no incompetency in allowing the opportunity of doing the work himself if he chose. The defender, hov already had his opportunity, and the clearest course under the stat remit in the terms proposed by your Lordship.

RD ARDMILLAN.—The appellant is undoubtedly proprietor of the mill-lade. important to observe that the parties alleged to be liable are not alleged to prietors of the kind of subjects in respect of which the statutory notice may ven. The term "lands and heritages" in the Valuation Act does not le roads, and therefore the Road Trustees could not have got a notice. the notice was in fact given to one who was proprietor of the mill-lade; he next point is that the notice determines the primary liability, and if the receiving it does not choose to protect the subject in question, the Dean of may grant to the Master of Works an order to execute the works, and, on being executed, a decree for the expense against the person failing to ob- r the first order. But here the question of nicety is as to the Dean of 's power to ordain primarily the execution of the work by the Master of , leaving the person held liable in the expense to effect at his own hand course he may have against others. I am of opinion that the question be- the appellant and the Road Trustees remains untouched. It is not clear er it is the road or the mill-lade that is "dangerous;" but leaving the question, it is at all events plain that the mill-lade is the cause of the .

tees are as much bound to pay the £600 annually as they are bound to pay 0 once for all. No doubt the payment annually of the £600 is just what is d an annuity, but that makes no difference. The distinction between an uity and a liferent is that a liferenter can only take the fruits of the subject uted, whereas an annuitant is entitled to the amount of the annuity, whether fruits of the estate out of which it is to be paid fall short of that amount or lere there were certain legacies (besides Mrs Kinmond's) amounting to 00, payable within three months after the testator's death. These were nded to be preferable, but all the other legatees were clearly intended to be poned to the widow. On these simple grounds I hold the legacies in the as well as the sixth purpose to be postponed to the widow's annuity. In view the third question is unimportant.

The annuity is due whether it comes out of income or capital. I do not n to say that trustees, properly administering their trust-estate, ought to pay nnuity out of capital if they have income sufficient, but that is a question of inistration, not of right.

ORD DEAS.—The testator in this case dispones his whole estate to trustees certain purposes, and, inter alia, first, for payment of debts and expenses of agement; second, for payment to his widow of an annuity of £600, which leclared to be inclusive of all her rights and claims under an antenuptial riage-contract, or otherwise whatsoever. Then by a codicil he increases the nity by £400, and it is quite plain that he puts the annuity, which is thus eased to £1000, on the same footing in all respects as the original annuity £600, for he says that the said increase shall be paid to her "at the same es, in the same manner, and under the same conditions and penalties as are vided in respect of the said annuity of £600." It is important to see the er in which the testator disposes of his estate. The very fact that this is t of the second purpose of the trust of itself indicates that it is preferable to the bequests coming after it, unless it had appeared from the deed that some- ng else was intended. But over and above that, it is material to observe that annuity is not to a stranger, but to the testator's widow, for whom he was ler both legal and natural obligations to provide. I have always understood t there is a presumption in favour of an annuity to a widow being preferable ordinary legacies. Though the trustees may have acted reasonably enough in ring the smaller legacies, I am not prepared to say that they were not bound see that there was enough to satisfy the widow's annuity before they paid se these. It does not follow that if there was not enough for the widow's im they were bound to pay any legacies at all. In the course of the discussion me legacies were spoken of as special legacies. That was inaccurate, for, rectly speaking, there are no special legacies here at all. If there had been cial legacies,—that is to say, legacies of particular articles, stocks, or invest- nts, &c.—a different question would have been involved. My opinion is that re is nothing in the nature of the legacies in this deed to bring them into petition with the widow's annuity.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur. The real question is whether in a trust of this d the incidence of a deficiency attaches to the widow who has an annuity or the other legatees. On the grounds stated by your Lordships it is clear that must be distributed among the other legatees. The case of Knox is a clear thority for the proposition that an annuitant is preferable to residuary legatees, d the case of a widow is much more favourable than that of an ordinary nuitant. Any provision to a widow is most favourably considered by the r, but here there appears to have been an antenuptial provision to her, which engthens the case.

The case set forth by the pursuer on record was thus stated by the Lord Ordinary:—"The case of the pursuer, as averred in the record, is, that she is the widow of an officer in the East India Company's Service; that she became acquainted with the defender in 1865; that he paid addresses to her; that he professed the greatest love and esteem for her and his desire that she should become his wife; that on 20th November 1867 he gave her the promise of marriage, No. 6 of process,* in which he promised to marry her, and provide for her according to his means, when circumstances warranted such marriage, always providing that in the interim she continued to lead a virtuous and exemplary life; that, relying upon this promise, she was prevailed upon to allow the defender to have carnal connection with her, and that in consequence of this promise he repeatedly had carnal connection with her during the period between 20th November and 1st December 1867, and also in the months of December 1867 and January and February 1868, and subsequently."

A proof was allowed, and thereafter the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor:—"Assoilzies the defender from the said conclusions of the libel, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses since the interlocutor of 21st November 1871, in so far as these have not been already disposed of: Allows an account of said expenses to be given in," &c.†

† NOTE.—(After the narrative above quoted)—"The promise of marriage, No. 6 of process, is admitted in the minute of admissions by the parties, No. 6 of process, to be holograph of the defender. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this document contains an absolute promise of marriage. Even although the proviso therein were held to apply to the promise of marriage, that would not, the Lord Ordinary thinks, make the promise conditional upon the occurrence of a future event, and so prevent it from establishing marriage along with connection on the faith thereof. It is an implied condition, in every promise of romise of marriage is dated 20th November 1867; and the averment uer is, that on the faith of that promise she was prevailed upon to defender to have connection with her, and that he repeatedly had ection with her 'during the period between 20th November and 1st 1867, and also in the months of December 1867 and January and 868, and subsequently.' There was only one witness adduced by the support of this statement, namely, Jane Bird, who was her servant id of April to the end of December 1867. She depones that during between April and January 1867 the defender very frequently visited at night, and remained a considerable time alone with her, but she ny familiarity between them, except upon one occasion, a few days l granted her the foresaid promise of marriage. She states that he about eleven o'clock at night, and that, as the pursuer was unwell he was shewn into her bed-room. She further states that about one he morning she went into the bed-room to gather the fire, thinking fender had left, and found him in bed with the pursuer. That is the ce adduced by the pursuer in support of her averments of repeated ection between the defender and her on the faith of the said promise. her witness who gives evidence in regard to the relations between and the defender after 20th November 1867 is Christina Lang, a the defender, who was servant to the pursuer for nearly two months Bird left—that is, until the end of February 1868. She depones, fender called two or three times a-week and remained an hour, and wo or three hours, but that she never saw anything like familiarity m, and had no idea that there was anything of the kind.

therefore, as direct evidence is concerned, the pursuer has failed to verments of connection after 26th November 1867, the date of the marriage. She has also not proved that she is the widow of an officer, e defender paid his addresses to her. But it has been, in the opinion Ordinary, clearly proved by the defender that the pursuer is not the n officer; that in and for several years after 1855 she was a prostitute gh; that from 1857 to 1859 she kept a brothel in St James' Square, ; that before going there she kept a brothel in St David Street. ; that she thereafter went to Glasgow, where she accidentally met r in 1865; and that he, after visiting her from time to time, for the illicit intercourse, at last took her into keeping as his mistress in rd Ordinary is of opinion that it is established by the proof, coupled fender's statements in his defences, that the pursuer continued to be down to 20th November 1867, when he granted her the above- promise of marriage. The evidence of Jane Bird and Christina Lang, nection with that previous relationship, and the statements in his o sufficiently establish, he considers, that there was no cessation of ntercourse at or prior to that date, and that sexual intercourse took en them for some time after 20th November 1867. But, if so, that continuation of the former illicit intercourse, and it cannot be said ith by the pursuer that it was on the faith of the promise of mar- ie 'was prevailed on to allow the defender to have carnal connection inferences to be drawn from the proof negative it. But if the pursuer had ceased to be his mistress prior to that date, and was leading a virtuous life, then, the being only one witness to one alleged act of connection after that date, there is not, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, sufficient evidence to establish copula after the promise. It is only by connecting Jane Bird's evidence, and also the evidence of Christina Lang, with the prior relations and illicit intercourse between the pursuer and defender, and with the defender's statements in his defences, that the Lord Ordinary has been able to hold that intercourse took place between them after 20th November 1867.

"The question has never been decided whether, if a promise of marriage is given during a course of illicit connection, and if connection continue thereafter as formerly, marriage will be thereby constituted.

"The rule of law is that marriage can be constituted by consent alone,—that mutual consent may be given in various ways, and one of these is by promise subsequente copula. Mr Erskine (Inst., 1, 6, 4) states that a copula subsequent to promise constitutes marriage 'from a presumption or fiction that the consent de præsenti, which is essential to marriage, was at that moment mutually given by the parties, in consequence of the anterior promise.' But the copula must have been permitted by the woman on the faith of the promise (Morrison v. Dobson, 8 Macph., 347. That presumption or fiction can therefore only arise in the case where it can be held that the woman has surrendered her person on the faith of the promise. But there is, he conceives, no room for such a presumption, where, as in the present case, the woman is, and has for a considerable time previously, been the mistress of the man who has granted the promise, where there has been no cessation of the illicit intercourse before the promise was granted, and where the intercourse has been continued thereafter without any return to virtue, and without anything having occurred except the granting of the promise. Such intercourse after the promise must, he thinks, be held to be a mere continuation of the former intercourse, and altogether independent of the promise, and that particularly where, as in the present case, the woman is at the time the pursuer in an action of declarator of marriage against another man, then depending in Court, and where it is evident, from the terms of the promise, that marriage in a short time was not in the contemplation of the parties. The presumption in such a state of matters is, that the pursuer and defender intended to continue their illicit intercourse, and to get married when circumstances should warrant their doing so.

"It appears from the reports of the cases of Sim v. Miles, 20th November 1829, 8 Shaw, 89, and Ross v. Macleod, 7th June 1861, 23 D. 972, and from Mr Brodie's Notes on Stair, p. 28, that Professor Hume stated in his lectures his opinion to be that marriage cannot be constituted by promise interjected in a course of illicit connection. Lord Pitmilly, in Sim v. Miles, stated that to be his own opinion. Lord Glenlee seems to have been of the same opinion; and Lord Cringletie thought it 'very doubtful whether we can lay it down in the abstract that promise followed by copula in all cases makes marriage.' In Ross v. Macleod, Lord Deas was of opinion 'that a promise given in the course of illicit connection does not necessarily make marriage.' In Morrison v. Dobson, already cited, Lord Ardmillan, whose opinion was concurred in by the Lord President and Lord Deas, stated that 'in order to the constitution of marriage by promise subsequente copula, the copula must be conceded by the woman on the faith of the promise;' and Lord Kinloch further remarked, that he considered it 'indispensable that she should satisfy the Court that the conduct of the man produced in her mind the will and intention to be married to him, and that she yielded her person to his embraces in the belief and purpose of becoming his wife,' which will be presumed, in the ordinary case, from the copula following on the promise. But that presumption must yield to proof which negatives it, as in the present case. Professor More, in his Notes upon Stair

ercourse, and have consented on the footing of receiving his promise. e copula which followed constituted marriage.[1]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an an action of declarator of marriage founded on allegation of promise subsequente copula. The case is very simple as presented record. The pursuer says that she was of respectable parentage, and married an officer in the East India Company's Service; that she was early left a low, and became acquainted with the defender in 1865, having led up to that e a chaste and virtuous life. They cohabited together for two years, and in vember 1867 he gave her a written promise of marriage; and her allegation is, relying on this solemn promise she surrendered her person, and they had carnal nection. If this last allegation were true it would be very hard to find against ; but taken in this aspect the case is attended with some difficulty. The lence of connection following on the promise depends on the testimony of a le witness, who stands greatly in need of corroboration; and the difficulty is nced still further by the fact that the pursuer is obliged to admit that two rs earlier she had another action against a Mr Francis Dewar, in which she ges repeated promises of marriage, on the strength of which she surrendered person. She says also that this action was not well founded in fact, which can y mean that it was not true that she surrendered her person to Francis Dewar. s strange that she should have been involved in two adventures of the same d in four years, but it is still more strange that this lady, on her own shew- has made an untrue allegation of this kind. In these circumstances I think evidence of one witness is not sufficient. Therefore, in this aspect of the , I should be inclined to agree with the Lord Ordinary that she has failed to blish that she submitted to the defender on the faith of his promise. But case disclosed on the evidence is rather different, and I shall state in a few ds what is its important aspect. The pursuer and defender became acquainted 1865, and the result of their acquaintance was not an honourable courtship, but it intercourse, the pursuer being at the time simply a prostitute in Edinburgh, the keeper of several brothels there. At length the intercourse changed its racter a little, for she became his mistress for some time. She lived in a house which he paid, and he visited her there. This continued down to November 67, which is the date of the promise, and also subsequent to that—in short, intercourse was uninterrupted down to the institution of this action. If case had been different the proof of a continuance of the intercourse after promise might be doubtful; but here I think there is no doubt that it did tinue, and therefore this case is that of a man giving a promise in the course an uninterrupted illicit intercourse, and the question is, what is its effect. e case is not a very uncommon one. Such a written promise will by no ans necessarily constitute marriage, and will, in general, be insufficient. There one great peculiarity in the terms of the promise, which affords a ground of dgment which is sufficiently satisfactory. The defender in his writing thus presses himself—"I, Robert Wotherspoon, iron merchant in Glasgow, do here- promise to marry Annie Surtees or Dewar née Lawson, and provide for her 13, also states that a promise to a concubine affords no presumption of rriage.

"After full and repeated consideration, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that e proof does not establish marriage between the parties by promise subsequente pula."

But the question is, what was the parties' n Looking to the fact that down to the moment of the giving of the writ mise she was living as the defender's mistress, and that the writing was the course of an illicit connection, the meaning is, that she was to contin ful to the defender as his mistress. If there had been any proof of ces intercourse, or of a refusal on the part of the pursuer to continue the co —the burden of proving which would lie on the pursuer—her case wou been very different; but this not being so, the proviso in the promise, only means that she is to continue her present life as his mistress. If it is provided by this arrangement that the promise is to be followed tinued intercourse to fill up the interval between its date and the celeb the marriage. It is in vain to say that this converts a promise of ma futuro into consent de præsenti. In this document the woman arranges person is to be at the man's command until his affairs admit of a marri is to remain his mistress until that time. Lord Deas concurred.

Lord Ardmillan.—Notwithstanding the terms of the written prom given by the defender to the pursuer I am clearly of opinion that mar not been instructed in this case. Speaking generally, there is no doubt th mise of marriage, proved by written evidence, and followed by copula, is, a to Scottish law, sufficient to prove the mutual consent which creates the of marriage. It is the consent which makes the marriage. That con be proved in different ways; and the mode of proof of the consent her amounts to this, that on the faith of the promise the woman has surrend person. But the surrender of her person by the woman, and the pr the man, must be related to each other It is not the law that the mere of promise and copula uniformly and necessarily proves marriage. I r opinion on this point which I expressed in the case of Morrison v. Dol the connection was not given or permitted on the faith of the promise— purchased or given on a footing inconsistent with marriage—it cannot marriage, however clear the words of promise.

The character of the woman, and the fact of illicit intercourse prior t to the promise, so that no promise was necessary or appropriate to c concession or to secure its continuance, is a most important fact in co whether the copula subsequent to the promise was related to the pron was permitted on the faith of the promise.

I think that, where no special circumstances in the conduct and the of the parties are proved, but where the two facts of promise and su copula are in the position of proved and unexplained sequence, the pre must be that the copula was the response to the promise, and yielde faith of the promise.

But where the facts ascertained are such as to disconnect the cop the promise, and explain it on a different footing, and to make it mani marriage was not within the intention of the parties, then the consen tract of marriage cannot be held to have been formed.

I need say nothing of the character of the pursuer, nor need I add to what your Lordship has said in regard to the contradiction on the her statements on record. The surrender of her person to a man was a thi so easy, so frequent, so promiscuous, so purchaseable, that there was cer need for a promise of marriage to induce her to give it.

The Scottish law supposes, and experience proves, that a girl previo and virtuous may, on the faith of a promise, surrender her person.

ı to surrender; and only in the exuberance of trust and on faith of promise he be supposed to render up the jewel of her honour and the possession of erson. We have no such case here.

t I take a case nearer the present. I suppose a promise made by a man to man who was his mistress. It is still possible that, in such circumstances, a ise might be given which, followed by copula, may constitute marriage. uch a case is surely different from this. The woman may have been con-

She may, under conscientious conviction, have insisted on breaking off ; connection which she felt to be guilty; and the man may then have given romise to prevent separation, to win her back, to allay her conscientious anctions, and to overcome her scruples, or her reluctance, and induce her mit renewed intercourse. Such a case is possible; but, in my opinion, it be proved. It is only by proof of such facts as these that, in a case the man and woman were living in illicit intercourse, the mere promise, e course of that intercourse, can be brought within the true scope and ing of the rule, that promise subsequente copula instructs the consent which itutes marriage. I admit the possibility of such a case. I think it is ex-mal, and that it must be proved.

t in this case there is nothing of the kind. There has been here illicit ourse without interruption, and certainly without disturbance by any con-tious scruple. This pursuer had nothing to yield on the faith of the ise which she had not yielded to the defender, and to many others, with-ny promise. Nay, more, it is proved that her life for years had been a f prostitution, and that money had often purchased the surrender of her n.

m of opinion that, however culpable and foolish the conduct of the de-r was—and of that there can be no doubt—the sacred and abiding relation arriage was not constituted. The condition here attached to the promise is ithout importance, and I do not think it a condition of virtue.

gree with the observations which your Lordship has made on that con-n; but I rest my opinion more especially on the ground which I have explained. The episode with Mr Dewar cannot be omitted. Shortly be-the date of this promise the pursuer had alleged in judicial proceedings, in tion of declarator of marriage, that she was married to another man, named r; and she avers that the defender, Mr Wotherspoon, knew of that action, certainly knew of her habits and character. That is not very consistent her claims in this action. And then, after the date of the promise, the er, who knew the Scottish law, and alleged it, solemnly declared that she ot married to any one, and had not been married to any one, according to w of England or of Scotland, or any other law.

gree so entirely with what your Lordship has already said that I really feel ecessary to add more.

e facts of the case are peculiarly clear, and especially unfavourable to the er; and it does appear to me that to hold the sacred relation of marriage to re constituted in this manner, and between these parties, would be to pre-a caricature of the Scottish law of marriage.

TEIND COURT.
Teind Clerk.

MISS MARGARET TURNBULL ROBERTSON was proprietor of the lands and teinds of Dalladies, in the parish of Fettercairn. The teinds of said lands were valued by decree of the Court of Teinds in 1810; but this decree was not produced in the localities, which became final in 1833 and 1853, and consequently more than the just proportion of the respective augmentations of stipend was in these localities laid upon the teinds of Dalladies, and was paid by the objector and her authors.

In the present locality the common agent prepared the state of teinds on the footing that the teinds of Dalladies were not valued, and fell to be taken at one-fifth of the proven rental, being £56. The interim locality was framed on the same footing, but the common agent was willing, on the production of the decree of valuation, that it should be rectified, so as to give effect to the decree of valuation in the augmentation which fell to be dealt with in this locality. In the state of teinds the amount of stipend payable from Dalladies was stated at £16, 7s. $7\frac{1}{10}$d. and the surplus teind at £39, 12s. $4\frac{4}{10}$d., while the valued teind would have been only £17, 12s. $2\frac{8}{10}$d., leaving a surplus of £1, 4s. $7\frac{7}{10}$d.

The objector, however, contended that the teinds should be so localled on that the whole stipend payable therefrom for the future should be in the proportion which the said teinds bore to the teinds of the other heritors in the parish having heritable rights to their teinds, and that such amount of stipend and no more should be laid on the teinds of Dalladies as would, when added to the old stipend, make the whole stipend payable therefrom amount to the said proportion.

The objector pleaded;—(1) In virtue of the decree of valuation referred to the teinds of the lands of Dalladies have been duly valued, and said decree of valuation falls to be given effect to in the present process. (2) The valued teinds of the said lands of Dalladies fall to be localled in the present process for such proportion only of the augmentation of stipend granted as shall make the whole stipend payable therefrom correspond to the proportion which the said teinds bear to the teinds of the other heritors who have heritable rights to their teinds. (3) General the condescenders are entitled to maintain the foregoing objections to the said interim locality, and to obtain a rectification thereof in so far as necessary to give effect to said objections.

The common agent pleaded;—(1) The objectors are not entitled to have the interim scheme in the present locality rectified in such a manner that the total amount of stipend payable out of the lands of Dalladies shall be the same as if the decree of valuation now founded upon by them had been given effect to in the localities of 1833 and 1853. The said localities being now final, the stipend thereby localled upon the lands of Dalladies must continue to be paid until the said localities be set aside by an action of reduction. (3) Admitting, as the respondent has always admitted since Miss Robertson's decree of valuation was produced that effect should be given to that decree in localling the present augmentation, the objections are quoad ultra unfounded, and, as objections in this locality, inept, and should be repelled, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary (11th December 1872) pronounced an interlocutor finding "that, in localling the augmentation recently awarded, effect must be given to the decree of valuation produced and founded on by the objectors: Finds that the old localities, which are final and unreduced not be interfered with or altered in the present process until and less the said final localities are reduced and set aside; but finds that, in localling the augmentation, regard must be had not only to the decree of valuation, but to the amount of old stipend localled on the objector's teinds; and finds that the proportion of the augmented stipend to be localled on the objector's teinds must be such as, taken along with the old stipend payable by her, does not exceed the fair proportion corresponding to the amount of her valued teind, and so as to give the objector relief against any over-allocation, so far as can be done without interfering with the final localities; and to this effect sustains the objection of Miss Margaret Turnbull Robertson and her curator, and decerns: Finds the common agent liable in expenses," &c.*

The common agent reclaimed, and argued;—The previous localities are final, and could not be touched except by a process of reduction.

The objector argued;—She had paid too much already, and it was easy to rectify the disproportion,—and this was the only equitable course,—by taking into account the excess in the previous localities and laying so much less on her in this locality. A reduction was unnecessary, and would cost more than any benefit that would result to the objector.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are certain findings in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary which it is impossible to dispute. He finds, in the first place, that in localling the augmentation recently awarded effect must be given to the decree of valuation produced and founded on by the objector;" and further, that the old localities which are final and unreduced cannot be interfered with or altered in the present process until and unless the said final localities are reduced and set aside." Now, by final locality is meant decree of locality, and I agree with the Lord Ordinary in this latter finding; but I go farther than he does, for I doubt whether in the circumstances it would be possible to set aside

---

* "NOTE.—This is a curious question, and does not seem to be decided in any recorded case. At least the Lord Ordinary has not been referred to any decision, or even to any dictum or authority whatever.

"In the absence of authority, the Lord Ordinary thinks himself entitled to proceed on equitable principle, and to give the objector the relief she seeks, if it can be done without transgressing any fixed rule.

"The objector's teinds are valued. In the former localities, however, she or her predecessors did not produce the decree of valuation, and the consequence was that her teinds were localled on for a larger sum than they would have been if she had produced her decree of valuation.

"The localities became final, and the objector has paid under them without complaint, and she is still willing to do so. She explains that it is not worth her while to reduce them. The expense would exceed the benefit which she would obtain.

"Then comes the augmentation. And in the new locality the objector produces her valuation, and says, 'I pay too much already under the old locality; take that into view, and lay so much less augmentation upon me.' This can be done easily, and at once; and, without disturbing the old and final locality, the objector can obtain relief in localling the augmented stipend.

"There is strong equity in this; and, in the absence of any fixed rule to the contrary, the Lord Ordinary gives effect to the equitable plea. He understands there is no contrary practice, for although it is not uncommon to strike the free teind by deducting the old stipend, and allocate proportionally, this is done when no such specialty arises as in the present case. It is equally easy to take the gross teind and allocate proportionally thereon, and then make the old stipend part of the allocation. This would equitably provide for variations on the rental where teinds are unvalued and struck at one-fifth of the rent."

these decrees by a reduction, and we must proceed on the assumption that are unreducible. Proceeding, then, on this assumption, the question is, wh in adjusting the locality of the augmentation Miss Robertson may not be dealt so as to give her relief against injury sustained in previous localities?—whe since she pays too much of the old stipend, she may be allowed to pay pr tionally less of the new stipend? The proposal is equitable, and if there i technical difficulty I am disposed to accede to it. In doing so an injury a certain sense done to the benefice, for if the relief craved were not give benefice would reap the benefit of the overcharge in the previous localities. on the other hand, if we do not accede to this proposal Miss Robertson n in the end have to pay to the minister something more than the whole tein her lands, and I do not think that any one could be heard in support of result, for it would come to this, that on account of a mistake the benefice v get more than the whole teind.

Thus, I think, the only question is between Miss Robertson and the heritors; and although I was startled by the novelty of the proposal subm to us, I do not see any objection to it in point of principle. It is a re which falls within the scope of a process of locality—which is the count of a multiplepoinding—and in such a process I do not think that it is unl take into consideration the present liabilities of parties.

Succession—Testament—Confusion.—The proprietrix of lands held o Crown, subject to certain duties payable in kind to a donatary of the C executed a mortis causa trust-settlement, in which she directed her trust hold the said lands for certain charitable purposes, and to convey to certai sons named "all such lands, houses, or other heritable subjects, of wh nature or denomination the same may be, which I may acquire or succeed to the date of these presents." The testatrix subsequently obtained by purcl disposition from the Crown donatary of the said duties, on which she was i Held that the duties thus acquired were not to be regarded as a separate her subject from the land in the sense of the trust-deed.

BY trust-disposition, dated 21st July 1810, Misses Barbara and H Fea disponed to each other and the longest liver of them, and afte decease of the survivor to Patrick Neill, printer in Edinburgh, and J Dennison of North Myre, in Sanda, and others, as trustees, the v heritable and moveable estate then belonging to them, or which sl belong to them or either of them at death; and in particular the lar Arie and Mussater, in the island of Stronsay in Orkney. The e purpose of the deed appointed the said lands, with the mansion-hou Arie, and park and garden adjoining, to be held for certain char purposes therein specified. The tenth purpose of the trust appointe trustees to "assign, dispone, convey, and make over to and in fav the said Patrick Neill, and his heirs and assignees, all such lands, h or other heritable subjects, of whatever nature or denomination the may be, which I, the said Helena Fea, may acquire or succeed to the date of these presents: And further, we appoint our said truste like manner, after the death of the survivor of us, to assign, convey e, and make over all such lands, houses, or other heritable subjects, of tever nature or denomination the same be, that I, the said Barbara . may acquire or succeed to after the date of these presents, to and in ur of the said Patrick Neill and James Dennison of Myre, equally rixt them, and to the heirs of the said Patrick Neill, and on the ire of the said James Dennison, to Janet Traill, daughter of Walter ll of Westove."

arbara and Helena Fea, at the date of their trust-deed, held the lands re mentioned under a crown charter of adjudication in favour of les Erskine, merchant in Kirkwall, dated 1st June 1799; disposition Charles Erskine to the said Barbara and Helena Fea, dated 24th ruary 1800, containing an assignation to the said crown charter, and rument of sasine in their favour proceeding on the said writs, dated 1 February. The reddendo of the charter was for payment of the feu blench farm, "aliasque divorias et servitia solubi. pro et ex terris que prædictis uti in prioribus juribus et infeofamentis earundem ent." These feu and other duties, which consisted of certain quan- s of bear, butter, poultry, and money, formed part of the earldom of ney, and were payable to Lord Dundas, to whom they belonged as in t of the Crown, conform to crown charter in his favour of, inter alia, earldom of Orkney, including therein right to the feu and other duties able by the crown vassals within the said earldom, dated 6th August 7.

he Misses Fea acquired the duties payable for the said lands for the e of £695, 10s., paid to Lord Dundas, and obtained a disposition from , dated 7th April 1817, on which they were infeft on 12th October 7. The Misses Fea held their lands of the Crown as superior, after as re the conveyance of the duties, but exempt from payment of any lendo.

n 17th October 1817 the Misses Fea conveyed to Charles Goar part he lands of Arie by a deed, with a double manner of holding, which le no mention of the duties applicable to the said lands and included he purchase from Lord Dundas. Goar was infeft.

iss Helena Fea died in November 1817, and Miss Barbara Fea in mary 1818. After their death a payment of £18, 6s. 9d. on account he above-mentioned duties was made by Mr Patrick Neill, as the only ing trustee under the said deed, three-fourths of that sum being paid Mr Neill himself, and the remaining fourth to Mr Dennison. Mr ill afterwards waived any claim he might have to three-fourths of the ies; and though Mr Dennison, who survived till 1849, never waived claim, no further payment was made to him on account of the duties, whole annual income from the trust-estate having been expended in administration of the trust.

Mr Dennison's eldest son, his heir-at-law and executor, having de- nded from the trustees now acting in the Misses Fea's trust a convey- e of one-fourth of the duties referred to (under deduction of those iring to the lands conveyed to Charles Goar), this special case was usted by him (first party) and the said trustees (second parties), in er that the opinion and judgment of the Court might be obtained on the owing questions:—"(1) Is the first party entitled, in virtue of the pro- on in favour of the late James Dennison of Myre, contained in the th purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement by the late Barbara Helena Fea, to one-fourth part of the duties purchased by them from d Dundas as above set forth, excepting therefrom the proportion of said duties effeiring to the lands of Hescome and others, conveyed by Misses Fea to Charles Goar; and are the second parties bound to convey the said fourth part (excepting as aforesaid) to the first party with entry as at Martinmas 1871, and to make payment to him of the sum of £279, 1s. 2d. as the arrears thereof? Or, (2) Were the said duties being at the date of the purchase by the Misses Fea payable from their own lands, extinguished confusione by such purchase, and by the disposition by Lord Dundas in their favour?"

It was argued for the first party;—The duties in question were acquired after the date of the trust-disposition in the meaning of the testator. The tenure of the lands had become feudal by the nature of the investitures taken by the Misses Fea's authors, and they held directly of the Crown, paying duties to Lord Zetland. These duties therefore were heritable irredeemable rights connected with the lands, and came under the tenth head of the disposition.[1] The question of confusion need not be argued, as this was a simple question of intention.

It was argued for the second parties;—The duties were mere money debts due to the superior, the right to which was heritable but not feudal. The Misses Fea intended merely to disburden their lands and not to acquire a separate estate. The deed of disposition or assignation by Lord Zetland was a mere transference of the power to exact, and could not create an intermediate feudal estate. The right could not be merged with the dominium utile by any of the ordinary modes of consolidation, but it was so merged by confusion.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The answer to the first question depends on the construction of certain clauses in the trust-disposition and settlement of 1810; and everything comes to depend on what was the intention of the ladies in the tenth purpose of that deed. They convey their whole estate, heritable and moveable, to certain trustees, and after a number of purposes of a temporary nature they provide, in the eighth purpose, that the farms of Mussater and Arie, which are the chief heritable estate, and appear to have been the bulk of the estate generally, are to be applied to the purposes of a certain charity. Then, in the ninth purpose, the trusters appoint their trustees, after the death of the survivor of them, to convey to Patrick Neill, one of the trustees, "all such lands, houses or other heritable subjects, of whatever nature or denomination the same be, that I, the said Barbara Fea, may acquire or succeed to after the date of these presents, to and in favour of the said Patrick Neill and James Dennison of Myre, equally betwixt them, and to the heirs of the said Patrick Neill, and in the failure of the said James Dennison to Janet Traill, daughter of William Traill of Westove." Now, the son and heir of James Dennison of Myre, the first party to this case, has claimed, in virtue of this tenth purpose, one-fourth of certain subjects, said to have been acquired after the execution of the deed. The subjects are of a peculiar nature, and the question is, whether they fall within the tenth purpose.

It is necessary to consider what was the title under which the ladies held the farms. Whatever its original nature had been, the lands had become feudalised before coming into the hands of the Misses Fea, for their title stands on a charter to Charles Erskine, who did not take infeftment, but gave an assignation to the open precept in the crown charter, on which the ladies were infeft in the year 1800. The estate was held of the Crown for payment of certain duties, of which the amount was not specified, but was fixed by the use of payment, as common in such cases in Orkney. There was no mid-superior of any kind; at Lord Dundas under his peculiar title was entitled, not as superior, but as signee of the superior's rights, to these duties, and had been in use to collect em and many others of a similar kind. We know from the annals of this ourt what is the nature of Lord Zetland's title, derived from the Earl of Mor-n, and it is set out in the report of the case referred to. The charter disponed Her Majesty's right of the feu and other duties, casualties, and services of all nd sundry the heritable vassals and others within the said earldom, with full nd sole power to the said James Earl of Morton and his foresaids, in her ajesty's place as remaining still their immediate superior, to enter and receive he said heritable vassals who now actually hold of her Majesty and the Crown, nd their heirs, and to grant charters and infeftments," &c. There followed o a conveyance of the casualties. It was found in the case referred to that is grant was beyond the power of the Crown so far as regards the power to ter vassals and intromit with casualties, the only right it effectually conferred ing the right to uplift the duties. It constituted no other relation between he grantee and the land. This being so, and Lord Zetland being precisely in he position of an assignee to the feu-duties, the Misses Fea purchased from him he feu-duties to which he had right, so far as they were leviable from the lands f Mussater and Aric. It is plain that they bought these feu-duties because ey were proprietors of these lands, and if their purpose was to disburden the nds of the feu-duties this was the most regular and habile way of doing so. ord Zetland was not in a position to discharge the feu-duties, having no title s superior; all he could do was to grant a conveyance of his right, i.e., an signation.

The question, therefore, comes to be, whether this is the acquisition by the isses Fea of a separate heritable subject in the sense of the tenth purpose of he trust-disposition. In my opinion it is not. The way in which they dealt ith their lands, as shewn in the disposition to Charles Goar, is very good evi-ence of their understanding with regard to the purchase of the duties. They ave him in 1817, shortly after the acquisition of the duties, a testamentary isposition of part of the lands, with double manner of holding, but imposing o him no obligation to pay these feu-duties, as they would have done if they ad intended to keep them up as a separate estate. They thus shewed that ey had no intention to keep up this right as a right against the land, but that ey had bought the duties merely to disburden their property. If they had en disponing the rest of the lands, after the date of Goar's disposition, in vour of the trustees for the charity, there is no doubt that they would have ade the disposition just in the terms of the disposition to Goar, and by doing would have clearly shewn their intention to extinguish and sopite these feu-ties.

I therefore come to the conclusion, upon the construction of these deeds, that was clearly not the intention of the ladies to continue the feu-duties as a bur-en on the lands, but to free the lands from them. This is confirmed by the onduct of the parties. Immediately after the death of Miss Barbara Fea a all payment was made to Mr Neill and Mr Dennison on the footing that the signation of the feu-duties was the acquisition of an heritable subject in the nse of the tenth purpose of the trust-deed. But that payment was made only nce, and no demand was afterwards made. It is therefore clear that the first uestion should be answered in the negative, and it is needless to answer the econd.

*Landlord and Tenant—Entail—Heir and Executor—Apportionment—*33 & 34 Vict. c. 35—Lease.—Farms on an entailed estate were let in accordance with local custom and the previous usage on the estate, with entry to the houses, grass and hay lands at Whitsunday, and to the lands under crop at the separation of the crops from the ground. The rents were payable at Martinmas and Whitsunday for the half year preceding. The proprietor died on 18th July 1872. In a question between his executor and the next heir of entail, held that the rents payable at Martinmas 1872 were rents accruing at the date of his death, and fell to be apportioned between heir and executor under the Apportionment Act of 1870.

1ST DIVISION.

THE late Honourable Marmaduke Constable Maxwell, heir of entail in possession of the estate of Terregles, died on 16th July 1872, and he was succeeded in the entailed estates by his nephew, Frederick Henry Constable Maxwell, who was insane, and to whom Mr Samuel Adamson was appointed curator bonis. Mr Marmaduke Constable Maxwell left a trust disposition and settlement, leaving his whole means and estate to William Lord Herries, whom he appointed his sole executor.

The farms on the entailed estate of Terregles were held under one or other of two forms of "terms and conditions of set," in both of which the stipulation as to entry and payment of rent was to the same effect:—"The entry to the farms shall be at Whitsunday as to the houses, grass and hay lands, and at the separation of that same year's crop from the ground as to the lands in crop, and the rents shall be payable half-yearly by equal portions, at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday, beginning the first term's payment at the first term of Martinmas after the entry for the half year preceding, and for the next half year at the Whitsunday thereafter, and so on half-yearly and termly during the lease, with interest and penalty during the not payment."

This stipulation was in accordance with the custom of the district, and the practice observed in letting the farms on the estate while in the possession of Mr Maxwell's father, the entailer. Although due at Martinmas and Whitsunday the rents were actually collected at Candlemas and Lammas following these terms respectively.

The rents of the estate falling due at Whitsunday 1872 were not collected at the time of Mr Maxwell's death.

The parties, Mr Maxwell's executor and the curator bonis of his heir-at-law, presented this special case for the opinion and judgment of the Court on the following question:—"Whether the first party, as executor of the late Honourable Marmaduke Constable Maxwell, is entitled to a proportion of the rents of the entailed estate of Terregles, payable at [artinmas 1872, corresponding to the period between Whitsunday 1872 nd the day of the death of the said Honourable Marmaduke Constable [axwell on 16th July 1872?"

Argued for the executor (Lord Herries);—The general rule was that nts due and exigible are regarded as in bonis of the deceased, and be- ng to his executor, whether they have been actually uplifted or not; nd there is no exception in regard to the forehand rents of an entailed state, provided that the custom of forehand rents has prevailed on the state, and has not been introduced by the deceased heir in order to dis- ppoint his successor.[1] This was clear law, and by the terms of the late pportionment Act it was equally clear that a proportion of the rents hich accrued from day to day during the term after Whitsunday 1872, ntil the death of Mr Maxwell, belonged to his executor.[2]

Argued for the next heir of entail;—Although by a rule introduced by ecisions the forehand rent payable at Whitsunday belonged to the ecutor of the proprietor who survived that term, and the rent which came payable at the Martinmas following would also have belonged to executor had Mr Maxwell survived Martinmas, yet that rent was not plicable to the crop of that year, nor was any part of it current or cruing during the half year in which he died. The simple rule in all ses, as Lord Monboddo expressed it in Kerr v. Turnbull, was the crop;[3] d as the rule established by decisions in regard to the rights of heir d executor to the termly payments of forehand rent had not been tended to cases of apportionment it was open to the Court to follow e simple and natural rule, to which the other was an exception. The nt payable at Martinmas 1872, of which apportionment was claimed, as not current or accruing during the half year preceding that term, but as legally applicable to a crop which was not then sown or reaped. It uld not, therefore, be considered "accruing" during that half year, and d not come within the words of the statute of 1870. The Court in tricating the rights of parties would look to the legal terms of payment here they were not foreclosed by express decisions.[4]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late Mr Marmaduke Constable Maxwell was heir of tail in possession of the estate of Terregles until his death on 16th July 1872, d the present question arises between his executor and the next heir of entail. e rents payable by the tenants on that estate are forehand rents, and therefore e crops which, if they were payable at the legal terms, these rents would be ld to represent, were not reaped when the rents became payable. The leases e very distinct. In one form of lease the rent is payable "half-yearly, by ual portions, at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday, beginning the first m's payment at the term of Martinmas after the entry for the half year pre- ding, and for the next half year at the Whitsunday thereafter, and so on half- rly and termly." Now, as the entry to the farms was at Whitsunday, pay- nt of rent at Martinmas following was not a payment for a crop then reaped, d accordingly the lease bears "for the half year preceding," in which no crop as sown or reaped. The rent stipulated is a rent for occupation during that period of time, and not for a crop. In the other form of lease, which w duced by Mr Maxwell himself, the words as to payment of rent are exa same both as to the time of payment and the period to which the pay applicable, the entry being to the houses and grass at Whitsunday, an land in crop at the separation of the crop.

Now, we have heard, on behalf of the next heir, an argument founde cases as to postponed rents, especially in grass farms—cases which seem no kind of application to the present question. In such cases the between heir and executor is generally determined with reference to t terms of payment; because it is generally expressed in such leases that is payable for a particular crop and year. But apart from that, the ap of the rule founded on to forehand rents has never been allowed since of Lord Kilkerran. That eminent lawyer says, under the case of Mur nynmond v. Cathcart, 1739, Mor. 15,906,—"The meaning of the commo that the legal and not the conventional terms are the rule between heir cutor is no other than this, that the postponing the legal term by the co of parties, which generally is the case of tenants' rents, does not deprive cutor of the benefit of the legal term. But if, by the convention of annualrents, for example, be made payable before the legal term, the e will have the benefit of that convention; and the case would be the a forehand payment of rents of lands, for there is no instance of what is and exigible not going to executors."

No doubt that dictum does not immediately solve the question a application of the Apportionment Act, but it shews that the rents pa Whitsunday 1872 belonged to the executor, because, though not collec were undoubtedly due, and exigible, and were in bonis of the decease rule would not have been applicable to an entailed estate if forehand re a novelty on that estate—if, for example, the last heir who died had in forehand rents, having found a different system in existence at his successi would have been taking undue advantage of the next heir of entail; bu not the case here, for it is stated that forehand rents were the law of th It was both the custom of the district, and the rule had been adopte entailer, and continued in all the subsequent leases. Hence, on the aut the Marquis of Queensberry's case this is to be dealt with just as if i fee-simple succession.

The question remains, whether the rents for the period between Wh 1872 and Mr C. Maxwell's death are subject to apportionment under th of 1870. Mr Marshall says that that statute is not applicable, because do not accrue during the period before the term when they become payab is, the rent due at Martinmas is not current or accruing in the interval Whitsunday and Martinmas. It is payable at Martinmas by a mere stipulation, and is not growing. That argument, however, is fallacious, b reference to the words of the Act and to the terms of the leases. The l tinctly provide that the rent payable at Martinmas is "the rent for the preceding;" and it is very difficult to see how it is not current or not accr as much as if it were payable at the legal term. But however that ma terms of the statute are enough. The great object of the statute is to transactions by making everything apportionable. Accordingly it provi "all rents, annuities, dividends, and other periodical payments in the n income (whether reserved or made payable under an instrument in w otherwise) shall, like interest on money lent, be considered as accruing to day, and shall be apportionable in respect of time accordingly." I made matter of enactment that everything payable in the nature of inc be considered as accruing from day to day, and as such apportionable. thing of that kind growing due in the term during which a deceased p is therefore apportionable between his heir and executor.

The consequence is that the question put to us must be answered in the executor,—that is to say, in the affirmative.

That district finally sanctioned on 15th August 1868, and measures were taken for eeding with certain drainage works. Messrs Crawford and Poynter, rietors of land immediately adjoining to the special drainage district, cted to the sewage being directed into the Myres Burn, a stream ing through their lands, and raised actions to prevent the local ority from doing so.

xpenses were incurred by the parochial board (1) in giving the tory notices regarding the formation of the special drainage district; in defending an appeal against the resolution defining the special nage district; (3) in defending the actions before referred to; and (4) btaining plans of a proposed intercepting sewer, in order to a com- nise of the questions in dispute.

his special case was presented by the parochial board as the local ority of the said parish of the first part, and Mr Pearson, an owner and pier of lands within the special drainage district, of the second part. as not stated that any dispute had arisen between the parties, but the eedings taken in forming the special drainage district, and the litiga- with Messrs Crawford and Poynter were set forth as facts agreed n by the parties. The opinion and judgment of the Court were asked n the following questions:—" (1) Are the expenses which were incurred onnection with the formation of the special drainage district charge- against the special drainage assessment leviable under section 93 of 'Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867?' Or (2) Are these expenses ral expenses incurred in executing the Act, and chargeable against assessment leviable under subsection 2 of section 94 of the said Act? special drainage district in connection with the actions before-mentione and with the proposed compromise of these actions, chargeable again the special drainage assessment leviable under section 93 of the 'Publ Health (Scotland) Act, 1867?' Or (4) Are these expenses general e penses incurred in executing the said Act, and chargeable against t assessment leviable under subsection 2 of section 94 of the said Act? (If the expenses incurred in connection with the formation of the spec drainage district, and the expenses incurred subsequent to the formati of the said district, or either of these expenses, are held to be charge against the assessment leviable under subsection 2 of section 94 of t said Act, is that assessment leviable on and within the special drain district alone, or upon the whole district of the local authority?"

At the debate, the Court raised the question whether this proceedi was competent under the 63d section of the Court of Session Act, 186 The parties were allowed to add to the special case an averment that th board, as local authority, proposed to assess the special drainage distri for the charges in question.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have come to be of opinion that this special case i not one which we can entertain. The party of the first part is the local authori of the parish of Bothwell, and the only other party is Thomas Pearson, residi within the parish, whose only claim to be a party to this special case is that h is a ratepayer in a particular district of that parish. One particular portion o the parish of Bothwell lately applied to have itself separated, and erected into special drainage district. The question attempted to be raised here is, whethe the expenses connected with that proceeding form a charge upon the rates of th parish generally, or only upon that part of it which has been separated. Th parochial board, as the local authority, say that they mean to charge these ex penses against the rates of the special district, and that they are justified in doin so by the terms of the Public Health Act. Mr Pearson comes forward and say that they ought not to do this, but should charge the expenses against the ra of the whole parish. Now, I am always very unwilling to refuse to entertain special case which appears to come within the scope of the Act of Parliame We have now had a good deal of experience in the operation of the 63d secti of the Act of 1868, and I am of opinion that it introduced a very expeditio economical, and satisfactory method of bringing to a decision questions of la where the parties are agreed on the facts. But we must be careful not to con vert or pervert special cases to an improper use, or allow them to be brought b parties to try questions which these parties could not try under any other mo of procedure known to our law. For my reading of section 63d of the Court Session Act, 1868, is, that when there are parties who can come before us in a process known to the law, then if they are agreed on the facts, and dispute on on a point of law, they shall be allowed to bring that point to trial in the sha of a special case. The question here therefore is, whether the parochial boa of Bothwell and Mr Pearson could in any proper form of process have rais this question. I think they could not. This assessment has not been eve imposed, much less levied. It is only stated that it is in the contemplation o the board to impose it. Now, even if Mr Pearson had come forward to suspend the levying of an assessment already imposed I doubt if he could have succeeded If the assessment had been laid on, and Mr Pearson had suspended a threatene charge against himself individually, that might have been competent, but I do no see how he could raise the general question otherwise. Again, let us consid whether there is any other form of process which might have been used. An action of declarator is the only one. But if the parochial board had raised a action of declarator, and called Mr Pearson only, we should have declined t entertain the action with no more parties in the field. It appears to me, there fore, that, as this question could not be competently raised between the parti in any known form of process, it cannot be entertained by us under the cover o a special case.

ORD DEAS.—I should not feel it quite safe to say that in all circumstances hich there might be an action in this Court a special case is also competent. I am clearly of opinion that there cannot be a special case unless an action een those who are parties to it would have been sufficient to try and settle uestion. Now, if this question had been raised between these parties in orm of an ordinary action the objection would at once have occurred that rties interested were not called. Then there is also the objection to which Lordship has alluded, namely, that no assessment has been actually imposed. nything we can tell no assessment may ever be imposed, and the question o us may consequently never arise. The question is, therefore, purely thetical, and we do not sit here to decide hypothetical questions. Then, , the case in another branch of it relates to the expenses of defending s, and I do not think that part of the case could have been entertained if the main question could have been so.

Poor—Settlement.—A pauper born in 1841 in the parish of A removed with his father's family in 1846 to the parish of B, where he lived in family with his father till the death of the latter in 1860. A few weeks after his father's death he enlisted and remained abroad in military service till February 1872, when he returned to Scotland, and became a proper object of parochial relief. Held, in conformity with Craig v. Greig and Macdonald (July 18, 1865, ante, vol. iii. 1172), and M'Lennan v. Waite (June 28, 1872, ante, vol. x. 90), that the parish of his birth was liable for his support, and not the parish of B, in which he had ceased to have a derivative settlement by emancipation at his father's death.

1ST DIVISION. M.

JOHN SYME was born in the parish of New Monkland in 1841. In 1846 his father's family removed to the parish of Auchinleck, where he continued to live in family with his father until the death of the latter on 11th April 1860. At his death the father had a residential settlement in Auchinleck. On 8th May 1860 John Syme enlisted in the army, and left Scotland. He remained in foreign service until the month of February 1872, when he was discharged, and returned to Scotland. There he became chargeable as a pauper on the parish of Kilmarnock in February 1872. The pauper was unmarried, and during his absence from Scotland had no house or place of residence in the parish of Auchinleck. It was admitted that he had no settlement in the parish of Kilmarnock, which intimated claims of relief against each of the parties to this special case.

The question presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court was "Whether the parish bound to support the said pauper is the parish of Auchinleck or the parish of New Monkland?"

It was argued for New Monkland, the first party, that the parish of Auchinleck was liable in relief, in respect that the settlement which the pauper had in that parish at the date of his enlistment was not lost through his compulsory absence on military service.[2]

It was argued for Auchinleck, the second party, that the parish

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pauper became chargeable on the parish of Kilmar- k in February 1872, when he was thirty-one years of age. He had no resi- ntial settlement, and therefore one would suppose that the parish of his birth ame liable for his maintenance. But it is said that he possessed a derivative ttlement at the age of thirty-one, and after being in foreign service for twelve ars. Any doctrine leading to such a result would be to my mind very sus- icious. It would indeed almost be a demonstration of its unsoundness. I am t, however, inclined to place my judgment on that ground, but rather to mine the facts. The pauper's father died when he was between eighteen d nineteen years of age. The father had a residential settlement in the parish Auchinleck. It appears that the pauper, his son, enlisted in the army a few eks after his death, and proceeded on that term of foreign service to which I ve referred. It is not said that the lad continued in family with his mother; is not said that his mother was alive. The only facts are those which I have ted.

I am of opinion that the son, not being then a proper object of parochial lief, was necessarily emancipated by his father's death, and that his settlement as necessarily in the parish of his own birth, for it was impossible that he uld have any residential settlement of his own. The principles settled in the es of Craig v. Greig and Macdonald, and M'Lennan v. Waite,[2] are quite con- ive. I said in the latter case,—"A person who has no residential settlement his own right is chargeable on the parish of his birth if he is above the age of berty; and as soon as he does attain the age of puberty, his father being dead, settlement is in his birth parish in preference to any derivative settlement ich he previously had." The whole Court concurred, and I thought it settled. at rule is directly applicable, and is sufficient for the solution of the case.

LORD DEAS.—In this case the father died when the pauper was nineteen ars of age. It is not mentioned in the case when the mother died, but I ume that she did not survive the father, for if she had a fact of such im- tance would no doubt have been stated. If the mother had survived the er a totally different question might have been raised, and what we now cide must not be held to decide the question whether a surviving wife, with family above pupillarity, but under majority, has a claim against the parish her husband's residential settlement, both for herself and her family.

The case which we are now dealing with is the case of a father leaving a son minority, who is not said to have been pauperised by the death of his father. ow, one result of the father's death was undoubtedly to emancipate the son; d if the son maintained himself during the three weeks between his father's th and his own enlistment, or if he fell into poverty only towards the end of e three weeks instead of twelve years afterwards, still, even in that case he uld have fallen into poverty after emancipation, and would have been charge- le upon his own parish. In the case of M'Lennan v. Waite there was no ubt thrown upon this doctrine by Lord Kinloch, whose opinion I adopted. hat Lord Kinloch as well as myself wished to guard against was the stringent plication of the rule in the case of children falling into poverty when forming rt of the mother's family. But in a case such as we are now considering, with o pauperism at the date of emancipation, and where the person emancipated has afterwards become a pauper, he must go upon his own parish, which is here the parish of his birth.

It is thus unnecessary that we should deal with the question whether a residential settlement is lost by military service abroad.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—There are two simple facts in this case which leave no room for doubt.

The first is, that actual pauperism only took place in 1872, when the pauper was thirty years of age. This fact is important, because the time of poverty is the true time to consider, in order to ascertain what the pauper's settlement is.

The second fact is, that the pauper was nearly nineteen years old when his father died. If, when the father died, the pauper had been a pupil, it would have been very important to know when the mother died, for a pupil has no separate settlement of his own. A pupil is not personally a pauper, but is a burden upon his parents. But when a pupil becomes a minor he has the capacity to acquire and hold a settlement for himself. So when the minor is fully familiated by the death of his father he is no longer a member of his father's family, but sui juris. If poverty falls on him he must seek relief from the parish of his own settlement. In this case the only parish of his own to which he can go for relief is the parish of his birth, and that parish is chargeable.

It is not necessary to enter upon the question of absence, but no case has yet been decided to support the proposition that a man without home or family in this country can retain or acquire a settlement here while residing abroad.

LORD JERVISWOODE concurred.

DANIEL MACBETH, the Sheriff-clerk of Rothesay, presented a petition in his own Sheriff-court for sequestration against Francis Troy and George Innes. The Sheriff-clerk-depute was a partner in business with the Sheriff-clerk. The respondent, Innes, lodged answers to the petition, and pleaded, inter alia;—Where a Sheriff-clerk is pursuer of an action in his own Court neither he nor his partner is entitled to officiate as Sheriff-clerk in such action, and all procedure in this action in which either of these parties have acted or may act in the capacity of Sheriff-clerk is illegal and invalid as being against public policy.

The Sheriff-substitute (Orr) repelled this plea. The respondent appealed.

The Sheriff (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the appeal for the respondent, recalls the interlocutor appealed against; and in respect that the petitioner, Daniel Macbeth, is Sheriff-clerk of the county of Bute, finds that he is not entitled to institute or carry on an action in the Sheriff-court of that county: Therefore dismisses the petition, and decerns: Finds the respondent, George Innes, entitled to ex-

Macbeth v. Innes.

* "NOTE.—In a series of cases it has been decided that a principal or depute clerk of a Court cannot act as agent in it, and the Act of Sederunt of 6th March 1783 has been repeatedly found to be simply a declaration of the common law. The authorities to this effect will be found cited in the case of Manson v. Smith, 4th February 1871, 9 Macph. p. 492, and in M'Glashan's Practice, 4th edn., by Barclay, p. 77. After stating that a clerk of Court cannot act as agent in his own Court Dr Barclay lays down the law thus:—'The exclusion relates solely to clerks being agents for others, and does not preclude a clerk of Court or his depute from conducting an action at his own instance in his own Court, particularly if it cannot be competently raised before any other; but the libel when at the principal's instance should always be subscribed by his depute, and vice versa. Of course he is still more entitled to defend an action in his own Court.'

"The Sheriff is unable to concur in this opinion, after considering the whole cases referred to by the learned author, and the other decisions mentioned by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of Manson v. Smith.

"The Sheriff and the Sheriff-clerk, according to these decisions, must be regarded as coming under the same rule. Neither of them can be an agent for a debtor, and it would seem to follow necessarily that neither of them ought to be allowed to sue in the Sheriff-court in which he is a judge or clerk. If the Sheriff had a debtor in the county of Bute it is quite plain that a summons in his name against the debtor would be a nullity. Sometimes it has been tried to obviate this inconvenience by making the summons run, not in the name of the Sheriff, but in that of the Sheriff-substitute, which summons would also be a nullity, but upon another ground, viz., that the writ must run in the name of the officer who holds his commission under the sign manual. Now, whether rightly or wrongly, the Sheriff-clerk has been put in the same category in this respect with the Sheriff. Lord Neaves gave this explanation in the case of Manson v. Smith of the position and duties of a Sheriff-clerk:—'In the argument for the respondent the position of a clerk of Court was completely ignored. It is a most important office. He is not the servant of the Court, but an independent public officer, whose duty it is to record and to assist in carrying out the judgments of the Court, and in whom must be placed the greatest confidence. He must be as impartial as the Judge. In inferior Courts he is the keeper of the seal of the Court, for by his signature summonses are authorised and rendered valid. He authenticates writs. It is to his satisfaction that caution must be found, and in his hands consignation must be made. He is the taxing officer in many Courts, and is virtually the extractor of their decrees, which are only rendered the foundation of diligence by being authenticated by him. It is clear that a person in such a position should not attempt to be actor in rem suam. No man can rightly use his public functions or any trust he may hold so as to benefit himself. If a clerk of Court were permitted to be the instrument of summoning his adversary there would be an opening for great irregularities. His doing so in my opinion, not only creates a nullity, but amounts to a delinquency.'

"Two conflicting judgments have been pronounced upon the point, the one by the First Division and the other by the Second Division of the Court of Session. In Heddell v. Garrioch, 1st March 1827, 5 Sh., p. 473 (503), the Court held that the Sheriff-clerk of Shetland could sue his tenant for payment of a rent amounting to £8 in the Sheriff-court of Shetland. On the other hand, in the case of Campbell v. M'Cowan, 10th July 1824, 3 Sh., p. 245, 'the majority of the Judges considered that it was illegal in a clerk of Court to bring an action for his own debt before a Court in which he himself must necessarily officiate as clerk, and that, although there were no grounds for suspending M'Cowan from his office, yet that his conduct had been irregular.'

"The case of Campbell was pleaded to the Court in the case of Heddell, but was disregarded by the Second Division. At the same time (in this division of authority) the Sheriff is entitled to give effect to his own opinion, and he has

The respondent argued;—It was competent for the Sheriff to a clerk pro tempore. The depute-clerk was so dependent on his p that the respondent might decline to have his cause judged by h was open to the appellant to get redress from the Supreme Court.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Sheriff has pronounced an interl which he finds that, in respect the petitioner, Daniel Macbeth, is Sherif the county of Bute, he is not entitled to institute or carry on an acti Sheriff-court of that county.

I am unable to concur in that interlocutor. It proceeds on the footi is absolutely incompetent for a Sheriff-clerk to carry on litigation in the which he is clerk. Any such rule would occasion very serious incon not to Sheriff-clerks alone, but to all parties concerned; while, so fa Sheriff-clerk himself is concerned, it would result in an entire denegatio because there are some cases in which the Sheriff of a county has a privat diction, and if in such cases a Sheriff-clerk cannot institute proceedin own Court he will not be able to do so in any Court whatever,—a res I cannot contemplate as possible under our judicial system.

The Sheriff has gone far beyond anything pleaded by the responden only plea stated is, that "where a Sheriff-clerk is pursuer of an action i Court neither he nor his partner is entitled to officiate as Sheriff-clerk action."

The Sheriff-substitute repelled that plea, and the Sheriff recalled th substitute's interlocutor, but went far beyond the plea to which he g I disagree with the Sheriff-substitute, but I cannot concur with the She judgment. se,—a class of cases with regard to which review is excluded by statute,—notithstanding the Second Division set aside the judgment.

In this case, pari ratione,—nay, I am disposed to say multo magis,—the conct of the Sheriff-clerk in relation to the process was utterly incompetent. Mr acbeth did not sign a summons,—there was no summons to sign,—this being ummary petition. But there must be a warrant of citation which initiates d sets in motion the whole action. This warrant of citation is written by the heriff-clerk or his depute; and if a Sheriff-clerk, in presenting his own petition the Sheriff, writes the warrant, I think such an act vitiates the whole proedings. If the Sheriff-clerk be clearly incompetent to act in his own case ually so must be his depute, an official appointed by, and presumably entirely der the guidance of, his principal. But, further, we cannot leave out of account at the interlocutor of citation in this case contains a great deal more than the arrant of citation, viz., a warrant of sequestration. It had the effect of sending officer to inventory and seize the respondent's effects before the respondent d been heard at all. No occasion could be imagined where it is so necessary protect the interests of defenders.

I apprehend that the remedy, where the Sheriff-clerk desires to sue in his own ourt, is, that he should apply to the Sheriff to appoint a Sheriff-clerk to act in s stead in that process,—a course which I consider would be perfectly competent, d quite consistent with a carefully considered judgment in the case of Galbraith, D. 52. The same rule will apply in this case. If Macbeth had asked the heriff to appoint some one else I have no doubt the Sheriff would have agreed, d the Sheriff-clerk thus appointed for this particular cause would have written e interlocutor of citation, and he alone would have had the custody of the ocess. This is no small matter when it comes to be considered how important the position of the Sheriff-clerk as clerk of process. For example, it might be cessary to find caution, and the clerk of the process is the judge of the suffiency of the caution. Now, the impropriety of the Sheriff-clerk judging of the fficiency of the caution which he himself must find is manifest. Or he may called on to consign a sum of money in the hands of the clerk of Court—in his own hands.

All dangers would be avoided, the process would go on, and be conducted ith perfect propriety, and with due regard to all requisite safeguards, by adopting the proposed remedy, viz., that where a Sheriff-clerk is a party to a cause in s own Court another wholly independent should be appointed in his place.

In this view I am compelled to the conclusion that, while recalling the interutor of the Sheriff, we ought to recall all the interlocutors pronounced in the se, and dismiss the petition.

Lord Deas.—The Sheriff in his findings in this case attaches no weight to e fact that the Sheriff-clerk-depute is the partner in business of his principal. e goes entirely on the general ground that the Sheriff-clerk of a county "is not ntitled to institute or carry on an action in the Sheriff-court of that county." ow, if the law were as stated by the Sheriff the disadvantage would be at least great to the public as to the Sheriff-clerk. We have a good illustration of at in the present case, which is a sequestration of a small tenant, who might turally expect to be found liable in expenses. If the Sheriff-court of the unty is not the proper forum for the Sheriff-clerk to bring his action in, it llows of necessity that the Court of Session must be the forum, and if he is mpelled to go there, the unfortunate defender, whoever he may be, may be ulcted in Court of Session expenses, although the question be one which is ally only of small-debt importance. I do not differ from the Sheriff in holding at an action, if it cannot be brought elsewhere, may be brought in this Court. only differ from him in thinking that this action cannot be brought elsewhere. think with your Lordship that a Sheriff-clerk, equally with anybody else, ay bring an action before the Sheriff of the county, and that the only question as to how the action is to be conducted. I am not disposed to say that there only one way of getting over that difficulty, but I agree that the way proposed y your Lordship is the best way. We have Stair's authority for saying that where the clerk is disqualified his depute may act, though deriving his appointment from him. A man is not the less a public officer merely because he derives his appointment from another public officer, and although the latter may be disqualified from acting in a particular matter, it does not follow that the other is so also. If, therefore, the depute-clerk had not been the partner in business of the principal clerk I should have held it not incompetent for the depute to act in a case at the instance of the principal. It is true that the clerks in this Court must write the interlocutors with their own hand, unless where this is specially dispensed with by the Court. But that is not the practice in the Sheriff-courts, where any clerk in the Sheriff-clerk's office, whether he holds a commission or not, may write out an interlocutor, and I never heard of any nullity being supposed to arise therefrom. When I was Sheriff of Ross and Cromarty shires, my own clerk in Edinburgh frequently wrote my interlocutors, and I believe the practice of all Sheriffs is similar. We are therefore dealing with a case in which the Sheriff might allow anybody he chose to write out the interlocutor, and this makes a considerable difficulty in holding that even if the Sheriff-clerk had himself written out the interlocutor this would have inferred a nullity. The interlocutor would not have been his interlocutor, but that of the Sheriff who adopted him as his amanuensis. The difficulty would have been still greater in holding it a ground of nullity that the interlocutor had been written by the Sheriff-clerk-depute. The case does not come at all within the rule prohibiting a Sheriff-clerk from acting as procurator in a case in his own Court. I do not, however, differ in thinking that if there is any dubiety the best course is to appoint somebody else to act in room of the Sheriff-clerk pro hac vice. The chief objection I feel is to going back upon and nullifying the proceedings ab initio. Looking to the nature of the application there is a good deal to be said for the view that a necessity existed for the interlocutor being at once written out to initiate the process. Now, necessity goes far to dispense with all declinatures. And though there may have turned out to be, in point of fact, no urgent necessity for instant sequestration in the present case, it might have been otherwise. I think there was such a degree of necessity as ought to prevent our holding the first interlocutor an absolute nullity. But in other respects I am not disposed to differ from the result arrived at by your Lordships.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I cannot say that I quite agree with the view taken in this case by the Sheriff. I am not prepared to decide that the Sheriff-clerk is not entitled to institute an action in the Sheriff-court of the county, or that he cannot defend himself in the Sheriff-court. I think that would be a penalty of the office, and, as your Lordship says, a denial of justice to the Sheriff-clerk which the law does not sanction. Justice—and accessible justice—the prompt, available, and cheaply-attained justice of the Sheriff-court—cannot be refused to the Sheriff-clerk. It is not in that aspect that the question is here presented to my mind. The Sheriff-clerk cannot act as agent in the Sheriff-court. He does not do so here; an agent, or procurator of Court, appears for him.

To me the true question appears to be, whether the duties of the Sheriff-clerk in this cause where the Sheriff-clerk was a party have been competently and legally discharged. The office and duties of Sheriff-clerk are certainly important, and he must be neutral and independent of both parties. I think that he himself cannot competently and legally act as Sheriff-clerk in his own cause. But another clerk may be appointed by the Sheriff. The occasions on which, on account of the Sheriff-clerk being a litigant, another clerk requires to be appointed cannot be numerous. When they occur the Sheriff must provide the remedy. It is in his power to do so, and he should be asked to do so. Such an occasion is an emergency, and the appointment by the Sheriff of a Sheriff-clerk for the temporary purpose of meeting that emergency seems to be a reasonable and competent proceeding; and it was so considered by the Court in the case of Galbraith. But the remedy must be provided by the interposition of the Sheriff. The Sheriff-clerk, who in his own case cannot personally act, cannot himself appoint his substitute to act for him. It was his part, as a litigant in the Court when he was clerk, to apply to the Sheriff, and crave from him the appointment person to act as clerk in the emergency. I rather think a motion might been sufficient.

ot having done so,—but having devolved the duties of clerk on his own te, representing himself, his alter ego,—I cannot think that the procedure correct; one of the protections by which law guards the neutrality and pendence of judicial procedure is weakened.
expressing this opinion I do not rely on the fact of the Sheriff-clerk-depute partner in business of the Sheriff-clerk, though that is a complication of natter. My opinion rests on the more general ground, and is in accordance that which your Lordship has stated.

taken place in this case; for great expense must thereby have been ca the parties. This, however, was inevitable from the opposition which wa to the erection from parties interested. The ministers of two neighb parishes which were affected, and also the heritors whose interests were in in a serious manner, have been heard to-day on the question, which districts—one larger and the other smaller—is to be assigned. We h had any argument to-day as to the general expediency of the erection.

Now, in sanctioning the erection of parishes, the Court has to exerci diction of a very unusual and difficult kind. It is too much taken for that if the parties have provided a church, and have made arrangements payment of the minister, it follows as a matter of course that the Co assign a district. If any such idea does prevail the sooner it is put an the better, for that is not the object of the Act of Parliament. The o the Act was to provide spiritual and pastoral care for districts which were d of it, either because they were situated far apart from the parish churc account of the large number of the population, or some such similar stance. The erection here proposed is in a part of the country which populous, and it is proposed to separate the lands from parishes which very populous. The necessity for the erection is not very apparent to m There is no part of the proposed new parish very distant from a parish except one part of Annan, but it is not of great extent. The part tak Middlebie is somewhat larger, but the parish church is adjoining. Th of Dornock is very small, but it is proposed to take away a part of i effect of this would be to make the proposed parish larger than the p Dornock. Neither Kirkpatrick-Fleming nor Middlebie is in need of a relief. The only parish which affords a feasible case is Annan, the no of which is some distance from the parish church. But the distance not very great. I have therefore great difficulty in holding that any n exists for the proposed erection.

This view of the case is confirmed by the opposition which has bee by the ministers of the two adjoining parishes of Kirkpatrick-Fleming a nock, which are proposed to be mutilated. They say that, in the int their parishioners, they think the erection inexpedient. We have also t owners raising the same opposition. Now, we must bear in mind tha erection is to be effectual, the people in the district will have to resor church. People are entitled to go to their parish church without any p whereas, if they go to the new church, they will have to pay seat-rents. people live far from their parish church this consideration might appea and of no importance; but where they reside near their parish church no necessity for their incurring such pecuniary cost. I cannot bring n any other conclusion than that the proposed erection is one which th should reject.

1ST DIVISION. B.

MARGARET STEEL died in 1841 intestate, leaving heritable and move- e estate, consisting of one-twelfth share of the heritable and move- e estate of the late James Warrock, then the subject of litigation an action of muitiplepoinding. She was survived by a brother, omas Steel, who died on 19th March 1860, and two sisters, Mrs Grace el or Newbigging, who died on 23d January 1860, and Miss Isabella el, who died on 23d February 1869. Miss Isabella Steel was con- ned executrix-dative to her sister Margaret, but no title was made up Thomas Steel, her heir-at-law, to the heritable part of her estate. On s death of Thomas Steel, his son, Peter Barr Steel, became heir-ap- rent to his aunt Margaret Steel, and on 4th December 1861 he was erned her heir in general, and made up a title to her heritage. He d on 19th May 1870, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement.

This special case was presented for the opinion of the Court, in regard the division of Margaret Steel's moveable estate. The first parties, ing the representatives of Mrs Newbigging and Isabella Steel, claimed argaret Steel's whole moveable estate to be divided equally between em per stirpes, on the ground that they were her next of kin, and that eir brother Thomas, who was entitled as heir-at-law to take up the ritage, did not collate or indicate any intention of collating. The cond parties, being the trustees of the said Thomas Steel, claimed a ird share of the moveable estate, on the ground that he was also one of e next of kin, and took no advantage from the fee of the heritable tate, which devolved on his son, Peter Barr Steel, and was taken up by im as his aunt's heir in general. Thomas Steel never attained to the ssession of any part of the heritable or moveable estate.

The question for the opinion of the Court was,—"Whether the trus- es of Thomas Steel are entitled to a share, and, if so, what share, of the oveable estate; or, whether it falls to be divided into two equal shares, ne for the representatives of Mrs Newbigging, and the other for the neral disponee of Isabella Steel?"

It was argued for James Newbigging's trustees and others, the repre- ntatives of Margaret Steel's sisters, that as collation had never taken lace or been possible neither Thomas Steel nor any one in his right uld claim a share of the moveable estate.

It was argued for Thomas Steel's trustees that he had never been in position to take benefit by the heritable succession, and therefore was t excluded from a share of the moveable estate. By 4 Geo. IV. c. 98 e right to a share of the moveable estate vested in him ipso jure, and as transmitted by his trust-deed.[1]

Feb. 20, 1873. Newbigging's Trustees v. Steel's Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The facts necessary for judgment in this case may b shortly stated. Margaret Steel died on 21st December 1841, leaving be heritable and moveable estate. Her nearest relations were a brother, Thom Steel, and two sisters. The brother, of course, was her heir in heritage, and t two sisters were the nearest of kin entitled to succeed to the moveable estat The two sisters died, the one in 1860 and the other in 1869. They had n opportunity of making up any title to the personal estate, for it was then t subject of litigation. The heir was very much in the same position, and accor ingly he never made up a title, and he died in March 1860. Now, after h death his son, Peter Barr Steel, became heir-apparent to his aunt, Marg Steel; and he made up a title to her, passing over his father. The quest now raised as between the trustees of Thomas Steel and the representatives his two sisters is, whether the brother's representatives are entitled to a shar the moveable estate along with the sisters of the deceased; and this they p pose to do without offering, or being able to offer, collation of the heritage. T question is too clear for argument. Thomas Steel had while in life no claim any share of the moveable estate. He might have had, if in fact he h brought the heritage into one mass with the moveables. But he did not do and the persons here claiming in his right are not in a position to do so. I a therefore, of opinion that the first alternative of the question submitted to must be answered in the negative.

LORD DEAS.—The claim here made by the executors of Thomas Steel is ma as in his right. The claim is made upon the footing that under the statute 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, the claimants are in the same position in which Thomas St himself would have been. We must therefore inquire what was the position Thomas Steel. Now, that position was that he could get a share of the mo able estate upon collating the heritage. He never collated, and it is not m proposed by those who claim in his place that they should collate; nor co they do so, for his share of the heritage to which he made up no title was tak up by his son, Peter Barr Steel, by serving heir to his aunt Margaret. Pet under the trust-deed of Thomas Steel, was a beneficiary, and took an inte under it; he was also liable for the acts and deeds, as also for the omissions of father, in respect Thomas Steel survived the intestate for nineteen or twe years, and possessed all that time on apparency. Notwithstanding all this t representatives of Peter Steel propose to pass over his father Thomas, and t the heritable property of Margaret Steel, and at the same time, as amongst h next of kin, to take a share of her moveable estate. That I hold to be out the question, and I concur in your Lordship's opinion.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The right of an heir, being one of the next of kin, is n that of a person primarily entitled to both moveable and heritable estate, but is a primary right to heritage which he may extend by collation so as to obta a share of the moveables.

So viewing it, Thomas Steel, who was the heir in heritage, could not ha any right to moveables without collating the heritage to which he was entitle This he did not do. He died without collating or offering to collate, and it i not proposed now to do so.

LORD JERVISWOODE.—My opinion is the same as that of the rest of you Lordships.

The law of Scotland has great favour for the right of the heir in heritag He takes the whole heritage away from those as near as he himself is in relatio ship to the intestate. But it was never contemplated, nor would it be just, t give him an equal right along with them in the moveables without collatio which is practically what is contended for here.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords havi heard counsel for the parties to the special case, find and decla that the trustees of Thomas Steel are not entitled to any share of the moveable estate of the deceased Miss Margaret Steel, and decern."

OHN LAURIE, a commercial traveller, entered into the employment of d and Co., wholesale tea merchants, London, in January 1871, on erms embodied in the following letter:—"Gentlemen,—In considera- of your employing me as traveller to sell tea for you in Edinburgh, h, Glasgow, and other places, as may be agreed upon, I hereby agree ulfil all the duties of such traveller with punctuality and fidelity, to accept as commission for my selling tea, and for money incurred aid by me for travelling and other expenses, one-third part of the rence between the price quoted by you to me from time to time as value of the tea, adding the charge for lot-money, brokerage, and r expenses, and the money obtained by the sale of the tea. And I her agree that should I at any time wish to leave your employ, ive you one month's notice of my intention of so doing, and to receive ame term of notice from you to leave your employment. All money e collected by you. This agreement dates from 2d January 1871.— ns, &c., JOHN LAURIE."

he pursuer continued in the employment of the defenders until January 2, when he raised the present action for payment of £146, 14s. 8d. pursuer averred that during the time he was with the defenders btained orders for them to the amount of £10,350, 16s. 1d.; that the fit thereon, calculated as agreed upon, was £710, 10s. 0d., and that refore the commission due to him, being one-third of that profit, was 6, 14s. 8d. On account of this commission the pursuer had received), and the present action was brought for recovery of the balance of 6, 14s. 8d.

he defenders admitted the terms of the agreement between themselves l the pursuer, and they also admitted that the pursuer had obtained ers for them to the amount of £10,350, 16s. 1d.; but they explained t £1083 of that sum had been lost through the failure of purchasers, l averred that the meaning of the agreement was that the pursuer was y to get a third of the cumulo profits, any loss arising from bad debts ng deducted, and not, as he averred, one-third of the profits on each nsaction. The defenders further averred in defence that, in addition the loss specified, a part of the price, amounting to £2850, had not n recovered at the date of this action, in consequence of the sales ring been made by the pursuer at a credit of four months, which period l not elapsed. They therefore pleaded that the £90 which they had d to the pursuer was the whole commission then due to him.

he Lord Ordinary allowed parties a proof. There were several letters ween the pursuer and defenders produced, among which the following were specially founded upon by the defenders as shewing the meanin their agreement with the pursuer as to commission.

Letter from the pursuer to the defenders, dated 5th June 1871, in wh he says,—"I think you need not deduct all my portion of Roxbu bad debt off at once." With reference to this letter the pursuer depo —"That debt of Roxburgh's was the first loss I had made to David L and Company, and as they had never received any money from Roxb and Company I felt so very much annoyed at it that I thought it w be right for me to risk losing a portion of that debt, although I conce that I was not bound to do so. I was to bear the loss by paying a tion of it, or by paying back a portion of the commission which I received upon that sale. Possibly I had got my commission on i that time."

Letter, defenders to pursuer.—"Mr John Laurie.—London, E.C., 14, 1871.—Dear Sir,—In reply to your letters of the 13th instant, I look into your account. I feel certain that nothing is due to you, a loss on L. Roxburgh and Co.'s account will be large."

Letter, defenders to pursuer.—"Mr John Laurie.—London, E.C., 7, 1871.—Dear Sirs,—In reply to your letter of the 3d inst., I herewith a pro forma account, which shews that if £5726, 14 is paid, £77, 3s. 8d. will be the amount of your commission to June."

The following account was enclosed:—

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"H heard counsel for the parties, and considered the agreement and pro ings, including the proof, finds that the pursuer has failed to prov the sum libelled, or any part thereof, is due to him by the defen Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the sum and decerns." *

* "NOTE.—Whether the agreement made with the defenders by the pu as a traveller for the sale of their teas was or was not a hard or disadvanta one for him is not the question now in dispute. With that question the Ordinary has nothing to do. What he has to decide is, whether any, a any, what sum is due by the defenders to the pursuer under the agreemen 81 of process, the terms of which are accurately stated in the first article condescendence.

"The parties having differed, not only as to whether any, or, if any, sum was owing to the pursuer, but also as to the true meaning of the agre and especially as to the meaning of the expression in it 'money obtained' sale of tea, a proof was allowed, and has been adduced by them.

"On considering that proof, the Lord Ordinary has had no difficu assoilzieing the defenders.

"The meaning of the expression 'money obtained' is prima facie wit defenders. The Lord Ordinary thinks that, in the absence of all evide the actings or conduct of the parties to the contrary, it must be taken to money actually received or recovered by the defenders, and could not, a tended by the pursuer, be merely held to mean accounts incurred and them, although payment of these accounts should never be received or rec any ambiguity that could be supposed to be attached to the expression , the Lord Ordinary thinks, be held to be satisfactorily cleared up and ved by the actings and conduct and statements of the parties themselves r the agreement. Thus, in their letter to the pursuer of 23d February (No. 515 of process), being in the second month of the business transac- , they say,—'We enclose particulars of sales made by you from 10th to the January, which shews that £27, 0s. 11d. will fall due to you for commis- if the amount of sales, £1160, 14s. 2d., is paid.' And in his letter to the nders of 9th February 1871 (No. 82 of process), the pursuer expressly says by the agreement he was to have 'one-third of the profits;' and it scarcely ired to be admitted by him, although it was so in his examination as a ess, that there could be no profit on bad debts, or on anything but accounts nent of which had been actually received or recovered. Then, again, in their rs to the pursuer of 12th June 1871, the statement in which was not re- ated or objected to by him in any way, they say,—'There is nothing due on, as the loss on Roxburgh and Company's account will be larger,' that is, any claim he could otherwise have had on other transactions. So far, ed, from repudiating or objecting to the defenders' statement in the letter referred to, the pursuer, on 5th June 1871 (No. 85 of process), wrote them a state of accounts, and added,—'I think you need not deduct all my portion Roxburgh's bad debt off at once.' On 7th July 1871 the defenders did mit to the pursuer, in a letter of that date (No. 517 of process), a tentative, as they term it, a pro forma account, shewing, as they stated, 'that if 26, 14s. is paid, £77, 3s. 8d. will be the amount of your commission to June;' and in the same letter the defenders added,—'You ought not to for money before it is due.' The Lord Ordinary does not see how it is pos- to reconcile these letters, and the statements which they contain, with the rpretation of the agreement now attempted to be fixed upon it by the pur- , or with any other interpretation of it than that contended for by the nders, and if so, it is clear on the proof that no sum whatever is due to the suer.

'In the course of the debate it was suggested, on the part of the pursuer, each transaction of sale of tea made by him should, in the matter of ac- nts, and in ascertaining whether any commission is or is not due to him, be ted at separately and independently. But in answer to this it is sufficient ay that the parties did not correspond or act under the agreement upon any h footing, and, besides, that is not the footing on which the pursuer libels or intains his action, as very plainly appears from his condescendence, and par- larly the third article thereof.

'The Lord Ordinary has only further to explain that the 'commission sheets' ich the pursuer, towards the end of his evidence, says he was to send to his at in order to be produced, have been produced, but after examination the d Ordinary cannot discover anything in them that can be held to affect ourably for the pursuer the views he has above expressed. They appear to Lord Ordinary to be adverse to him rather than otherwise."

No. 73. At advising,—

Feb. 20, 1873. Laurie v. Lloyd and Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—We are all of opinion that the first contention maintained by the pursuer cannot be maintained. It is not the meaning of the agreement that the pursuer should have a commission on all sales effected whether payment was obtained from the purchasers or not.

The next question is, whether, on the one hand, the traveller is entitled to a third of the profit on each transaction on which profit was obtained, or whether he is only entitled to one-third of the result of the profit on an indefinite series of transactions. On the whole, I am of opinion that the first proposition is correct. In regard to the construction of the agreement, which was made after the pursuer had been six months in the employment of the defenders, it is clear that he was not a partner in the business. The company retained to themselves the right of accepting or rejecting transactions. Whatever the nature of the pursuer's claim for one-third of the profits may be, it is certainly not that of a partner. In the same way the restrictions put upon the pursuer are quite inconsistent with the idea that he in any way guaranteed the sales. He was simply a servant of his employers, to be remunerated in a particular way. It is to be observed, too, that he was to pay his own expenses, which indicates that his position was not that of a joint adventurer, for in that case his expenses would have been a charge upon the joint adventure.

The question is, whether "money obtained" means aggregate profits or individual profits. Now, this agreement cannot be read intelligibly, unless, on the one hand, it is limited to individual transactions, or, on the other hand, some period is expressed for squaring accounts. No such period is expressed, and indeed the defenders maintain that as long as the pursuer remained in their employment his share of the profits could never be ascertained. From all this I gather that there never was any intention that there should be any such running account, but that the parties meant that the pursuer should be entitled to a commission on each transaction on which there was profit. The contention of the defenders would not be within the clause regarding remuneration, but would in effect be to make the traveller liable for bad debts. On the construction of the defenders, if after a long course of successful transactions the business had ultimately turned out to be unremunerative, owing perhaps to one bad debt, although the traveller might have secured a most lucrative connection for his employers, he would be entitled to nothing. I am unable to adopt this construction.

The most material point which is put against the pursuer is the view which he seems to have taken of his position in the letter of 15th June 1871. But as it stands, this letter amounts to an admission that bad debts should be deducted to a certain extent from his commission. This is unquestionably a difficulty which is increased by the letter of the defenders of 7th July 1871. But I do not think that the letters can be pressed so far against the pursuer as to prevent him from maintaining the true construction of the agreement itself. He may not have wished to raise any dispute about this bad debt of Roxburgh's and been willing to bear a part of the loss.

As to the record, when the pursuer came into Court, he certainly claimed up to the top of his demand. But there is nothing in the record to limit him to that particular demand. On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to one-third of the profit on each transaction on which any profit was made. We have not the materials for determining the amount due to the pursuer, but I do not think there should be any difficulty in ascertaining it.

LORD COWAN.—The question, which has been chiefly debated before us was not so fully stated to the Lord Ordinary as its importance demanded. Still it had been stated, for at the close of his note the Lord Ordinary says,—"In the course of the debate it was suggested, on the part of the pursuer, that each transaction of sale of tea made by him should, in the matter of accounts, and ascertaining whether any commission is or is not due to him, be looked separately and independently." His Lordship's answer is,—"It is sufficient to say that the parties did not correspond or act under the agreement upon a footing, and besides, that is not the footing on which the pursuer libels or ains his action, as very plainly appears from his condescendence." The bservation is quite just, but is not conclusive against the plea; for it is to us, if necessary, to allow a plea to be added.

regards the first view maintained by the pursuer, which occupies almost hole of the note to the interlocutor, I quite concur with his Lordship that not be sustained. It seems clear that "money obtained" means money lly in the pocket of his employers. The Lord Ordinary rightly repudiated ntention that the pursuer was entitled to have his commission, whether rofit was made by his employers or not on the transaction. This is a view inconsistent with the terms of the agreement. Then comes the question, her "money obtained" does not merely apply to such particular transaction, ot to the aggregate amount of a course of transactions. I cannot read the ment in such sense as to affirm the last of these alternatives, having refer- to the true position of the parties.

yd and Company are wholesale tea merchants in London; they wished to d their sales in Scotland, and employed the pursuer Laurie, not as a partner, a commission agent, but simply as a traveller, to get orders. The agree- is as follows—(Reads agreement). There is not a word in this writing to ion the notion that an account for an indefinite period was to be kept of tea sales, and that this gentleman was to get no remuneration whatever the result of the whole transactions shewed an ultimate profit. In no this the position of a broker or an agent or a traveller, unless it is ex- y stated. Every transaction stands by itself. The agent sells, and gets mmission, if there is a profit on that particular sale. It is clear that this true and proper sense of the agreement—each transaction to stand by it- where there is a profit, the pursuer gets his commission; and where there profit, he gets no commission. This appears to me the true construction s writing. This is shewn, in the first place, by the agreement not fixing eriod at which the account is to be made up; and indeed this considera- n itself is to my mind almost conclusive against the defenders' construction. ld that the pursuer might go on labouring for a long period of years with- etting anything, and then that his labours should be all sacrificed by a bad occurring, it may be, towards the close of his employment, is a construc- which we could not adopt unless compelled to do so by express words. a, the pursuer had no authority finally to effect sales. He reported ales, and his employers were entitled, if they saw cause to do so, after ry, to repudiate them. And further, he was not allowed to collect a single y of money due to the company, with whom alone was left the right given lift the debts. All this shews that he occupied the position simply of ller, and not of partner, or agent, with a del credere commission, either of h positions, had it been established, might have made the pursuer respon- for the amount of his sales. He is not so as the case stands; and he must ntitled to his commission according to the true construction of the agreement. regards the letters, it is difficult to reconcile the terms of some of them the view that the pursuer was not liable for bad debts, except to the extent ot getting his commission. But I think that the explanation which has given is satisfactory, and in any view the letters are not sufficiently distinct as ve a construction to the agreement different from what its terms truly import.

RD BENHOLME and LORD NEAVES concurred.

THE following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Alter the said interlocutor: Find the pursuer entitled to a commission of one-third of the profits, if any, on each of the sales effected by him, but not on the sales which yielded no profit to the defenders: Appoint the defenders to lodge a state in process shewing the sales in question, and the amount of profit realised on each: Quoad ultra continue the cause, and reserve the question of expenses, and decern."

Black, &c. v. Edinburgh Tramways Co.

THE EDINBURGH TRAMWAY COMPANY, Respondents.—Lord-Adv. Young—Mansfield.

Private Act—Edinburgh Tramway Act, 1871, 34 and 35 Vict. c. 89—General Tramways Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. c. 78, sec. 9—Provisional Order.—The Edinburgh Tramway Company were authorised by their special Act and relative plans to lay a double line of tramways in a certain street which at its widest part was not broad enough to afford a clear space of 9 feet 6 inches between the nearest rail and the footpath on each side. By an agreement incorporated with the special Act the whole provisions of the General Tramways Act, 1870, were made to apply as fully as if the special Act had been a provisional order obtained under the General Act. The General Act authorised the Board of Trade to grant provisional orders, which should only become effectual when confirmed by an Act of Parliament, and provided (sec. 9)—"No tramway shall be authorised by any provisional order to be so laid that for a distance of 30 feet or upwards a less space than 9 feet and 6 inches shall intervene between the outside of the footpath on either side of the road and the nearest rail of the tramway, if one-third of the owners, or one-third of the occupiers of the houses, shops, or warehouses abutting upon the part of the road where such less space shall intervene aforesaid, shall, in the prescribed manner, and at the prescribed time, express their dissent from any tramway being so laid."

One-third of the occupiers of houses in the said street having applied for interdict against the formation of any line of tramway within 9 feet 6 inches of the footpath, as specified in sec. 9, held that the objection was competent, and interdict granted—(diss. the Lord President, on the ground that the special Act was to be regarded as a provisional order confirmed by Parliament, and that sec. 9 applied merely to the granting of orders by the Board of Trade and not to their construction when granted and confirmed by Parliament).

1ST DIVISION. Lord Gifford. M.

MESSRS A. & C. BLACK, publishers, Edinburgh, and others, who were occupiers of more than one-third of the houses, shops, and warehouses in North Bridge Street, Edinburgh, presented a note of suspension and interdict against the Edinburgh Street Tramways Company, incorporated by 34 and 35 Vict. c. 89, praying the Court to interdict the respondents "from making or constructing any tramway in or along the portion of North Bridge Street, Edinburgh, which extends from the south end of the North Bridge to the High Street of Edinburgh; or at least from making a double line of tramway in or along the said portion of the said street, or any tramway along the same, which shall be laid so that for a distance of 30 feet or upwards a less space than 9 feet and 6 inches shall intervene between the curbstone, or outside of the footpath or pavement on either side of the street and the nearest rail of the tramway there, and to decern and ordain the respondents to remove any tramway laid as aforesaid, and to restore the carriage-way to its former condition, in case the respondents shall have begun or completed their threatened operations before this note is advised."

By the Edinburgh Tramways Act, 1871, the Edinburgh Street Tramways Company were empowered to make various lines of tramways in and through the city of Edinburgh; inter alia, they were empowered to make and maintain the tramway after specified, viz.:—"(6 and 6A), a tramway No. 6, and a tramway No. 6A (being respectively 1 mile 5 furlongs and 8⅓ chains in length), commencing respectively opposite the north-west corner of North Bridge Street, at its junction with Princes Street (tramway No. 6 there forming a junction with tramway No. 1, and tramway No. 6A there forming a junction with tramway No. 1A), passing thence respectively by a curved line into and along North Bridge Street, thence along the roadway of the North Bridge, South Bridge Street, Nicol
